THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Tuesday, December 9, 1969.

The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 10.00 a.m.

Senator Keith Davey (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, I would like to call the meeting to order. The photographers, I can assure you, honourable senators, will not be at all our hearings and I think in a moment we should ask them to cease and desist.

Honourable senators, the first brief we are going to hear is that of the Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association and I should like to identify very briefly the people who are here. The chief spokesman, sitting on my immediate right, is Mr. Ralph Costello. Mr. Costello is the President of the C.D.N.P.A. and is also publisher of the Telegraph-Journal and the Evening Times-Globe in Saint John, New Brunswick. He is accompanied by Mr. Fred Auger who is the First Vice-President of the C.D.N.P.A. and the publisher of the Vancouver Province. We also have Mr. Aurèle Gratton, Vice-President of the C.D.N.P.A. and Executive Vice-President and General Manager of Le Devoir. And we have as well Mr. Clyde McDonald who is the General Manager of the C.D.N.P.A., and Mr. Dave Hunter who is the Secretary of the C.D.N.P.A. and Mr. Gabriel Gilbert, an executive member of the C.D.N.P.A. and the President and editor of Le Soleil.

As requested, the brief from the C.D.N.P.A. was received some three weeks ago and has been circulated to all honourable senators and according to the guidelines forwarded to you, Mr. Costello, we will take your brief as read. If you wish, sir, you now have a preliminary period in which you can summarize your brief, expand, explain, or say anything else you may wish. On this part of the hearing there will be a 15 minute time limit if you wish to use it. Following your opening statements, you will be questioned by the members of the Committee on things that you say, things mentioned in your brief, or anything else which may be on their minds.

Mr. Ralph Costello, President of the Canadian Daily Newspapers Publishers Association: Mr. Chairman, Honourable Senators, as President of the Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association, the first group honoured or at least summoned to appear before this Special Senate Committee on Mass Media, I am tempted to say that I am pleased to be here. It is a temptation I will resist, for I see no reason to strain the credibility gap so early in the hearings. Whether or not I am overjoyed at being here, I can say and with considerable sincerity that I wish you well in your deliberations, assuming that these deliberations are in fact designed ultimately to serve the press of Canada and the people of Canada.

If this is your objective we are in agreement. Your responsibility, if I may be so bold to tell you what your job is, before you start telling me how to do mine, will be to encourage improvement in the press without damaging or destroying that which you presumably hope to improve.

You do not have a simple task no matter what your motives and no matter how high your ideals. Any steps which might result in Government intervention—any Government intrusion that affects the role of the free press—can lead only to disaster. Disaster for the press, and disaster for the country.

Your role is further complicated by the current professionalism of the press of Canada. Now, you may not agree with that assessment and your researchers may well have found flaws in the press, but your examination of the press comes at a time when the daily newspapers of Canada have reached a new plateau towards professionalism and service. You are not examining an uncertain press which is faltering, floundering and failing in its responsibility to the people of Canada. I would urge you, therefore, to proceed cautiously before making any recommendations which may or which might interfere with the free press as we know it, because the press of Canada today, whatever its failings; is more professional, more dedicated, more capable and less biased—if there is any bias at all—than at any time in the history of our country.

You may consider that a broad general statement—it is. It happens to be an opinion based on the growth and development of the press of Canada which I have witnessed, and I hope you have witnessed in the past thirty years. This development has become more pronounced in recent years and Canada today has some great newspapers and others which aspire to greatness. Yet, a challenged press, a criticized press, a press exposed to public scrutiny will surely be a better press. So, I would doubt that anyone would object if you rock the boat—if you jar us out of any degree of complacency—but I would suggest that you be careful lest you sink the ship. A free press is one of our most cherished freedoms and it is not something that can be achieved by Government intervention or Government regulations. If you believe otherwise, I for one would question your ability to sit in judgment. I am not at all sure what service this Special Senate Committee on Mass Media hopes to perform for Canada but a great disservice can be performed, can be perpetrated if there is any infringement on press freedom.

Honourable Senators, while I resisted the temptation to say I am pleased to be here, I do appreciate the opportunity I have been given to express these few words of caution and concern.

Now, as to the C.D.N.P.A. It is the Canadian Daily Newspapers Publishers Association—it is not an Association which lends itself to simple definitions. It is an association made up of daily newspaper publishers, editors and executives. These men are inclined to be individualists. They are as different as the newspapers they publish and if C.D.N.P.A. does not always take a united stand on public issues or on issues of interest and concern to the newspapers of Canada, it is probably because individual publishers and editors prefer to express their personal views in their own editorial columns. C.D.N.P.A. is strongly structured as a sales research organization. It sells the concept of advertising in daily newspapers. It is involved in research on behalf of member newspapers, on behalf of the advertising agencies, the advertisers and the public. I should tell you as well that C.D.N.P.A. is at present in the middle of a transition period. In the past two or three years there has been a complete re-organization of policy of the C.D.N.P.A. Every facet of our operation has been examined or is being examined. As our formal brief has indicated, C.D.N.P.A. is a supporter of the Canadian Advertising Advisory Board which is dedicated to higher advertising standards. And C.D.N.P.A. is also very much involved in the newspaper and classroom programme which is designed to produce a better informed public.

C.D.N.P.A. however, does not duplicate the efforts of its members setting up scholarship programmes or supporting schools of journalism, national newspaper awards, international fellowship awards and exchange programmes for journalists. Practically all daily newspapers in Canada participate in such programmes on their own.

Honourable Senators, you have received and read, I trust, the brief of the Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association and if you have any questions we will be pleased to answer them—at least, pleased or not, we will endeavour to answer them.

The Chairman: Thank you Mr. Costello. I think that Senator Smith may have a question.

Senator Smith: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I am particularly happy to be able to ask a few questions at the beginning of this meeting because these questions will come from a fellow Maritimer who happens to have a son and a large number of grandchildren in your particular area...

Mr. Costello: It's nice to know that we have one friend on the Senate Committee.

Senator Smith: There is another personal note as well—I read your newspaper when I am visiting in the area and I think it stands up very well in readability and so on. I don't get so far as to read all of the in-depth editorials which you may be responsible for.

I was glad also that Mr. Costello was able to comment and to preside over the group whom he represents.

A clipping came to my attention some time ago in which Mr. Costello indicated that he did not fear the pending Senate investigation. While I thought that would have gone without saying, I am sure that as these meetings develop you will be able to get the reassurance that you have nothing to fear.

We are not questioning anybody in the newspaper media or in the other media in terms of embarrassment or of criticism, because what we are here for is to try and get the collection of ideas and attitudes that are presently in existence in all the mass media.

Perhaps I might add one more thing as a preliminary—it may very well develop that we will put a large number of questions that may cover subjects which you have not covered in your brief. Actually, I think perhaps most of us were anticipating a little more in-depth treatment as far as the brief is concerned, and I myself have found lots of questions that could be asked which would give us some of the information that I think we should have in order to get a total picture of all media.

In the first place, you mentioned the term "Freedom of the Press." You said "As we know it." How do you understand the meaning of the term "Freedom of the press"? It seems to me that it's open to a great many interpretations. Is it closely related to freedom of expression or is it the freedom to print and publish anything that you might want to?

Mr. Costello: I think it is a very basic freedom. It is freedom of expression, certainly, and freedom of communication; it's the same freedom that everyone has. It's not a freedom given to the press alone because its' freedom of speech. I think that anyone should be entitled to publish a newspaper and make that communication and beyond that the public is protected by the laws of libel and I think the standards which exist in Canada today, the standards of journalism give another degree of protection to the public. This is not a freedom to the press alone but it's the same freedom that you have to stand on the street corner and comment to another person, to another group, and make that communication, or write a letter, or whatever you wish to do. And you should be able to do that and the press should be able to publish and they should be able to do this without interference. In my own view without the worst type of interference; that would be the interference of Government.

Senator Smith: You mentioned in the brief—in fact you list quite a number of committees. There was one committee on technology, I noticed; as an association are you doing very much research which might lead to rather substantial changes in newspapers as we know them today? I also came across the quote from Lord Thompson who referred to the lack of innovation over a long period. Are you, as a publishers' association doing much about enquiring into the future development of newspapers as a communications medium?

Mr. Costello: The Publishers Association of Canada is not deeply involved in personal research programmes. There is an involvement at present, an investigation into the use of computers, but this is more in the nature of a preliminary study, perhaps for head office use, but the Publishers Association of Canada is not very deeply involved. We do keep informed by visits to the A.N.P.A. research people which, of course, is very far advanced in its research programme and quite frankly we would be duplicating, in a very minor way, what is taking place in the United States and it has not been practical at this point for us to do so, and I don't think it will be in the immediate future.

The Chairman: Mr. Auger?

Mr. Fred S. Auger, First Vice-President of the Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association: Mr. Chairman, I wouldn't like to leave that with the impression that there is no research being done in the technology of newspaper production in Canada because in individual newspaper plants there has been, and is being done a great deal of technological research. We have a department in our newspaper plant in Vancouver that is pursuing, definitely pursuing the research, as you call it, exploring new and better ways of improving our product.

The Toronto Star was responsible, over the past 30 years, for the development of technological improvements in newspaper production and handling that are now universally used in the newspaper publishing business all over the world.

Senator Smith: Thank you.

The Chairman: May I just ask, would it be correct to assume that this type of research is done, not by the Association, but by the member papers?

Mr. Fred S. Auger: By the member papers totally.

The Chairman: The Association does nothing itself as an Association?

Mr. Costello: No.

Mr. Auger: The Association does take an interest in the promulgation of this material between members.

Senator Smith: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether or not there is such a thing as important union resistance because of their great interest in job security, which perhaps tends to slow down any development there might be in this vastly improved technology. Is that an important factor or not?

Mr. Auger: Yes, it is. It's a very important factor in the welfare of the union. There have been many mechanical advances over the last 25 or 30 years which have substantially reduced the man hours required to publish a newspaper and these have been detrimental to the welfare of the union, whose welfare may be described in terms of the number of members and the size of the union.

Senator Smith: I suppose that we can assume naturally that the financial implications of considerable change is an important factor too. It must be a very expensive undertaking to take many of these steps that some of you people might have in mind?

Mr. Auger: Yes, indeed.

The Chairman: Mr. Gilbert?

Mr. Gabriel Gilbert, Executive Member of C.D.N.P.A. and President and Editor of Le Soleil: Mr. Smith, if I may add, unions at their best expect us to go on making new changes, new technological advances providing that we don't lay off any of their people, and at worst they don't let us even talk to them of any changes. That's about the situation in Canada as it is in the States.

Mr. Costello: This does not have to be attributed entirely or wholly to unions. There is a very human resistance to change which applies to the unions and it applies in newspapers because we have so many unions and changes are taking place, but there is a very human built-in resistance to change and this occurs at a certain point in someone's life. Sometimes people are not able to change at 18 and sometimes they are not able to change at 45, but there are difficulties in bringing about change.

Senator Macdonald: Mr. Chairman, in connection with the statement that unions are prepared to go along with new technology provided that none of their members are laid off. At the present time has that stopped you from getting new machines or do you now have machines and do you now hire men who are not working?

Mr. Costello: I think this is a question that should be directed at individual publishers. It is a fact that in Canada as well as all over North America, the first position and the first responsibility of a union is to the union members, and every union will attempt to keep people and will do anything possible to negotiate in a manner which will protect jobs. This does occur and it slows up technological advancement.

The Chairman: I think, Senator Macdonald, that Mr. Costello's point is very well taken and that I think is perhaps an excellent kind of question that perhaps we could put to the individual publishers as they arrive. Perhaps I could ask Mr. Costello—what is the role of the labour relations sub-committee of your executive?

Mr. Costello: The basic role is one of information. It is one of information to members and it also directs the labour seminars. I presume we are not going to become deeply involved in what takes place at newspaper labour seminars but I think the publishers attempt to prepare themselves for negotiations as the unions in their groups prepare for themselves and to be as professional or as unprofessional, when we sit down across the table.

The Chairman: You are aware, I am sure, that we will be hearing from union people in the course of our hearings?

Mr. Costello: Oh yes. Let them tell their story.

The Chairman: I was just wondering if you want to tell yours?

Mr. Costello: Well, certainly. I think again it is an individual question. Every newspaper has its own problems but the labour committee in the C.D.N.P.A. is an information centre which distributes information to the members. Distributes information to the members of the newspapers on trends in labour, on labour rates and things of that nature.

Senator Smith: I think we have dealt enough with that particular question but I might as a supplement to what I was talking about a while ago—that is technology—put forth a proposition which I have heard expressed on a number of occasions. I have no reference on it and I don't recall where I have heard it. I might have read something on it or on the subject, but are you people in the publishers' association—do you give any consideration at all to the possibility of a newspaper as we now know them becoming obsolete and non-relevant towards society in terms of new technology completely of communications? It's been visualized sometime in the future that the householder will have at his fingertips the facsimile, or he will have all the information, he will have shopping services all in one great package right in front of him—in front of a tube. Is this in the world of fantasy or are you people thinking seriously along that line?

Mr. Costello: Well, I certainly hope it's in the world of fantasy.

Senator Smith: So do I.

Mr. Costello: Everyone is thinking seriously about it. Personally, I don't see it in the immediate future, I don't see it at all but that's because I am prejudiced and in favour of the newspaper as we know it and the type of newspaper which is being developed, and I don't think that going and pressing a button and waiting for it to roll off the television is going to be a threat in the immediate future. I think that there will be those, and we are being told that this is going to be a threat and it's being watched very carefully. I think more so in the United States than in Canada but again I think you will get a lot of opinions on that in the weeks immediately ahead. You know that there are great investments being made in Canada in the future of newspapers and I think the Toronto Star is going to spend a few million dollars. I don't think it plans on going out of business in the next decade.

Senator Smith: Mr. Chairman, I think perhaps I will just ask one more question at this time.

I ran across this copy of Newsprint Facts yesterday I think we have all been on the mailing list—at least I have—for many years and I noticed something in it which gives rise to my asking you a question under the heading of advertising research. I think your brief makes some comment on advertising research. From what I gather this Newsprint Facts is published by the Newsprint Information Committee in New York City. It is supported by quite a large number of Canadian newsprint manufacturers. I don't see the name of the company in Eastern Canada which I know quite a bit about, which is the Bowater Corporation, but there are all the other big ones, Abitibi, Anglo Canadian, BC Forest Products, and so on. Mr. Jack Hoffman, who is president of the Bureau of Advertising of the American Newspaper Publishers Association—and I am sure you know him quite well—is quoted as saying this: "Without the newspaper information committee to do research, solid selling of newspapers as an ad medium would be impossible." Do you—do our Canadian publishers, do they have an opportunity to profit from any research that is done?

Mr. Costello: I think we do.

Senator Smith: By this committee?

Mr. Costello: Yes, I think we do. We do profit from research and we are aware of research and the newsprint manufacturers of Canada have been involved in research programmes with the C.D.N.P.A. in the past, and I think they will be in the future.

Senator Smith: Just as a matter of interest, I would like to read another paragraph which indicates that the research that is being done with regard to newspapers indicates that eight out of ten Americans read a newspaper and more than nine out of ten of those have incomes of $10,000 and over. Seven out of ten teenagers, eight out of ten readers open the average page carrying a national advertisement. I don't know what the significance of that is but it is just a detail which they publish.

Mr. Costello: I think the readership would be much greater in Canada.

Senator Smith: Well, our newspapers are much better than the ones in the United States.

The Chairman: I would like to ask Mr. Costello this question. There are, I believe—how many members of the Association?

Mr. Costello: I beg your pardon?

The Chairman: The question I wanted to ask is how many daily newspapers in Canada don't belong to the Association, and if they don't belong why don't they belong and what do you do to get them to join?

Mr. Costello: I think there are approximately 11 to 17 daily newspapers in Canada which do not belong. Of this number, 11 withdrew from the Association about a year ago, a year and a half or two years ago. The reason for this—the reason given was that the fees had become a problem for small daily newspapers in Canada.

The Chairman: Am I incorrect in thinking that these 11 were all Thomson papers?

Mr. Costello: There were I believe 11 Thomson newspapers.

The Chairman: And they all gave as the reason for leaving the fees were too high?

Mr. Costello: They were concerned about the fees. They were all small circulation newspapers and they did not feel they were getting the benefit of the national advertising sales programme of the C.D.N.P.A. which would justify continuance of their membership. In addition to this, the Thomson newspapers have their own national sales programmes and these member newspapers contribute to that, so there is a feeling—I think Thomson should explain their position more desirably than having me do it.

The Chairman: The balance of the Thomson newspapers belong?

Mr. Costello: Yes, that is correct.

The Chairman: What do you do to get these other people to join?

Mr. Costello: Well, we have invited them and that hasn't worked but we are working on this problem and it is a matter of assessing our fee structure and seeing if we can't come up with some new structure which would make it possible and feasible for them to become members of the Association. This is being done this very minute.

The Chairman: For the whole 17?

Mr. Costello: Yes. Our objective would be to have every daily newspaper in Canada as a member.

The Chairman: I would like to ask if I could about the relationship of the Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association as it pertains to the franchising of advertising agencies. What exactly is that relationship? You grant a franchise to an agency, is that correct? Could you explain to us how it works?

Mr. Costello: On the assumption we are going to be here for a long time.

The Chairman: Could you do it in a few minutes?

Mr. Costello: I think the franchise system so called basically, and I will lean on Clyde or any other member of the Committee for an expansion of my explanation, but basically and originally it was a credit rating system. It was developed for this purpose; there would be a central office which would be in contact with advertising agencies and would report to the members that an agency placing advertising in newspapers all over Canada would later be in a position to pay the bills. I think your Committee, or some of your consultants, have received a background information sheet on the evolution of the franchise system. We have had a very detailed franchise document which we have been studying for the last two and a half years with the hope of eliminating a great many of the unnecessary clauses. We now propose to do this and I think we are going to have about two sentences replacing about 20 pages. Basically it's a credit rating report for protection for the members. Now, Mr. MacDonald, is that correct?

Mr. Clyde H. McDonald General Manager, Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association: Yes, that is essentially a correct statement.

The Chairman: How is it being changed?

Mr. Costello: We would become better editors because we find we could say in two paragraphs what took us 20 pages to say in the past.

The Chairman: So the only changes really are editorial changes?

Mr. Costello: Perhaps it's a little more complicated than that. The new franchise will be a C.D.N.P.A. credit rating and there will be an A rating, a B rating and a C rating, and agencies—there will be reports to the members on the ratings of the advertising agencies and the newspapers then, at their own discretion, will do business with these agencies and adhere to the guidelines of the credit rating, or ignore the guidelines of the credit rating.

The Chairman: Is a newspaper free to pay the 15 per cent commission to a person or an agency who is not a member of the C.D.N.P.A.?

Mr. Costello: The newspaper is free to do anything it wishes.

The Chairman: And do in fact some of the newspapers pay the agency commission to non-franchise agencies?

Mr. Costello: I don't know. When I say I don't know I say that I don't have specific knowledge. It has been said that newspapers do this—and Mr. Gratton does it; then the answer is yes.

Senaior Prowse: It's a way of protecting the publisher from somebody who just comes along and says "All right, I want to put an add in your paper?"

Mr. Costello: It's not on an individual newspaper but an agency might place ads all over Canada in a hundred daily newspapers and two months later not be in a financial position to pay.

The Chairman: Would it be possible for us to get a copy of this?

Mr. Costello: Yes, but you have it.

The Chairman: We have it on file do we?

Mr. Costello: Yes.

The Chairman: Could we have some indication of the changes that are being made?

Mr. Costello: They are here.

The Chairman: They are here as well?

Mr. Costello: Yes. That is why I say it is a very long document and was prepared in advance for this purpose.

The Chairman: Would you happen to know, Mr. Costello, if the other media are making comparable changes in their franchise agreements?

Mr. Costello: Radio and television?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Costello: I don't think that I have personal knowledge—we have no knowledge of that.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier. Mr. Fortier is the Committee counsel.

Mr. Yves Fortier (Committee Counsel): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if Mr. Costello could give further particulars of the disasters which he feared in the event of Government intervention so far as the press is concerned. He has alluded, rightly, to the law of libel and slander which exists at the moment, and there are also regulations under the Food and Drug Acts with respect to advertising which can only be described as Government intervention into the freedom of the press. To be more specific, what other intervention on the part of Government do you fear which would result in disaster to the newspaper industry in Canada?

Mr. Costello: Well, I think I would fear any intervention. As a personal individual I would be concerned about—and I am not speaking, and I cannot speak for the Association on this because we would have to meet and argue for a month before we could determine our position. I personally would fear a press council, whether a press council is good or bad, if that press council were originated by the Government, and if the Government had any influence in such a council—that would be my personal fear. I think that every newspaper publisher is concerned about his right and his responsibility to publish Government news or to publish political news. If the Government has any means of asserting pressure on the newspapers—for instance, if the Government becomes involved in controlling the newsprint situation—this has happened in some sections of the world but is that something that would happen in Canada? I hope not.

Senator Macdonald: It happens during wartime.

Mr. Costello: Well, it has happened in other countries during peacetime.

Senator Smith: But it happened here during wartime.

Mr. Costello: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: But these forms of intervention—this is what you fear?

Mr. Costello: Again, I would fear any pressure that could be brought to bear on a newspaper by any Government body; this is what I fear.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Costello has described his association as being an association of publishers, editors and executives. From a reading of the Association's brief I received the distinct impression that the Association was oriented or was geared toward the advertisers and in the interests of the publishers. May I ask Mr. Costello what interest, if any, his Association has in the content of editorials—in the editorial content of Canadian newspapers?

Mr. Costello: No, I don't think the Association becomes involved in the editorial content of any individual newspaper. Editors do belong to the Association.

Mr. Fortier: But in the United States, as you know, there is an organization of newspaper editors. Is there such a body in Canada to your knowledge?

Mr. Costello: There is an organization. It will appear today, the Managing Editors Conference of Canada, yes.

Mr. Fortier: These are managing editors?

Mr. Costello: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Is there—am I correct in assuming that this is not identical in make-up to the American Association of Editors?

Mr. Costello: Frankly, I don't think I am completely familiar with the American Association of Editors. I know there is an American Association of Managing Editors which is similar in some ways to our own Canadian Association. Are you telling me there is an American Association of Editors?

Mr. Auger: There is an organization known as the American Society of Newspaper Editors, ASNE, and I think they meet annually. Also, I am not sure if it is within that organization that there is a Greek letter fraternity, sort of an honorary fraternity of newspaper editors. We don't have any body exactly like that in Canada although from time to time a lot of the newspaper editors in Canada have met. I don't think there is a formalized editors' association as such.

Mr. Fortier: A question which troubles me, Mr. Chairman, in having read the brief—if I may follow up what Mr. Costello said a few minutes ago. Your Association is not concerned about the editorial quality of newspapers in Canada but who is? Which association?

Mr. Costello: No. Each individual newspaper is concerned and very much concerned and it is the responsibility of that newspaper and the publisher and the editor, and it isn't something that we can sit down, or that we would sit down and decide, "Here is the editorial approach or here is a form of editorial excellence which we should aspire to." There are fine editorial writers in Canada and fine editorial pages being produced and I think these are the standards and guidelines, but it is a responsibility of an individual newspaper.

Mr. Fortier: But not of your Association as a whole?

Mr. Costello: That is a fair statement.

The Chairman: What if one of the member papers is clearly not doing a very good job editorially and because of this it reflects for example on the pursuit of national advertising? Do you still not speak to that paper?

Mr. Costello: I think the last thing that we would be involved in is telling a newspaper as an Association that you must produce better editorials so that we could sell more national advertising.

The Chairman: Well, I don't think Mr. Costello is referring entirely to editorials. If I asked you, or the members of your executive, to say which in this country are the good papers, and which are the bad papers, and which are the mediocre papers—I am not going to do that—but I am sure you could do it. Does the C.D.N.P.A. do nothing to improve the calibre of the less satisfactory newspapers?

Mr. Costello: I think again this becomes a matter of the individual newspapers and I must say that it is my personal opinion that there have been great advances in Canada in the content—the editorial content and news content and professional production of newspapers, and new standards have been set in the last five years, or last ten years, and they have been set by the major newspapers and from my study of newspapers all down the line there has been an improvement because the standards in Canada are higher.

Senator Prowse: But what are the standards?

Mr. Costello: Is there a better way to do this? Do we police newspapers and suggest your news and editorial content is not good? Do we police this and say that you are letting the Association down? The answer to that is no we don't, but the broader answer is that the newspapers are improving and I hope there is not going to be any argument to that.

Senator Macdonald: Mr. Chairman, I noticed that one of the objects of the Charter of your Association states that you are attempting to elevate the standard newspapers being published in Canada. Does that just mean the technical standards?

Mr. Costello: No, I think that we do have our annual meetings and newspapers publishers of Canada do meet and discuss, formally and informally, the newspapers and I think we learn a great deal from each other. I am not sure what year the Charter was written but I know I wasn't there. I think that that is perhaps a broad term.

Senator Prowse: Your chief job as an association is to improve your ability to do business, isn't it?

Mr. Costello: I think that is pretty close to the rule. It is the sales and research organization and it has been involved in other things but that certainly is a strong function of C.D.N.P.A.

Senator Prowse: And you are not into the area which I imagine you would say was the publisher's business deciding what kind of paper is put out and whether they should do more or less news or something like that. That is left to the individual publisher?

Mr. Costello: Exactly.

The Chairman: Senator Macdonald, do you wish to go on with your line of questioning?

Senator Macdonald: No.

The Chairman: Senator Smith?

Senator Smith: Yes Mr. Chairman I would like to ask a question on the question of annual meetings. Are these annual meetings ever open to the press themselves to report, or the radio or television as are the manufacturers' association for example?

Mr. Costello: I think that question has been asked in print on one or two occasions. I think Senator Nichol asked that in a column not long ago. He attended in Harrison Hot Springs when there was a meeting of the directors of C.D.N.P.A. and he apparently was concerned that this to all intents and purposes was a closed meeting and he said that the publishers apparently don't believe in giving themselves very much ink. I think that is correct. It has been the background. Publishers are apparently a shy lot or believe that they don't make news. They also deal with a great many basic things such as ink and newsprint, which are not in the public interest, but I think it is nevertheless a valid question and we could, now that the point has been raised, we could consider putting on a public show and discuss newspapers in the classroom and a great many other things. One of our problems is that we are competitive—we are a competitive association and we are in very difficult trouble with radio and television, and as we are a sales organization there are certain meetings which will never be open.

One of the things we ought to do is make enough money to stay in business to pay the reporters who tell us in our newspapers that we should open our meetings.

Senator Smith: Mr. Chairman, in the first place I am sorry I don't read my colleague's column every day.

Mr. Costello: Yes, I understand he doesn't have a very large readership.

Senator Smith: I understand he does.

The Chairman: He is not a member of the committee.

Senator Smith: This thought has occurred to me and I was thinking in terms of the meetings of the Canadian Pulp and Paper Association and they seem to benefit to some extent—quite a large extent possibly—but by having the light thrown on their open meeting they are continuing to bring to the public's attention their great importance in the economic structure. It is important and it's good that the people should understand it. You have a function and it is a very important function and I would think that you would really welcome some aspects of your deliberations being exposed to all media for selfish reasons, if not for public reasons.

Mr. Costello: Well, we don't do anything for selfish reasons but I think it is a valid point—a valid point has been raised.

The Chairman: Is the annual meeting traditionally closed? Is that always true?

Mr. Costello: I think the annual meetings have in effect been closed meetings.

Senator Prowse: It's just never been open.

Mr. Costello: No one ever opened the door I suppose. What I said earlier about the re-organization of C.D.N.P.A. was started about two and a half years ago and a great many changes have been made, and everything of the past has either been examined or is under examination, and I think the point raised today has been raised once or twice earlier.

Senator Prowse: Mr. Costello, you said a moment ago that you would opposed to a press council, particularly if it was put up by the Government. Would you have any objection to a press council provided it was set up by your association, maybe in areas, by the press themselves?

Mr. Costello: I really think this is one of those questions, because there is a division in our association, that would have to be asked by individual publishers. I should emphasise that my personal reference to a press council and my concern about it is not a reflection of the views of the entire membership. That is a question which undoubtedly will come up as each individual publisher comes here.

The Chairman: I should just mention, Honourable Senators, Mr. Costello will be returning before the Committee as a publisher and we won't let you off that easily on this question at that time.

Mr. Costello: I am sure you won't.

Senator Prowse: He can do it again.

The Chairman: I think that question could be properly raised at that time.

Senator Prowse: I thought this might be a good place to start. There is another question that has been raised. Everybody talks about freedom of the press. Now, to whom does this freedom belong?

Mr. Costello: My interpretation is that it belongs to each and everyone; that is again a broad statement. I think if you want to publish a newspaper and if it is a two-sheet paper which you mimeograph, I think you have the right to do that. I think that we have a strong country as long as you have that right. As long as someone doesn't take it away from you, or as long as someone doesn't dictate that this person or this group may, and this person may not publish a newspaper, but I think it belongs to everyone in a free society.

Senator Prowse: Now, to publish a paper or to run a radio station or a television station requires very large amounts of money to be concentrated in the hands to get equipment today. Just from a practical point of view, everybody in Canada is not going to be able to publish a paper as such, or to run a television station or a radio station, so would it be correct to say that properly a person who finds himself in a position where he is publishing a paper or running a radio or television station exercises his right in trust for the society that he serves? In other words, it is not a personal right that goes to a man just because he happens to have the paper, but then he becomes a social institution and he exercises his right to publish on behalf of the public.

Mr. Costello: Well, I think that sounds very good and I think it could be argued from either side. I think I might be inclined to take either side on that one but I happen to believe that a person does have a right when he publishes and I don't think he has a right to be irresponsible. He has a right to be responsible and to publish a good paper and publish that paper in the community but I honestly believe that it's not only a few people who have this right, I think you have it and I personally do not subscribe to the old belief that it has now become financially impossible for people to establish, set up and start a newspaper. This has changed very much in recent years and I wish I could remember the number of so-called underground newspapers which were started in the United States last year. It seems to me there were four to five hundred, and perhaps ten of these, or perhaps fifty of them will come above ground. I really don't know what the term underground means, but newspapers are started as a weekly and they become dailies. My own personal feeling is that any individual has an opportunity and a right to publish.

Senator Macdonald: Mr. Chairman, there may be some confusion here in the terms. Earlier, I understood the freedom that you mentioned was just an extension of the freedom of speech—not the freedom to publish a paper, I don't think there is any doubt about that. It's what you publish in the paper, isn't that what you mean?

The Chairman: Would you put the question again, Senator, please?

Senator Macdonald: Yes. Just what do you mean by the freedom of the press? I always understood that the freedom of the press was the freedom of the press to publish news stories and things like that, which is an extension of the freedom of speech of the individual.

The Chairman: Correct.

Senator Macdonald: I take it from the discussion going on between you and Senator Prowse that you are saying that the freedom of the press is the freedom to publish a newspaper.

Senator Smith: Economically.

Senator Macdonald: I don't think there was ever any dispute, was there, that you could publish a paper and you could finance it, but it is what is in the paper that constitutes freedom of the press.

The Chairman: Well, I think you are both saying the same thing really. I think that you both agree on freedom of the press and I think the discussion between Senator Prowse and Mr. Costello was on the freedom of the individual to start publishing. I think we are all agreed that he can.

Mr. Costello: I think also there was a suggestion implied in the question that there also was a responsibility which the publisher of a newspaper assumed, perhaps on behalf of the community in which he publishes. I think that responsibility is there. I think it is recognized by—I hope by all persons or the vast majority of them.

The Chairman: Senator Macdonald?

Senator Macdonald: Just another question on the freedom of the press. I noticed in your brief, on page 3, that your Association supports the continuing efforts for freedom of the press in Canada. Do I take it from that that you claim there is no freedom of the press now?

Mr. Costello: Well, I hope there is freedom of the press in Canada. I hope there is freedom of the press and I hope it is going to be maintained. The continuing efforts for freedom of the press in Canada—we are certainly hoping we will maintain that.

Senator Macdonald: You are saying that we have that now but you want to protect it. It's not that you are trying to get freedom of the press. Is that correct?

Mr. Costello: Well, again I think you will be enlightened by some individual newspaper publishers and some members of our Association who believe that there already has been an infringement on the freedom of the press in Canada. This is not the official position of the Publishers' Association, nor of Ralph Costello.

Senator Macdonald: But it is in your brief.

Mr. Costello: What is that?

Senator Macdonald: You are saying that you support the continuing efforts...

Mr. Costello: Yes, for the freedom of the press in Canada. The phrasing may not be the greatest in the world but what it means is that we want to see the continuation of the freedom of the press in Canada, but there are individual newspaper publishers in Canada who believe that we do not now have freedom of the press in every respect. That is related to Section 12A of the Income Tax Act or 12B or something like that.

Senator Everett: Could Mr. Costello enlarge on Section 12B?

Mr. Costello: Well, about four years ago the Government of Canada enacted legislation which made it less attractive for residents of a foreign country to own and publish a newspaper in Canada, by making use of the Income Tax Act. There were publishers at that time who held that this was an infringement of freedom of the press in Canada and still maintain this position, and I think rightly that they will state their position individually during the course of these hearings.

Senator Everett: Is this the official view of the C.D.N.P.A.?

Mr. Costello: No. Certainly, there is a division and there always has been; but the C.D.N.P.A. at that time took a stand that if the Government of Canada in its wisdom wanted to protect Canadian ownership, there was a better way of doing it. If you are familiar with the background—perhaps some of you Senators are because I understand from the newspapers that you have been on a crash course—at that time the Publishers' Association asked for an opportunity to make proposals and the legislation went through before the publishers' association had an opportunity to make those proposals. There was agreement that the legislation as such was not the most desirable way of doing it, if there was any desirable way.

The Chairman: Notwithstanding that fact, you don't have a position on the legislation now?

Mr. Costello: The position—it's not an active position. The last position taken was that the Government of Canada was going to take action to preserve Canadian ownership—they should have done it some other way.

The Chairman: Does the Association have an attitude toward the Canadian ownership of the media?

Mr. Costello: No. It is a divided position.

Senator Sparrow: Does the witness have an opinion on it?

Mr. Costello: The witness is here as President of an Association which is divided and the witness will be back next Tuesday wearing his other hat.

The Chairman: I think, Senator Sparrow, that is a satisfactory answer. I think it is a fair question but I think it should be put at another time.

Senator Macdonald: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I could ask one more question. I was wondering if the witness had any views on the so-called hate literature legislation that is proposed, whether there is any infringement on the freedom of the press?

Mr. Costello: The so-called hate literature...

Senator Macdonald: I think the witness is not familiar with this piece of legislation.

The Chairman: He says he is not, Senator Macdonald.

Senator Everett: I wonder if I might ask Mr. Auger, Mr. Chairman, on page 4 of the brief, item 20, it says that the C.D.N.P.A. compiles a directory of advertising agencies. May I ask what requirements have to be fulfilled by the advertising agencies to be included in that list?

Mr. Auger: Well, I think this is just a directory of those agencies which are enfranchised from year to year to do business within the terms of the franchise which we were discussing earlier. To list the personnel within those agencies for the information of our salesmen who are calling on them from day to day, to be acquainted with people we hope to do business with.

Senator Everett: If you weren't enfranchised by the C.D.N.P.A. wouldn't it be difficult to collect your 15 per cent commission?

Mr. Auger: That would be a matter of the relationship between individual newspaper and a person who sets himself up as an enfranchised advertising agent. As Mr. Gratton said, from time to time newspapers have agreed to grant commissions to a small fellow, in their own community usually, who is eager to get into the business and doesn't have the financial resources to seek this national recognition.

Senator Everett: But if the agency is not enfranchised or—let me put it another way. If an agency is enfranchised then any newspaper will pay the 15 per cent commission, is that correct?

Mr. Auger: Yes.

The Chairman: They must pay it.

Mr. Auger: That has been the practice.

Senator Everett: They must pay it?

Mr. Auger: No, I don't think there is any coercion.

The Chairman: You don't have to pay it then?

Mr. Auger: No. Each paper is still free to do business or turn it down with anybody, agency or individual.

Senator Everett: So that it is rather important then to be included in this list?

Mr. Auger: The agency himself applies for that recognition and if he fulfills the qualifications that are laid down in the franchise he gets it.

Senator Everett: What are the qualifications?

Mr. Auger: Financial status based on the spread of business he intends to do. That is pretty broadly described in this material that has been submitted.

Senator Everett: But it's just financial status?

Mr. Auger: Yes.

Senator Everett: If I come along with a triple A1 credit rating from Dun and Bradstreet and say that I want to be an advertising agency and I write the C.D.N.P.A., I would be enfranchised as an advertising agency?

Mr. Auger: No, I think you would be asked who are your clients, what nature of business do you intend to carry out, and who do you represent as an advertising agency and so on.

Senator Everett: Let's assume I want to go into the business and I can't very well get the clients unless I can get my 15 per cent. How would I get on to the list?

Mr. Auger: Well, many people have got into the business before they got the recognition; the larger agencies that exist today started out in a small way without the recognition. One of the notable ones was the Foster Agency which is one of the largest and best known agencies in Canada today; for quite a period of time Red Foster was operating in a small way and didn't have advertising agency recognition from the newspapers.

Senator Everett: So where would his income come from?

Mr. Auger: Well, at that time it would come from his business with radio stations. He was operating virtually on radio advertising and gradually expanded into the newspaper medium.

Senator Everett: When did you decide that Mr. Foster should get into the club?

Mr. Auger: I am not sure that I was as close to the picture as I am now but I believe it was when he applied for recognition and fulfilled the basic requirements.

Senator Everett: But you say the basic requirements are only those of financial responsibility?

Mr. Costello: Mr. Chairman, there are more requirements than that. There is a five or seven page document which has been submitted to this Committee. It was requested so that the Committee would be fully back-grounded on the requirements of the franchise and I think there is another general term which applies in this case. The advertising agency is paid 15 per cent commission for performing a professional service, a professional service for the development of advertising, and doing this in a professional manner so the agency in the past has been expected to be competent to provide this service and earn a fee.

Senator Everett: You pay that fee only on nationally rated advertising, is that correct?

Mr. Costello: That is correct.

Senator Everett: Can you tell me generally what the difference is between the cost of national advertising and the cost of retail advertising?

Mr. Costello: Frankly, I am not sure—the office may know but apparently there is not a general average because each individual paper again sets its own rates.

Senator Everett: Would it be roughly 20 per cent, 25 per cent?

Mr. Costello: I think it would be—it would vary. It might be 10 per cent, it might be 20 per cent, or it might be 15.

Senator Everett: What is the justification for the difference in rates between retail advertising and national advertising?

Mr. Costello: I think again this is something that the individual newspapers will state their views on, but the position that has been taken is that a higher rate is charged because the national advertiser is reaching 100 per cent of the market which he attempts to reach. The so-called retail advertiser may reach 50 per cent, he may reach 30 per cent because of the location and his place of business, and the amount of business which he could anticipate from the advertising.

Another position taken on this is that there is this 15 per cent fee which must come from some source and it must be paid to the agency which has performed a professional service and I think that many of the newspapers have adopted the position that therefore this should be paid for the product delivered.

The Chairman: Surely a retail advertiser is interested in 100 per cent of the newspaper's coverage area?

Mr. Costello: We would be very happy if we could provide that for him and we might charge higher rates if we so did. But, if his store is located in the west side of the city and it is a large city he is not normally going to receive the same benefits from the advertising that a national advertiser who is aiming at 100 per cent of the market is going to receive. This is the position and I am not projecting it as the greatest argument in the world. It is the position of the past which has been taken by individual newspapers.

Senator Everett: This isn't a debate. We are merely trying to receive some information.

Mr. Costello: Yes.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, as you know we are the only French language newspaper in Ontario. Therefore, we go as far as Elliott Lake and further on. Well, you take the local advertiser in Ottawa—how can he write business in Elliott Lake or that far? This is the reason—because the national advertiser certainly gets his readers even in Elliott Lake. He gets them in Elliott Lake or Sudbury while in Ottawa the local merchant cannot.

Senator Everett: Then, do you differentiate between the local advertiser who wants to reach the whole market as many do—do you differentiate him from the local advertiser who doesn't or can't?

Mr. Costello: Well, if you receive them and you study them you are going to find a great variance in newspaper service. There is no set formula in this area. There is no set formula in this area for newspapers across Canada.

Senator Everett: No, but it would indicate the reason given for the difference between the national rate and local rates. That isn't the real reason because there should be a separate rate for people who want to use the whole market.

Mr. Costello: Well, that may be your interpretation.

Mr. Gilbert: Another point as well. The volume of business sort by local advertisers is like in any other business. When a chap comes to you and buys a million lines a year he is asking for a rebate in price and that is what he gets. Now, referring to your question of what about the retailer who has a feeling that he needs more of our circulation and that he profits more by it—well, in our paper we have three rates. We have the national rate, we have the retail rate, and we have another rate. We include in the retail rate the chain stores which operate different stores in the locality, for instance Steinbergs—so that we have three rates, so that we have a strong feeling that these three kinds of advertisers profit differently from the advertising put in the paper. This is a personal point of view but that is exactly what happens in our paper.

Senator Everett: I notice that many papers have a political rate. What is the justification for that?

Mr. Costello: Well, again, I don't think that many newspapers have a political rate. I think that in the past many newspapers have had a political rate but I am not familiar with what individual newspapers have done. There has been—again, this is no official position of the Association, but the position has been taken by some newspapers in the past that this is a hazardous type of advertising and therefore should be at a premium. I don't know if that is the reason other newspapers will give...

Senator McElman: Hazardous in what sense?

Mr. Costello: Hazardous in that sometimes it is difficult to find the people to pay their bills. Again, this is something from the past and is not something from the current newspaper philosophy.

Senator Everett: I wanted to ask Mr. Auger if he felt that the 15 per cent payment to advertising agencies who have been franchised by the C.D.N.P.A. is the right way to do it. Would you not feel happier if you could discontinue this method of payment?

Mr. Auger: It's been a satisfactory method of doing business over the years. Historically it started out that the advertising agent was strictly an agent of the newspaper; he bought space in the newspapers across the country and contracted to take so much space throughout the year, then he spent the year peddling it or retailing it to a number of advertisers. The gross amount of space that he used was the accumulation of smaller national advertising accounts. In some years, he was unable to sell all the space he contracted for and he operated at a loss. The 15 per cent commission was set up to give him a uniformity of income and it has worked out quite satisfactorily. I think it's worked out quite satisfactorily for both the newspapers and the advertising agencies. Of course, there have been times when the agencies have suggested that they would like to see their rate increased and I think that's been resisted successfully by the newspapers, and they would probably be happier if the rate could be reduced. The advertising agencies do perform an extremely useful service in marketing through the country and they have done this within the revenue available from the 15 per cent.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: If I may, Senator Macdonald read the first sentence in paragraph 15d of the Association's brief and I would like to read the second sentence and ask Mr. Costello a question. "The C.D.N.P.A. freedom of the press committee, in co-operation with other groups throughout the free world, continues to be a 'watchdog' on all matters involving freedom of the press."

Could Mr. Costello give us examples of situations say in the last two years where the C.D.N.P.A. freedom of the press committee has exercised this watchdog power?

Mr. Costello: Actually again, it is an information service that report to the members on areas in the world where freedom of the press apparently is suffering under some sort of censorship or Government legislation.

Mr. Fortier: But not here in Canada?

Mr. Costello: No. I don't think there has been any action. Is that correct?

Mr. Clyde H. McDonald: No, there has been no action.

Mr. Fortier: Coming back to the questions with regard to advertising, Mr. Costello, is there a C.D.N.P.A. code of advertising ethics? Does that exist?

Mr. Costello: I think the Canadian Code of advertising ethics—this Canadian advertising advisory board code to which all newspapers and magazines and advertising agencies I believe subscribe.

Mr. Fortier: But is it not put out by your Association?

Mr. Costello: No.

The Chairman: It is put out by the advertisers I understand?

Mr. Costello: No, the CAAB is supported very strongly by the newspaper publishers.

Mr. Fortier: On another subject altogether, does the C.D.N.P.A. ever lend aid of any kind to a publisher who faces strike action?

Mr. Costello: No, there is no involvement.

Mr. Fortier: You spoke of some 16 or 17 poor Thomson newspapers earlier that have not joined the Association.

The Chairman: I think there were 11. I think there were 17 papers who do not belong to the Association, 11 of which were Thomson papers.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Costello: I would not refer to them as poor Thomson newspapers.

The Chairman: No, the witness did not refer to them as being poor.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, the adjective was mine. Mr. Costello, you referred to your fee structure on page 2 where it says "Fees for newspaper membership are based on the audited circulation of the newspaper." Could you give us examples say, for a paper with a circulation of 25,000? What would be the fee for such a paper?

Mr. Costello: I think we had better refer to the fee structure.

The Chairman: The fee structure will be at hand in just a moment.

Mr. Costello: The newspaper of 25,000 circulation, the annual fees would be—we brought the files from 1872 on—for a newspaper of 25,000 circulation the annual fee would be $949.83.

Mr. Fortier: Is that a chart or scale which increases or decreases on a regular basis or does it vary substantially with circulation. Can you give us an example for a newspaper with a circulation of 50,000 please?

Mr. Costello: $1,681.47.

Mr. Fortier: Well, it's almost double? Double circulation, double fee?

Mr. Costello: Well, it's more complicated than that.

Mr. Fortier: On page 5 of your brief, item 24L you say "The C.D.N.P.A. is investigating the possibility of developing a computerized ordering and billing operation."

Is the Committee to understand that this is a central system that is envisaged?

Mr. Costello: A central system which is being explored.

Senator Prowse: Would that be for ads or for what?

Mr. Costello: Yes, advertising.

Mr. Fortier: If I may ask one last question, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Costello, you said earlier in your remarks that your association grouped publishers and editors. You will recall that in the guidelines which were sent to you a few months ago—to your Association—the Committee asked for possible representatives from both the editorial and publishing side of newspapers and other associations. Is there any reason why there are only publishers representing the Association here today?

Mr. Costello: No, but quite frankly it was my opinion and I think the opinion would be shared by, I hope by almost everyone, that those guidelines were set up for individual newspapers and C.D.N.P.A. did not interpret them as being specific guidelines for the Association. Now, as to the availability of an editor, if you want to consider me an editor you may do so.

Mr. Fortier: What percentage of editors and publishers are there in your association?

Mr. Costello: The editors are not a large portion of the Association.

Senator McElman: Mr. Chairman, although I understand that there aren't any real policy decisions reached at the annual meetings of the C.D.N.P.A. there surely would be discussions. As an example, if a discussion led the Association members to believe that there was real danger to Canadian unity, would there be a consensus reached and perhaps not a recommendation but a suggestion go forth to members that perhaps they had a responsibility to assist in enhancing Canadian unity?

Mr. Costello: Is that something that the newspapers of Canada and this Association might discuss and might come to some conclusions at an annual meeting? I frankly doubt it very much. I think those discussions would take place informally among the publishers, perhaps at the time of the annual meeting. I do not see that type of discussion evolving. Again, if Canada is faced with this type of problem, I can't predict what is going to take place at the next annual meeting. I don't think it's been a prime function of the C.D.N.P.A.

Senator McElman: I was wondering if there was encouragement on occasions in matters of real national interest, encouragement of member papers to move in a given direction?

Mr. Costello: No.

Senator McElman: The other question I would like to ask, Mr. Chairman, is on the discussion that I think is current in the whole of North America with respect to the press, and it's on the principle of access. Perhaps it is more relevant in the United States currently than it is here. If one side of a given burning public question is widely aired, and so far in the States this has been given more emphasis for broadcast, what is the right of access to those who are proponents of the other side of the question? Is this a matter that has been discussed thus far?

Mr. Costello: I think again it's a matter of individual newspapers. I think the record in Canada is extremely good and this access to rebuttal or dissent is there. It is available and it is encouraged and it is encouraged by, I think, every group or every newspaper in Canada, but certainly the vast majority of them.

Senator McElman: Encouraged in what way?

Mr. Costello: In any way. If for instance there is something in our own province and you did not for some reason agree with the newspapers, I think you would be encouraged to submit a letter to the editor and we would be delighted to publish it.

Senator McElman: But are there other avenues than letters to the editors?

Mr. Costello: Of course there are because we as a newspaper, and newspapers all over North America, and very much in Canada, do explore both sides and do search out both sides of every issue.

Senator Prowse: This is not a concern of your organization?

Mr. Costello: No, but it's a great concern of the people who make the Association.

The Chairman: I would like to ask Mr. Costello a question if I might. You referred earlier to the underground press and you rather amazed me by the fact that you didn't know what the underground press was. You said there were three or four hundred underground papers in the United States. I am sure you know that there are a number of underground newspapers in Canada, and I would like to ask you why you think these underground papers are being published and why they have started?

Mr. Costello: Well, I think I should clarify my original remarks and perhaps it was one of those facetious remarks...

The Chairman: Well, I don't mean that it was.

Mr. Costello: No, no, but I mean that it did not come off or they do not come off when I make them. I don't know whether these newspapers are published literally underground, or where they are published but I am familiar with them and I think in a free society there is this opportunity to publish, and if the so-called underground newspaper can publish and stay out of jail related to the laws of libel, well and good. Why have they emerged? Again, as a personal opinion there is a great vocal uprising of the youth of our country and of North America and there is a great dissenting voice and this is an expression of opinion from these people. I think they are entitled to make it

The Chairman: Well, shouldn't that dissent be reflected in the newspapers?

Mr. Costello: Well, I think perhaps you are familiar with some of the underground newspapers and some of the articles which appear. No, we have no place for their terms and their phrasing and their language in the press of Canada, or North America as we know it. Do you mean is the press of Canada or North America somehow failing so there has to be this other expression of opinion? I wouldn't consider it a failure. As I said, I think they are entitled to do this, to publish their own newspaper.

The Chairman: Well, in the course of the Committee's preparation a number of us have read the underground press quite extensively and I certainly take your point that there are articles that would be difficult to reprint or to publish in a "family newspaper." On the other hand I think it is quite misleading if we allow ourselves to believe that the underground press consists mainly of obscenities, news about drugs. I think there are many other meaningful articles as well.

Mr. Costello: Correct.

The Chairman: Well, is it not possible that there is an area of dissent to which the press of Canada is not paying sufficient attention?

Mr. Costello: Well, I think if this is the case then the underground press becomes a part of the press of Canada.

The Chairman: Well, has that happened?

Mr. Costello: I don't think it's happened as yet. I think in some areas the underground press so called may be making a contribution to the press, or eventually it may be making a contribution.

The Chairman: Do you think it will ever be a commercial threat to the daily newspapers?

Mr. Costello: I don't know, I haven't the slightest idea. I would have no objection if it were. It would have to be performing a needed service presumably.

The Chairman: But you don't think it is?

Mr. Costello: I didn't say that but I think that this would—if it is performing a needed service its possibilities as a commercial operation would become much greater. If there is a more responsible and less responsible so called underground press, presumably the more responsible underground press will come above ground and become part of the press of the future. If that happens, then it will be performing a service and that would be fine.

Senator Sparrow: Does your Association foresee any danger of the ownership and control of the press falling into fewer hands than it is at the moment?

Mr. Costello: Well, the Association, Senators, is made up of individual newspaper owners and group owners and as such it is not in a very good position to take a stand, or has not taken any united stand about group ownership or the hazards of group ownership—if there are hazards.

Senator Prowse: You are not likely to get unanimous opinion about it?

Mr. Costello: Not overwhelming, no.

The Chairman: May I ask Mr. McDonald a question. Mr. McDonald, to my own knowledge, is perhaps in all of Canada one of the most expert people when it comes to audience measurement. He has had a solid background in measuring radio audiences and television audiences and now he is measuring newspaper readership. I am wondering if I might ask him therefore to compare the techniques used in measuring readership, particularly as they relate to selling advertising, as compared to the measurements used for measuring radio and television audiences. For example, some of the Senators for the first time saw circulation figures applied to radio and television, so in asking the question, Mr. McDonald, we are particularly interested today in newspapers. You shouldn't feel that you should confine your answer but I would like you to contrast it to radio and television?

Mr. McDonald: Senator Davey, before I answer that perhaps I could express what the prime function of measurement has to be; you can liken it, I think, to an automobile manufacturer, or a food manufacturer who is attempting to display the value of his product to his potential purchasers.

In this case, the programme of research which the C.D.N.P.A. carries out is simply that; to attempt to bring to the fore and show the advertiser how the daily newspaper will benefit him in his search for customers to move his products.

Now, as to the methods of audience measurement, it is almost impossible to compare them. This is because we are measuring totally different entities. On the one hand you are measuring the print medium, and on the other hand you are measuring something that goes in the flow of time. The concepts are quite different although we may use the same word. We use the term "flow" and frequency of observation and these are quite different terms. I fully believe that eventually the measurement of the audience of the media will become quite secondary to the measurement of its effectiveness in terms of communication of a message. Broadcast audience measurement techniques are fundamentally the same, meaning that they simply infer the contact of a respondent who supplies the researcher with certain information.

The degrees of validity of these techniques are simply almost unestablishable as there is no way of establishing finally whether one technique is better than another. The only thing you can do really is assess the degree of difficulty for the respondent to reply to questioning and in print I would maintain that there is less onus on the respondent to respond, to give an accurate reflection of his habits, as opposed to broadcasting. I wouldn't want to criticize broadcasting techniques. I think that perhaps in doing that I would tend to criticize all market research.

Senator Smith: Coming back to the subject which has been given quite a bit of attention here, and I think that Mr. Costello will recognize that we regard it just as importantly as he does, and that is freedom of the press. Could I assume that your answer to a question from one of my colleagues here regarding the policy of the Association on editorials with regard to subjects which might tend to break up the country rather than to foster national unity is based on the concept of freedom of the press? You answered that you had no policy. I am thinking in terms of—and this is the very remote possibility—perhaps some day the Vancouver Province might say to themselves, let's separate from Canada and join the west. There has been some threat of that kind done half jokingly and I think with some serious thoughts in the minds of a few people—but I suppose it is because, or am I right in assuming that it is because of the basic freedom of the press that you could not, as an Association, criticize the publisher of a newspaper for advocating separatism?

Mr. Costello: We could not and we would not. If we started to have a central organization who decides what is going to take place, then there is the danger you are referring to. No, this is not the function of the Association.

The Chairman: Perhaps the publisher of the Vancouver Province would like to answer you?

Senator Smith: Oh, I was just being facetious.

Mr. Auger: Well, Senator, you are wrong. BC would not join the United States, we would ask the United States to join us. I am sorry that there is no representation on your Committee from British Columbia who could speak as warmly of my newspaper as the Honourable Senator Smith has been able to speak of Mr. Costello's. But be that as it may I would just underline again that the greatest area in which controversy or conversation, or discussion goes on between newspapers is not within the context of this Association, but within the context of our own editorial columns. We read these quite avidly, each of the other. Most of us circulate our editorial pages to a large number of newspapers across the country and we read the others as eagerly and with as much interest as we do our own. I think that is the area where something like you describe is given a fair discussion in the realm of newspaper editing.

The Chairman: There are members on the Committee, Mr. Auger, who can speak glowingly of the papers, but I can speak glowingly of you. I know you have sold advertising for Senator Everett and I think the worst mistake you ever made was in 1946 when you hired me. Is that not correct?

Mr. Auger: Yes.

Senator Smith: There has been some evidence, and I think it's come out over some years, of influence in the programming for broadcasting both in Canada and in the United States. I think it is pretty well understood—I don't know whether this is something that can be proven, but one of the points is that the CBC hesitated over the timing of a certain broadcast because at the same time the question of auto safety was making the headlines. We all know that a large amount of revenue for example comes from the automobile industry and therefore those of us who are innocent would guess that there was advertiser influence in the background, perhaps even unspoken. Are you conscious of advertiser influence in the operation of daily newspapers in this country? This is in regard to the editorial content?

Mr. Costello: As an individual publisher, no, and I think the answer will be the same from every individual newspaper publisher that sits here.

Senator Smith: What brought this to my mind in the course of reading a great deal on a lot of subjects, was a quote which I ran across in, I think, the Globe and Mail. This was a quote from the former president of the T. Eaton Company who, when questioned as to whether a big advertiser influenced the content of a newspaper replied, "Why not?"

Mr. Costello: What former president and what year did he say it?

Senator Smith: John David Eaton.

Mr. Costello: What year was that quote made?

Senator Smith: Well, it was John David Eaton and I just don't have the year.

Mr. Costello: Well, I think the year would be very important there—it might have been made back in the 1920's.

The Chairman: No, it was just a recent quote.

Senator Smith: I think it is quite a commentary that the CBC should be strongly suspect of letting those who advertise influence the programming, perhaps rather in an innocuous manner in delaying a programme.

Mr. Costello: I must come to the CBC hearing.

The Chairman: Well, the CBC will be at a hearing in the Spring and we would welcome you back.

Senator Everett: This freedom of the press committee, did it take any stand on Section 12B of the Income Tax Act?

Mr. Costello: The Association as a whole made representations to the Government at that time and the representation—and this is from memory, but I am sure it is correct—was that if the Government insisted on proceeding, it should not proceed on the terms of the Income tax Act. There were meetings with the Prime Minister and others at that time and those who were in the meeting left the meeting with the understanding that the C.D.N.P.A. would have an opportunity to make some type of a counter proposal and I believe the Prime Minister at that time said "We believe very strongly in this but if there is a better way, tell us." The delegates from the C.D.N.P.A. left the meeting with the understanding in their own minds that they would have an opportunity to meet and discuss the proposal, and to come back with some other suggestions which would achieve the same purpose—that is the protection of Canadian ownership that the Government was determined to go ahead with. That was the stand taken by the Association as a whole.

Senator Everett: So the Association didn't view restrictions on ownership as restrictions on the freedom of the press. They disagreed with the method the Government proposed to employ?

Mr. Costello: Yes, they agreed to disagree on this point but within the Association there were individual members, and I think the Association was quite split, members who felt that at any cost the newspapers of Canada should be owned by Canadians and those who believed just as strongly at any cost, that anyone should be able to come to Canada and without restrictions publish a daily newspaper.

Senator Everett: I wonder if we might assume something for a moment. Suppose the Government decided that the position of newspapers in most communities was one of fair dominance and that there was a very minimal restriction on the rates that newspapers could charge for advertising and circulation. Suppose the Government said, We are going to view these newspapers, for financial reasons only, as a utility, and we are going to require newspaper publishers to appear before a utility board to justify their rates. Now, this board in no way would interfere in editorial content and in editorial terms the freedom of the press would be completely preserved. Would you tell me the view of your Association?

Mr. Costello: Well, I can give you my own view; I can't give you the view of the Association because the Association would never expect that any Government would do this, nor would I. I think that there would be pressure available through the Government and I think that the editorial freedom of that newspaper would be affected, and would be affected very seriously. I think that the place where the determination of advertising rates should take place is in the marketplace. If the newspaper is not performing its function then another newspaper is going to come in. That is my view and I don't subscribe to the position that it is impossible for a newspaper to be established in any community, that the newspaper in that community is irresponsible or taking advantage of the position of monopoly.

Senator Everett: Let's assume for the moment that in the compiling of this block of advertising agencies who are entitled to be recognized under your franchise, one of these advertising agencies that would be excluded, complains to the Department of Consumer Affairs. Just suppose that the Department of Consumer Affairs says that this was a conspiracy to exclude somebody from doing business. What would be the attitude of the Association under those circumstances?

Mr. Costello: I think that would be the responsibility of the newspaper so accused. If there was a conspiracy, I think that the laws are there to deal with it.

Senator Everett: Well, if the laws were to prevent the newspapers of Canada from coming together under an association to decide who is and who is not an advertising agency, are you saying that you wouldn't then be opposed to such a law?

Mr. Costello: Your original assumption was that of an individual newspaper?

Senator Everett: No, no. What I was assuming was that—as I understand it the Association compiles a list of recognized advertisers?

Mr. Costello: Right.

Senator Everett: By its very nature it must exclude certain people who in their own mind view themselves as advertising agencies.

Mr. Costello: Yes.

Senator Everett: If this were viewed by the law as a conspiracy—in other words the Association were prevented from doing this—what would your view be? Would that be any restriction of the press?

Mr. Costello: Well, not if a conspiracy exists under the law. Again, this is a personal answer to an assumption you are making but if you are saying could newspapers be permitted to conspire, if that is the question, no one should be permitted to conspire. Of course, our position is that there is no such conspiracy.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Costello, at the time of the debate on Section 12a of the Income Tax Act you said you were asked by the Prime Minister of the day, or the Finance Minister of the day, for some alternative suggestions to the tax on advertising. Have you had a chance to consider alternative suggestions?

Mr. Costello: Actually, there was no immediate alternative suggestion available and the C.D.N.P.A. did not believe that there was any simple alternative proposal, but there were last minute meetings and at the final meeting with the Prime Minister, and I believe the Honourable Paul Martin, the delegation from the C.D.N.P.A. left under the understanding that there would be time to explore the possibility of some other proposal and come back to the Government. I think it was within two or three days the legislation was introduced and went through the House quickly. The background on that was that the Association considered for some time whether it should pursue this matter and has not done so.

Mr. Fortier: So, would it be a fair question for me to ask whether you have as an Association alternative suggestions today?

Mr. Costello: No, none has been brought forth.

The Chairman: We expect to have Mr. Pearson as a witness before our Committee in the Spring so we will ask him why he didn't follow through on his promise.

Mr. Costello: Well, I think we had better be very clear on the statement made by the witness. The statement was that the delegation left a meeting under the impression that there would be this opportunity.

Senator McElman: Coming back to Senator Smith's question on the matter of influence of advertisers, there have been rather extensive studies in the Congress of the United States on the strength of the auto manufacturers' lobbies and safety and so on, and in the course of those hearings it has been revealed not only that this massive and strong lobby is effective with some elements of the media (not restricted to print media in any sense) but also upon some members of Congress. Do you feel that this question has begun to gain some prominence in Canada? Do you feel as an Association thus far that there has been no effect of such a lobby if it exists, and that the member papers of your Association have some inner strength which will prevent any similar effect here in Canada?

Mr. Costello: Well, I think personally that the greatest problem of the lobby is the problem of the Government. I don't see a problem for newspapers. I think that individually, yes, if there is any such lobby for any group of advertisers it would be resisted and rejected.

Senator McElman: And you have seen no evidence, as yet, within Canada?

Mr. Costello: No.

Senator McElman: The second point I wish to come back to, Mr. Chairman, is that of the press council, or equivalent body. Mr. Costello commented quite strongly that he was against such a council if there should be some Government input into such a council. There are councils in existence and have been in existence in some other countries, notably in Great Britain, without any Government input. Would you have the same objection to a council which is self-policing, such as the Canadian Medical Association which supposedly polices itself? Would you have similar objections to your own press council without any Government person associated with it, or influencing it in any fashion?

Mr. Costello: Well, there are very strong feelings on both sides. The Association has not taken a position but I think that a good number of the individual publishers will wish to speak on that subject and there is no way that the Association could go on record or imply...

Senator McElman: You were speaking as an individual?

Mr. Costello: Well, I was speaking as an individual but I hope I am speaking for the vast number of publishers and I say that there would be great concern if Government became involved in any way with the press council.

Senator Macdonald: Earlier this morning the witness mentioned the term professionalism. I am just wondering what you mean by that term professionalism?

Mr. Costello: Well, Senator, I am not sure about the newspapers which you read but the newspapers I read...

Senator Macdonald: I read the Cape Breton Post and the Halifax Chronicle Herald.

Mr. Costello: If I could say it without embarrassing some of my Maritime friends I would advise you to try some others. The press of Canada has in the last five or ten or fifteen years developed, I believe tremendously. There are more qualified people and the leading metropolitan newspapers, I believe, are so good that they are doing a job in in-depth reporting that magazines used to do and doing it more timely, more effectively. The recent elections in Ontario I think were given great depth of reporting by the major newspapers on a scale that would not have happened just a few years ago. Throughout the industry there have been these improvements which I just assume that everyone is aware of and everyone has recognized.

Senator Macdonald: That is a better, more qualified staff?

Mr. Costello: Yes, and more dedicated publishers who are more concerned about their home communities and their provinces and the country.

Senator Macdonald: Yes, I would agree with that statement. I notice on page 5 of your brief you mentioned that the Association also maintains close cooperation with schools, universities, civic groups and other organizations interested in knowing about the role of newspapers and a free press in a free society. I am wondering what method do you use, for example, to improve schools and universities and what methods your Association uses?

Mr. Costello: Well, I think the strongest method is the involvement of the newspapers of Canada and the C.D.N.P.A. in promoting the newspaper in the classroom programme which has been growing in recent years. I think we have figures about the number of teachers who attended these programmes but they are now being taught to go back and set up regional programmes within their own community and within their own schools with short term and long range objectives. The objectives are to have more people reading newspapers and it is our belief that they will be better informed and we will have a better country because of it.

Senator Macdonald: Using this as a teaching aid?

Mr. Costello: Yes.

The Chairman: Mr. Costello, a moment ago in answering Senator Macdonald, you referred to the recent Ontario elections; I assume you meant the municipal elections in Toronto?

Mr. Costello: Yes.

The Chairman: I will put this question to you if I might. I was going to put it to the publishers of the Toronto papers when they come but let me put it to you. First of all I agree with you. I think that the background coverage of the municipal elections in Toronto given by the three Toronto daily papers was the most extensive that I could ever recall. However, in fact two per cent fewer people voted than voted three years ago and less than a third of the eligible voters cast their votes. I agree that this is a problem for politicians but isn't it also a problem for the press? Is there anything that the newspapers can do about this?

Mr. Costello: I don't know. I think the people promoting candidates have to get a better calibre of candidate out if they are going to improve. I hope I am permitted to use the short needle around here occasionally.

The Chairman: I will reply by using a long needle. A columnist in the Telegram, Dennis Braithwaite, lamenting about this low voter turnout, talked about this newspaper coverage and said it was very extensive but until the politicians start to use television effectively there won't be a good voter turnout. Would you care to comment on that?

Mr. Costello: Well, this is another indication of the growth of the press in Canada. That a columnist can write and express his own views...

The Chairman: All right, I take that point but let's come back to the other point. Can newspapers not do anything about getting more people out to vote? Must it be left to television?

Mr. Costello: No, I don't think that it must be left to television. I don't think that Mr. Braithwaite is necessarily right in his assumption.

The Chairman: Would you agree with this statement. I agree with you on the coverage given by the Toronto papers and I also note, as I say, there was a lamentably low voter turn out, and I agree quite seriously that it is an enormous problem for politicians. Isn't it also an enormous problem for newspapers?

Mr. Costello: It probably is and I think in this case the Toronto newspapers were attempting to face up to that problem and face up to it more professionally and better than they ever have in the past, but if the newspapers did not bring out the voters, then are the newspapers to blame for doing a much better job than they have ever done in the past? I don't know.

The Chairman: Neither do I.

Mr. Costello: Well, I haven't got that crystal ball.

Senator McElman: We have had some representations from the broadcast area but they are having extreme difficulty in getting professionally trained people. Do you find that the universities are producing for the print medium a high calibre of journalist and is the supply sufficient?

Mr. Costello: I think that a higher calibre of journalist is being produced all across Canada but I don't think the supply is sufficient. I don't think the newspapers across Canada by and large get as many potentially great journalists as they would like to have, but the problem is still there and I think most newspapers have greatly expanded staffs and I think almost at every level there is the problem of trying to find the person to do the job to satisfy the publisher, and to satisfy the public. The problem is still there, I believe.

Senator McElman: Is the Publishers Association doing anything in concert with the universities to increase either the quality or the quantity?

Mr. Costello: Again, as I suggested in my remarks there is a great deal of encouragement and financial support from individual newspapers in the nature of scholarships and in support of schools of journalism in Canada, and in the United States in an effort to produce better journalists. I don't think we have the figures but a great deal of money goes into such programmes from individual newspapers, and this is not duplicated by the C.D.N.P.A.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Chairman, I was interested in what Mr. Costello said about promotion earlier in answer to a question from Senator Macdonald. What proportion of your budget is devoted to research and promotion?

Mr. Costello: Research and promotion within C.D.N.P.A.?

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Costello: Ten percent for research and promotion. I think you were referring to sales?

Mr. Fortier: I was referring to promotion as defined in paragraph 25M of your brief.

Mr. Costello: Are you talking about newspaper-in-the-classroom programmes?

Mr. Fortier: No, industry wide promotion.

The Chairman: You mean advertising sales promotion?

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

The Chairman: I think, gentlemen, he is referring generally to research and promotion into the advertising agencies.

Mr. Costello: About sixty percent.

Mr. Fortier: Did I hear the figure of 10 percent on research? Let's take them individually, it might be easier for us to follow the answer. It would be 10 percent on research?

Mr. Costello: Yes. On pure research.

Mr. Fortier: On promotion of advertising for the benefit of the members of the Association some 50 percent?

Mr. Costello: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: And may I ask what were your total expenditure in 1968?

Mr. Costello: In the area of $400,000.

The Chairman: I assume, Honourable Senators, you have no other questions and I have only one other question. Mr. Costello, I would like to ask you about the role and function of the committee on public relations and public service. It is said that the C.D.N.P.A. assists in cooperation with various public service projects. Files are kept on member public relations and public service projects and information and assistance to member newspapers. What does that refer to?

Mr. Costello: Where is that?

The Chairman: I am sorry, it is on the top of page 6. It says the C.D.N.P.A. assists and cooperates with various public service projects. Files are kept on members' public relations and public service projects and information and assistance provided to member newspapers. What does that particular committee do?

Mr. Costello: Well, this is in the internal part of the answer, part of the public relations programme. It is just an exchange of information among the newspapers which might indicate to a newspaper in Calgary how the newspaper in St. John's participates in some community projects which would be of assistance to the community and might be followed up.

The Chairman: Could I ask you, Mr. Costello, how you would define public relations?

Mr. Costello: I think my definition would probably come very close to public service. I think this is the best public relations which can be provided by a newspaper.

The Chairman: Does the C.D.N.P.A. have a public relations programme of its own?

Mr. Costello: We have a public relations committee and a public relations programme which at the moment—I will be corrected if I am not right in this—is very much involved providing the exchange of information among newspapers and newspapers in the classroom—yes, it does come under the public relations committee for that.

The Chairman: Would it be fair to say that the C.D.N.P.A. public relations subcommittee substantially exchanges public service promotion and publicity ideas—it's a clearing house for public relations ideas or public service ideas as between the papers but that the C.D.N.P.A. itself has no public relations programme?

Mr. Costello: It certainly does not have any extensive public relations programme.

Mr. Auger: The C.D.N.P.A. as an Association has never attempted to establish a public image of itself for the public at large.

The Chairman: Do you think maybe it has established a public image of itself notwithstanding that fact?

Mr. Auger: Today, you mean?

The Chairman: No, prior to today?

Mr. Auger: No, I don't think so. I don't think that generally the public across Canada is aware of the Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association.

The Chairman: Do you think they should be?

Mr. Auger: No.

Mr. Costello: No.

The Chairman: No?

Mr. Costello: Well, I think the greatest strength is that the newspaper will do its own public service and public relations.

The Chairman: Well, if there are no further questions, and I am not intending to follow this procedure with all of our witnesses, is there anything you would like to say in closing?

Mr. Costello: Well, I move we adjourn.

The Chairman: I would like on behalf of the Committee to thank Messrs. Costello, Auger, Gratton, McDonald, Gilbert and Hunter. The committee is adjourned.

Senators, we are meeting at 2.30 in this room to hear a brief from the American Newspaper Guild.

Thank you very much.

The committee adjourned.

(Upon resuming at 2.30 p.m.)

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, we might call the meeting to order. This afternoon we are going to hear from the representatives of the American Newspaper Guild.

Sitting on my immediate right is Mr. Glen Ogilvie, who is the American Guild Vice President for Canada. Mr. Ogilvie has worked on the editorial staff of the Toronto Star for 44 years where he still is a Copy Editor.

He is going to be joined on my immediate left in a moment or two by Mr. Robert J. Rupert, who was the Assistant City Editor of the Ottawa Citizen until 1961 when he joined the Guild as an International Representative. I understand he is on his way and should be arriving shortly. I will not introduce him when he arrives.

The third representative from the Guild is Mr. Gilles Desjarlais, who is with the CBC French News Service in Toronto and is a past President, I gather, of the American Newspaper Guild Local in the CBC. That is the chair at the end of the table.

Mr. Ogilvie, we have received the brief which you were kind enough to prepare in compliance with our request and send in some three weeks in advance. That has been circulated to the Senators on the Committee. Therefore, I think for the purposes of our discussion this afternoon, we can take the brief as read.

I would now give you an opportunity of speaking for 15 minutes if you wish. I will notify you about the 10-minute mark. You may like to summarize your brief, expand upon it, explain it, or indeed say anything else. Then, following the 15 minutes, all of which you may or may not use, we will have a period of questioning from the Senators who will question you on things you say, things you have not said, and things that are in or not in your brief.

Mr. Glen Ogilvie: American Newspaper Guild (Vice President for Canada): Thank you, Senator Davey. Thank you to the full committee on behalf of the American Newspaper Guild—especially the Canadian members—for this opportunity to participate in this series of hearings on the News Media of Canada.

If I may have your indulgence, there are two things I would like to say before I begin any summary of my brief. First is a correction to Paragraph 14 on Page 4 to rectify an inadvertent error in a reference to Canadian Broadcasting Corporation newsmen, beginning with the last two words in the second line on Page 4 which should read "Guild contracts also currently cover Canadian Broadcasting Corporation newsmen, French and English, outside the Province of Quebec" and so forth.

Senator Prowse: I am sorry. What paragraph was that?

Mr. Ogilvie: Paragraph 12 at the top of Page 4 at the end of the second line.

The Chairman: Do you want to read it again?

Mr. Ogilvie: "Guild contracts also currently cover Canadian Broadcasting Corporation newsmen, French and English, outside the Province of Quebec", and then so on.

Mr. Fortier: I am afraid we did not get it at the end.

Mr. Ogilvie: "Guild contracts also currently cover Canadian Broadcasting Corporation newsmen, French and English, outside the Province of Quebec." That is the extent of the change.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you.

Mr. Ogilvie: Secondly, I should like to express my regret and that of the Guild that at this public hearing concerning the mass media and the freedom of the press, all members of the news media are not given equal opportunity to report the proceedings. I know that our members who are broadcast journalists are barred from attending with the tools of the profession, the camera and the taperecorder. They are reporters of ideas with pencils and pads. They have to cover these proceedings by securing interviews and reports suitable for the media in hallways and corridors.

I also should like to express my regret at the lack of translation facilities. The Guild was prepared to present a part of its summary in French, but that seems to be impossible this afternoon.

The American Newspaper Guild is an international industrial union composed primarily of white-collar employees of the newspapers, news magazines, wire and news services broadcasting into Canada, the United States, and Puerto Rico.

Our members include reporters, copy editors, etcetera—men and women often considered to be professionals. Canadian newspapers employing our members under contractually stipulated minimum terms and conditions account for about 40 percent of the nation's daily newspaper circulation.

At this point we should like to up-date the catalogue of concerns for which the Guild holds certification as an employees bargaining agent. This appears at Paragraph 12 of our brief. We were certified in mid-November for the production assistants at CJOH-TV here in Ottawa. A petition for representation of CJOH-TV news employees is pending and, in fact, is under way.

A high portion of the Guild membership is made up of persons often considered to be professionals. The Guild was in fact founded by professional newsmen. In its earliest years, it restricted its membership to reporters, photographers, etcetera.

Most of the official and unofficial leadership of the Guild continues to come from the ranks of its professional members. We are classified by many as a professional union, which some consider an anomaly for it is certainly a popular prejudice that professionals cannot or should not be organized.

We submit, however, that we cite others more prominent than ourselves in our brief who agree that the degree of professionalism enjoyed by working newsmen today is a direct result of their organization. It took a union, the Guild, to achieve the degree of economic security that exists for employees in our jurisdiction today. It takes economic security to free a man to work in a professional manner in any field. Where there is a Guild contract, newspaper careers have become possible.

The Guild suggests that editorial excellence, the constant honesty of news, and higher standards of journalism to which we pledge ourselves in the Guild, continue only where a competent, well-paid staff is maintained. We submit the best paid newspaper employees in Canada work in cities where there are Guild contracts.

We suggest that one way the Government might contribute to a better press performance is to put more teeth into and improve the enforcement of existing legislation protecting the workers' right to organize for collective bargaining. We submit that any publisher faced with the threat of organization may feel free to tamper with his employees' rights because he knows he need fear little more than a little rap on the knuckles under the law if he is adjudged guilty, often months later. By that time, his improper action in many cases will have cooled the ardor of his employees for self help through collective bargaining.

Before we begin to sound as though we are suggesting that press performance automatically would merit an A-plus rating if all were working under Guild contracts, we should like to point to the phrase "so far as is possible" in the Guild Constitutional Statement of Purpose. The phrase is important for in the final analysis, it is the publisher who determines how good or how honest a newspaper shall be. Many readers frequently overlook this fact. Then they give what we consider to be unfair criticism of the work done by the newspapermen—Guild members, or non-Guild members.

For instance, the criticism may be "unsophisticated and occasionally inaccurate reporting of complex and specialized subjects." This criticism is unfair to journalists who are not allowed sufficient time to research a subject or enough time on a beat to develop a thorough and sensitive understanding.

The situation is improving in some major newspapers. But too many affluent papers still are operating with skeleton staffs and demanding impossible interpretative, in-depth reporting jobs of junior and over-worked personnel. The executive who makes this sort of demand, without allowing reasonable time for research, is an obstacle to communication and an enemy to the profession.

Too often, however, the reporter is blamed. Our society is becoming increasingly complex. While the day of the all-around reporter has not passed, this is more and more the era of the expert. We should like to see publishers provide for more serious coverage of the fields that demand experts: Science, education, art, housing, medicine, social services, for example.

The police reporter ought to be given the opportunity to explain the causes, rather than simply the occurrence, of a crime.

Labour is big news—and not just when there is a strike. Yet in how many papers is it sensitively reported by even one full-time specialist? It often takes the unpleasantness of a strike to interest the press. The most important information often is what led to a strike, not the fact that it happened. Yet a reporter given an hour or two to develop a Labour story can hardly be expected to provide an analytical insight to the readers.

Today's reporter certainly is better educated and better qualified to meet the challenges of his profession than ever before—if he is given the chance. If today's journalists are to function up to their capabilities, however, the press editors will have to provide new budgets, generous ones, to allow for it. A few do; all should.

In the years the Guild has been functioning in Canada and the United States, we have watched parallel development in the two nations—the acquisition by fewer and fewer, and more and more dominance of the dominant newspapers and other means for dissemination of information to the public.

We have devoted a portion of our brief to the pattern of daily newspaper ownership. We are confident that the Committee's own research in this area provides a comprehensive study of the ownership of dailies, as well as weeklies, magazines, broadcast stations, cable television, and holdings of publishers and broadcasters in other industries, as well as cross ownership ties like that between Southam and FP in Vancouver or that recently severed between Lord Thomson and the Toronto Star in the suburban Toronto Home Newspapers Limited. We are only sorry that we will have to wait until after the hearings are ended before this research is published.

The trend to fewer owning more is disturbing us, as we noted in our brief, because it places too large a segment of the public information media in too few hands. It also gives fewer people even greater economic power over the workers employed in the news industry.

The use of this power was demonstrated, we believe, in Peterborough a year ago when the Guild strike against the Peterborough Examiner of Lord Thomson was broken and the strikers' legitimate needs were left unfulfilled.

The Committee asks, in its guidelines for briefs, for comment on the possibility of requiring semi-annual publication of the principal owners and the names of executives of newspapers, as is mandatory in the United States. We would endorse such a proposal if it were properly drawn. We would suggest that it also would require publication of the holdings and offices that the principals and executives might have in other enterprises.

Mr. Fortier: Pardon me, Mr. President. Could this gentleman speak a little louder.

The Chairman: Yes, please, Mr. Ogilvie. Thank you.

Mr. Ogilvie: I am very sorry.

Such a requirement might at least help alert readers to the possibility that policies might be somewhat influenced by a philosophy of what is good for K. C. Irving is good for New Brunswick.

Again I thank you for your invitation to appear here. I will attempt to answer questions you may have, but before the questions, there still are a couple of matters I would like to bring to your attention.

The Guild is vitally concerned with the right of reporters to protect their sources of information. Reporters need and must have this legal right. Just as doctors and lawyers are allowed to police their own professions, so should journalists be allowed to police their own profession.

I submit that journalists are just as responsible and capable a professional group and should have this right.

The Guild also maintains the right of its professional members to become involved in politics, just as any citizen including members of other professions. The tendency by news management to frown on this is a violation of the newspaperman's basic rights. Just as doctors and lawyers are free to do this, so should a journalist be free. No matter what media he works with, a true journalist is a professional and won't let his fairness be influenced by such activities.

Gentlemen, thank you.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Ogilvie.

Senator Prowse.

Senator Prowse: I have a number of questions.

I think perhaps we might start, Mr. Ogilvie, with the question of the right of a reporter to protect his informational sources—his sources of information. You referred to doctors and lawyers.

Are you aware that at the present time, doctors do not have the right to refuse to answer questions in court on the basis that they have a confidentiality with their client or their patient?

Mr. Ogilvie: Without attempting to mislead, I think it is the impression of the average layman that they do. How far their rights go in law, I cannot say. It may well be that they do not have this right, but in the same context, there have been occasions—somewhat inconclusive—when reporters have been called into court. We think that in the interest of access to information and procuring information that the public should have, we should have the right to protect sources who could be subject to retaliation somewhere along the line.

Senator Prowse: Would you say this is a greater right than would exist for a priest in the confessional or would it begin to approach it?

Mr. Ogilvie: Hopefully and personally, I would like to see it approach it.

Senator Prowse: The fact is that a priest in the confessional has no privilege so far as the law in Canada is concerned today. Did you know that?

But from a practical point of view, no priest is going to break his own personal oath and the court would be faced with the necessity of then dealing with him in contempt. The same applies to doctors.

The only person who has any privilege at all is a lawyer—and that is because it is the client's privilege and not his. Now why is it so important that a newsman should be given this protection? Surely there is a danger in any kind of privilege. Has the public not been served reasonably well up to now with the fact that the newsman will protect a client or will protect his sources?

Mr. Ogilvie: I will agree that it has been, but it need not always be the case. There are at times pressures put on newsmen to reveal sources that perhaps are not in the best interest of either the public...

Senator Prowse: What kind of pressures are we talking about now? Let us be specific.

Mr. Ogilvie: I would find it a little difficult to define. Pressures do occur.

The Chairman: Do you want Mr. Rupert to say something on this point?

Mr. Robert J. Rupert: American Newspaper Guild (International Representative): There have been legal pressures brought to bear on reporters to reveal sources. Do you think that the reporter, when he is protecting his source, is any less in pursuit of justice than a lawyer?

Senator Prowse: Let us understand what is going on here. I am asking you questions.

I will take the position that I think at this time that the professional newspaper reporter is just as much in pursuit of justice when he protects his source as the lawyer.

At the present time, the only time that a reporter might be put in that position is in the situation where a reporter is called before a court when he has said, "A prominent source told me this" or something to that effect. Then he says, "I won't tell you who it is." What happens to him?

Mr. Rupert: It is my understanding this never has been pushed to the extreme. People have decided not to in fact test this to the Supreme Court of Canada, which I suppose would be the final authority. What we are afraid of is that somebody will push it to that extreme and that the reporter will be in a lot of trouble that we do not think he should be in.

Senator Prowse: Well...

Mr. Fortier: Excuse me, Senator. There were two instances recently in Montreal involving contradictory judgments. We must be aware of them. They were rendered by two different judges.

In one instance, a reporter at the CBC was requested to disclose his source of information. When met with his refusal, the court declared him in contempt.

Then last week in the Valliere case, it was a reporter for the Montreal Gazette who was asked by the accused to disclose his source of information. He refused to do so. The judge maintained his right in those particular circumstances not to disclose his source of information.

Now those were two separate trials within two or three months of one another in Montreal.

The Chairman: Do you want to comment on Mr. Fortier? I shall come right back to you, Senator Prowse.

Mr. Gilles Desjarlais, Member, American Newspaper Guild; CBC French News Service in Toronto; Guild Local (CBC) Past President: I am just going to add to what Mr. Fortier has said. There were two other cases in Montreal recently. One concerned the night that there was trouble in the St. Leonard streets. TV and radio reporters were asked by the courts to bring their tapes and their films of the incidents.

Also, if you do remember the time that the reporter from La Presse in Montreal came out with the details of the last published report of the Bilingualism Commission, there was pressure put on the reporter. Some people mentioned the fact that that reporter should be brought into court to give the sources, to explain how he obtained that information or those details before it was made public.

The Chairman: Thank you. Now, Senator Prowse.

Senator Prowse: We will go back because this is one of the questions that has been raised. If I am making it difficult, it is because I want to get as much of the facts as we can in this.

The fact is that over a period of time in this country reporters have refused consistently, as a matter of professional ethics, to reveal the sources of their information regardless of how personally difficult it might be for them. Is this not so?

Mr. Rupert: Yes. I was not aware of those cases in Montreal. I would like to know what happened to the reporter who was found guilty of contempt.

Mr. Fortier: He served his time.

Mr. Rupert: I was afraid that would be the answer. He served his time.

Mr. Fortier: There was no appeal.

The Chairman: Do you want to continue, Senator Prowse?

Senator Prowse: I want to take this a little bit further. The thing that I am concerned about is the fact that in the hands of an unscrupulous reporter, an absolute privilege to protect a source—or presumably to protect a source—would put into his hands, it would appear to me, unbelievable possibilities for mischief.

If I am an unprincipled reporter, I can say I got this information; this is a fact. I am hauled into court. They say, "Well, where did you get this?" I say, "I was told this by a person that I have every reason to believe." "Who was he?" "I won't tell you." That is the end of the conversation.

At the present time, the reporter still has the right to say, "I won't tell you", but he may have to take the alternative of going to jail for a few hours or a few days.

Is it not possible that the public ends are served better by the present situation than they would be by providing a privilege?

Mr. Rupert: If I had not just learned that a reporter in Montreal did some time, I would be inclined to agree with you. However, I don't think that the reporter himself is the sole judge of what happens at the newspaper before the story ever gets to the reader. There are responsible, professional news management people who have to pass on the validity of that story. I think that the press does this well at this time.

Senator Prowse: You are going to have to tell your editor. He is making a judgment on the story.

Mr. Rupert: Yes.

Senator Prowse: But if there is a complete privilege, then is not the reporter in a position where he can say, "I won't tell the editor"?

Mr. Rupert: But then the editor is in a position where he can say, "The story is not going to appear in the newspaper."

The Chairman: We have explored that angle fully. Do you want to go to another line, Senator Prowse? Do you want someone else? Do you have another question?

Senator Prowse: Yes. I am a little interested to know what percentage, 40 percent or 38 percent, of your members actually are in Toronto. You have 13 Guild contracts in newspapers in Canada at the present time. Is that not so. Or is it 14?

Mr. Rupert: I would say almost 70 percent of our membership would be in Toronto.

Senator Prowse: All right. Your lowest weekly starting wage is $75.80 or something?

Mr. Rupert: In Oshawa.

Senator Prowse: Somewhere around there. And about $117 a week in Ottawa, or rather in Toronto?

Mr. Ogilvie: Yes.

Senator Prowse: How do wages for reporters compare with people in other businesses? Let us assume that the reporter today is a graduate from the university with a degree in arts, journalism, BSc or something.

Mr. Rupert: I think the starting wages compare rather favorably in most cases. It appears to us that the problem is not to attract able and well-backgrounded people into journalism. The problem is once they get there to keep them there. So it seems to us that the starting wage may not be the problem.

In fact, many publishers do not try to hire people at the starting wage, even if they are fresh out of college. They start them at a one- or two-year rating. The problem is that they reach their maximum too soon. At the point where the newspaperman's salary stops, generally the other professional person's salary continues to go up.

Senator Prowse: What about your turnover? Do you have any figures at all on what the turnover in the recruitment is, say in five years? Where they are?

Mr. Rupert: No; I do not. From my experience, the turnover really is tremendous and the turnover is more rapid at smaller newspapers where the salaries tend to be much lower. I would think that publishers would confirm that; that certainly is our experience.

Senator Prowse: There is a second aspect of turnover that I want to ask you about. That is, does a person leave one newspaper just to go to another? That is a normal progression. How long do we keep people in the profession? Do you have any research on that at all?

Mr. Rupert: No; we do not. I just would not attempt to answer that because my answer might not be reliable.

Senator Prowse: Generally speaking, would you say that the wages and working conditions are such that we are getting into the reporting business and editing business in Canada...

Mr. Rupert: I am sorry. I did not understand that.

Senator Prowse: Are we getting into the reporting and editing business throughout the country people of a caliber that we ought to have in view of the importance of the function they discharge?

Mr. Rupert: Yes; I think we are getting them. I do not think that in many cases we are keeping them. It seems to us that you can almost measure this in terms of the amount of money people are paid. There is an end to the amount of sacrifice any person is willing to make in the name of anything.

We think the problem is keeping them. Very often they gravitate to the larger newspapers so that you have a degree of editorial excellence in many cases in larger newspapers that the smaller newspapers cannot match. We contend that they could. They could hold these people. They could afford to pay these salaries.

It is our impression that the small newspapers are just as profitable as large newspapers in terms of the margin of profit. We think that the college graduate or fully-experienced journeyman reporter who works for a newspaper in a small town should receive the same sort of salary that a person like him receives in a place like Toronto.

Senator Prowse: Could you tell me why?

Mr. Rupert: Yes; I can. (A) We have a lot of trouble organizing small newspapers because of the tremendous turnover in staff. (B) We are told by the publisher, "Don't tell us what they pay in Toronto; we are not interested. This is some other city. If your people want Toronto wages, they had better go to Toronto to get it."

That is a very difficult argument to counter when you are given only the weapon of a strike.

Senator Prowse: In other words, the enthusiastic amateurs are spoiling the business for everybody. Is that correct?

Mr. Rupert: I suppose to some degree that is true. I do not know that it is altogether true, but there is a great attraction for a lot of young people to come into a glamorous sort of business so that there seems to be a ready supply of talent. The problem is to keep them around for awhile.

Senator Prowse: Tell me as a matter of information, is the Guild at all interested in any project in order to establish a level of professional competence in the people that you undertake to bargain for?

Mr. Rupert: We have a Heywood Broun Award, named for our founder, that we think is an incentive to people. We do have, right in our collective bargaining program, built-in promises that all of our locals have to make which we think make it possible for our people to have professional integrity and to become fully experienced.

It seems to us that the best way to keep people in the business—it may sound like a simple answer—is to pay them well. We think that is the only answer.

Senator Prowse: You are going to pay them. What I had in mind particularly was not pay, but let us grant that pay is important. Is there anything in your contracts that require an employer that you enter into a contract with to provide a certain level of instruction to these people?

Mr. Desjarlais: In the contract between the Guild and the CBC and the Mercater Corporation, there is a clause where the corporation is agreeing to take the responsibility of training its own newsmen. Unfortunately, this clause has not been as respected as we would like to have it, but the Guild certainly is trying to force it as much as possible. We are trying to have the same kind of clause in all of the other contracts.

Senator Prowse: In other words, you are arguing that now.

Mr. Desjarlais: Yes.

Senator Prowse: That is all, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow I think wanted to ask a question.

Senator Sparrow: On Page 6, number 24, it says "Where the profit motive outweighs editorial responsibility, and this is true in a frightening number of cases, reporters and editors are underpaid and overworked and many of the most promising do not remain long enough in the business to become adequately experienced."

Could the witness answer how they arrived at this fact or this assumption—whichever it may be—that that is the case?

The Chairman: Mr. Ogilvie or Mr. Rupert.

Mr. Rupert: Well, we have, for instance, a quote from I suppose the biggest press lord of them all, Lord Thomson, who has called the small town newspapers "cash boxes", and who on another occasion has said that news is what you stick in between the ads.

Now, that is one—only one—example of what we are referring to in our brief. We do not have a long series of admissions from publishers that they are more interested in money than they are in editorial excellence. In fact, we do not contend that all of them are that way.

We think that the problems we have in negotiating reasonable salaries for competent newspaper men in small towns, when the newspapers are profitable, proves that the emphasis in those particular situations is more on profitability than editorial excellence or serving the interests of the community that the newspaper services.

The Chairman: Do you want to comment, Senator Sparrow, or ask another question on it?

Senator Sparrow: That is fine; thank you.

The Chairman: Senator Prowse.

Senator Prowse: Would you say that profitability and editorial excellence are motivating forces in the operating of a paper? Are they mutually exclusive?

Mr. Rupert: No.

Senator Prowse: Would you agree that editorial excellence will probably result in greater profitability?

Mr. Rupert: I am not sure that the amount that the publisher will get will be a full return for every dollar he spends improving the editorial excellence. I am not sure that he will realize a full return in advertising revenue.

Senator Prowse: Over a period of time.

Mr. Rupert: Yes.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow asked you a question on 24. I should like to ask you a question on 23, just ahead of that.

You say "Unorganized employees of Canada's newspapers and other news media have in recent months shown an intensified interest in gaining the benefits and protections possible through Guild contracts..." Now comes what I want to ask you about. "...despite the continued existence of many of the obstacles of the 1930s and 1940s..."

What are these obstacles and particularly what are the continuing obstacles?

Mr. Rupert: Let me refer to our experience in Peterborough. I am sure that you are interested in it. We think that our experience in Peterborough constitutes us being confronted by the sort of obstacles that we met in the 1930s.

In Peterborough, the final offer that the Thomson newspaper made before our people were forced to strike—and I think that certainly we can prove they were forced to strike—was in the case of a desk man $5.00 a week under what he was making. That is rather difficult to believe, but that is the fact. He was offering on January 1, 1969, in order to get a contract with us, $120 to a desk man a sports editor with six years of experience and possibly a college degree or maybe 20 years of experience—but a minimum of six—and at that time he was paying the sports editor $125.

Now, that is not bargaining in good faith to achieve a contract, to say that the least the publisher will insist on is that somebody take a $5.00 pay cut in order to belong to a union.

We still run into this, people being fired in an organizing drive. Now, this is unfair labour practice if we can prove this person was fired for labour activity. It is very difficult to do, but if we can prove it, we can have the person reinstated. What happens to him in the interim period? What does he live on? How are the other people who are supporting their families from the salaries they make at that newspaper living? How courageous are they going to be? How willing are they going to be to stand up to the publisher when they know that one of their people was fired and is without work?

These are the sorts of things we run into.

The Chairman: Has this happened recently?

Mr. Rupert: People being fired in organizing drives; yes.

The Chairman: How recently? Would you say last week? Do you care to say?

Mr. Rupert: If you press the question, I will answer it. I would prefer not to answer it because in an organization drive, we prefer not to...

The Chairman: I shall not press the question.

Mr. Rupert: ...come above ground until we have established some strength, but it happened last week.

Senator Prowse: Nobody wants to put you in a difficult position, but you are telling us right now within the last week or last two weeks, people have been fired from their jobs because they were involved in trying to organize a collective bargaining unit?

Mr. Rupert: Right. Now, we have not been to the Labour Board and the Labour Board has not ruled that in fact that was for labour activity. However, we believe it was for labour activity.

Senator Prowse: You are satisfied in your own mind this is what happened?

Mr. Rupert: Yes sir; yes.

The Chairman: Senator Everett, did you have your hand up? I am sorry; did you not?

Senator Everett: I want to ask some questions when you are ready.

The Chairman: On this point or another?

Senator Everett: Another point.

The Chairman: Are yours on this point, Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: It is on the Peterborough matter.

The Chairman: Fine.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Rupert, in fighting the Peterborough battle, did you find evidence that management was being overtly influenced by the Toronto Head Office of the Thomson newspapers or were you dealing with local management, local publishers exclusively?

Mr. Rupert: I am not in a position to answer that question because I was not assigned to Peterborough. In fact, I was only into that city once. I was on the West Coast, but maybe Glen Ogilvie can answer.

Mr. Fortier: Would you care to answer that?

Mr. Ogilvie: Yes. In Peterborough, our dealings were with the publisher and legal counsel. I was not present myself. There were meetings in Toronto at which I understand other senior members of the Thomson organization were present. I do know that in the case of Oshawa, it was not until the 11th hour of negotiations that a senior executive officer of the Thomson chain did enter into the picture and did then, in fact, bargain and stay in session until a contract was reached.

Publishers of papers are reluctant to admit, to the Guild certainly, that they are taking direction from head offices in some other area. We do know that from time to time they do contact the head office for help and advice.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Rupert referred to what I would call a tactic used by the management. In Peterborough, did you have instances of other tactics used by the publisher that you would care to put before the Committee?

Mr. Ogilvie: Well, the day before a certification vote, the publisher mailed a letter to every employee containing many errors of fact and, in fact, telling them that it would be far better if they were without the Guild. That would be the tenor and intent of the letter. That is one area. It happened. Fortunately, we were able to get a rebuttal on very short notice.

Mr. Fortier: Rebuttal to the letter on the facts?

Mr. Ogilvie: A rebuttal on the facts.

Mr. Fortier: Was the grievance submitted to the Labour Relations Board? Since this is history, I presume we can talk about it.

Mr. Ogilvie: I do not think it was protested ever.

Mr. Rupert: I might add, I do not think a refusal to bargain charge was made ever against Thomson Newspapers in Peterborough. I am not personally aware of what sort of thinking went into the decision not to press that matter. I suspect that it was such a dead issue that they decided not to press something when there really was nothing to win but a hollow victory at the very best.

Mr. Fortier: Given the Peterborough experience behind you now, if you had to fight a similar battle, how would you go about it? In other words, what have you learned in Peterborough?

Mr. Rupert: I think we learned a lesson in Peterborough. We were reminded of something in Peterborough that we knew already. It has become almost impossible for us to organize a single department of a newspaper because we just do not have the power base for collective bargaining.

Even when we succeed in organizing, as we did in Peterborough, and we go to the bargaining table, the only thing a union has, remember, is the threat of withdrawal of its services. In Peterborough, all we had was the editorial department. I think that the publisher in Peterborough was willing to get along without his editorial department for awhile in order to get rid of the union.

One thing that we have not mentioned is a tactic that is sort of an interesting commentary on what centralized ownership can do. In Peterborough, we could not get any coverage of our strike because Thomson controlled all but one—I can be corrected, but I think this still is true—small private radio station.

The only way we could get a printed message to the people of Peterborough was to find a press and do it ourselves and hand it out to people's doors.

Mr. Fortier: Are you saying it was a complete blackout of news with respect to the strike of the Peterborough Examiner in the Peterborough area?

Mr. Rupert: Except on the private radio station. I think there only was one story. Some student sympathizers took up the cause of the strikers and staged some demonstrations in Peterborough. Now this is my recollection.

Two or three students were arrested for public mischief or something like that. I think that a story did appear in the newspaper that day. They were identified as strikers; they were not strikers.

Mr. Ogilvie: If I might cut in here. That was a radio and TV broadcast, not a newspaper. Newspaper coverage was restricted to first-day story, a few minor details, minor accounts toward the end of the strike, to full-page advertisement appearing about Christmas time.

What transpired during the strike did amount to an almost total newspaper blackout by the Thomson interests with the exception of this one small, independent radio station which did manage to give a fair, but brief account of what was transpiring.

The Chairman: Senator Everett.

Senator Everett: Mr. Ogilvie, you were talking about the members of your Guild being a professional group and their source should be protected by privilege. You also stated that they should be able to take part in politics without fear of any retaliation from their employers.

Did you think this right should be enshrined in the law?

Mr. Ogilvie: I am not sure how it could be but I would think that it would come under civil rights in some areas.

Speaking of politics, what I had in mind was a civic-minded reporter who takes part in local politics at the municipal level, aspirant to the school board, to a smaller council, some area which does not necessitate giving up his daily livelihood to tend to the business—this type of activity. It has been frowned upon.

When such activities do not entail sufficient amounts of time on the reporter's part impair his ability to do his job properly or to attend to his daily work—obviously when it gets into a higher field and when more time is required, I would say that leaves of absences should be granted to newspaper people doing this. In some cases now, they are required to resign.

Senator Everett: What you are talking about is a contractual arrangement between the employer and the group of employees or the individual employee. What I asked you was whether or not you felt a law should be passed to enshrine this principle.

Mr. Rupert: I will give my personal opinion. Yes.

Senator Everett: What should the law say?

Mr. Rupert: I think it should say that no newspaper reporters should be required to divulge the names of their sources.

I would think we should write it into our contracts.

The Chairman: Do you think it should be law?

Senator Everett: You do not think it should be a law?

Mr. Rupert: I certainly do not think it is necessary.

Senator Everett: Could you tell me what dues you charge?

Mr. Rupert: It varies from one local to another but generally, it is five percent of one week's salary per month, which comes to something like 1.23 of the minimum scale negotiated by the union. Now, if our people make differentials and overtime and earn over the scale, they are not charged dues on the additional money they make. That means that the person who earns $200 a week—and they are too few—would pay, in most locals, $10 per month for his dues.

Now, in addition to that, we have what we call a defence fund. It is like an insurance that our people buy against that day when they might have to strike. When members of the newspaper guild go on strike and the strike is sanctioned by the international union, our members receive strike benefits which can go anywhere from $40 to $85 a week, depending on their needs.

Senator Everett: What are the defence fund dues?

Mr. Rupert: I think it is something like $3.50. I am not sure. I think $3.50 on a salary to a top of $6.00 depending on the amount of salary you earn.

Senator Everett: Are there any other dues or assessments charged by the union to members?

Mr. Rupert: Initiation fees vary. I think they go anywhere from nothing to $5.00 or $10.00. They are rather low when compared to most initiation fees of unions.

Senator Everett: Is that the sum total of the dues that are charged by the Guild to its members?

Mr. Rupert: Yes.

Senator Everett: How much of those dues is remitted from the locals to the Canadian Central Office?

Mr. Rupert: We do not have one. We have a Canadian District Council, which is not a central office. It is just an unofficial Guild body which meets periodically. The dues to that are nominal. I do not think they would amount to more than $1.00 per member per month. I do not think they even are that high.

Mr. Ogilvie: They are paid by the local participating in the council, from the local fund from their part of the dues already paid. The amounts already have been mentioned.

Senator Everett: The dues then are remitted to Washington by the local directorate?

Mr. Rupert: Then they send a portion of the dues to the Washington Office. This is called per caps. Then the Washington Office pays the bills of the Canadian operation.

For instance, I am an international employee. I am paid from Washington, but the Guild has a bank account in Canada. My salary comes out of that bank account.

Senator Everett: That is a Washington-controlled bank account?

Mr. Rupert: Yes. Well, Washington-controlled except that there are some Canadian people on the Board and they rule on expenditures. They rule on the budget and have some degree of participation.

Senator Everett: And some degree of the membership of the International Board?

Mr. Rupert: Yes.

Senator Everett: Could you tell me what the Canadian income of the Guild is?

Mr. Rupert: No. We could get you that figure. There are approximately 3,000 or 3,500 Guild members in Canada. I am just not sure what the per capita is.

Mr. Ogilvie: It is around $3.85 a month.

Mr. Rupert: So supposing it is $3.85 per member and there are 3,500 members. It is something over a thousand.

Senator Everett: I am sorry; I did not get that.

Senator Prowse: 3,000 members; 3,500 members.

Mr. Rupert: About $11,000.00 per month.

Senator Everett: What is the $3.85 a month?

Mr. Rupert: Those are what we call "per caps". The local collects its dues and then remits to Washington $3.85, or something very close to that, per member.

Senator Everett: I see. So $11,000.00 then is remitted by the locals to Washington?

Mr. Rupert: Yes.

Senator Everett: You say you have 3500 members?

Mr. Rupert: Well, I picked that figure out of the air. It might be closer to 3400.

The Chairman: 3400.

Senator Everett: How many of those are in the editorial department?

Mr. Ogilvie: I do not have figures to break it down. Our locals vary.

The Chairman: Perhaps you would forward that information to us. Would that be satisfactory?

Senator Everett: Not entirely, Mr. Chairman.

It would not be a major portion of your members?

Mr. Rupert: It would not be the majority of our members.

Senator Everett: It would be less than 25 percent?

Mr. Rupert: No. I do not think so. I believe it would be right around 30 percent.

Senator Everett: About 30 percent. What would be the function of the remainder of your members?

Mr. Rupert: It would be to work in the business office, clerks, typists, stenographers, accountants, advertising salesmen, in some cases truck drivers, circulation district managers. Depending on how much of our jurisdiction we have organized, they do almost all of the non-craft jobs apart from running presses, setting type, this kind of thing.

Senator Everett: Your brief seems to me, on reading it, to give heavy emphasis to the problems of the editorial journalist.

Mr. Rupert: It was our impression that that was your major concern. That is why we concentrated on it.

Senator Everett: I see. Well, I would like the figures. You say that it would not be less or would be less than 25 percent?

Mr. Rupert: It would be right around 25 percent.

Senator Everett: About 25 percent of your workers are editorial?

Mr. Rupert: Yes. And I do not put that to you as an accurate figure. I think it is close to that. We will get you exact figures.

Senator Everett: I would like a complete breakdown, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: We would appreciate it if we could have the information.

Mr. Desjarlais: I might have it in answer to a question. Depending on the local situation it might be different. The CBC local is composed only of newsmen, nobody else but newsmen.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Senator Everett: In that case, the Guild.

Mr. Desjarlais: ... represents only newsmen in the CBC.

The Chairman: Senator Bourque, some time ago you wanted to ask a question. I am sorry I could not get to you sooner.

Senator Bourque: In your brief, Article 1, says "The purpose of the American Newspaper Guild shall be to advance the economic interests of its members, to guarantee, as far as it is able, constant honesty in the news, to raise the standards of journalism and ethics of the industry..."

Now, my question is, is it necessary for a prospective member of the Guild to undergo some kind of examination as to his ability, experience, and knowledge as a newspaperman before he is admitted to the Guild? In other words, is it necessary for the candidate to show what ability he has as a newspaperman?

Mr. Rupert: It is necessary for the prospective member to prove his ability to the publisher. The difference between our union and craft unions is that we do not supply staff to a publisher. The publisher hires people on the basis of their qualifications. Once he has hired them, then they become members of our union.

So, yes, there is a test, but we do not apply it. The publishers do.

The Chairman: I think Senator Macdonald had a question.

Senator Macdonald: Yes. To go back to that Peterborough matter for a moment. On that paper, are there craft unions?

Mr. Rupert: I do have some figures for them; yes.

Senator Macdonald: I just wondered if there are craft unions present.

Mr. Rupert: There are craft unions in Peterborough. I will give you figures at this time on that. At the time that the Peterborough Examiner offered us a top minimum of $125.00 for an assistant editorial writer, the pressman was earning $131.50, which is $6.50 higher than what we were offered. On January 1, 1969, which was the day their proposed offer would go into effect, the pressman would have been earning $143.25.

So that is something like $18.00 a week more than our assistant editorial writer, which was what the top classification was offered.

Senator Macdonald: In other words, in the craft unions, the members were to cross the picket lines of the industrial union?

Mr. Rupert: Would they?

Senator Macdonald: Yes.

Mr. Rupert: In that particular case, sir, they did.

Senator Macdonald: Have you run into jurisdictional disputes with them?

Mr. Rupert: Very rarely.

Senator Macdonald: The craft unions did cross the picket line?

Mr. Rupert: The question of jurisdictional disputes tends to be rather easy; it is easy to separate the function of a pressman or printer from that of a reporter or a district manager or ad salesman.

Senator Prowse: Well, the craft unions have insisted on that separation all along.

Mr. Rupert: Well, they are craft unions. We are an industrial union. We are dedicated to the principle that one union, and one union only, should represent all of the employees in a newspaper plant. That is our position of principle.

However, we are unable, because of the longstanding craft union structure to do very much about this. The printers' union is the oldest union in the country.

The Chairman: Guild members crossed the picket lines which are around the newspapers in Toronto.

Mr. Rupert: Our Guild members are now walking through a nominal sort of picket line in Toronto. When the strike was at its height, our members were going through the line. We do have, within our constitution, a provision which empowers our locals to sanction a picket line and refuse to cross it.

Now, there are people who would interpret the Federal, and in fact the Ontario, law to prohibit us from taking that position. I think probably that is as much as I should say about that.

The Chairman: Senator Macdonald.

Senator Macdonald: What degree of cooperation is there between the two unions, craft and your union?

Mr. Rupert: It really depends totally on the locality. For instance, in the City you are in, there is a very large amount of cooperation and understanding of common interest between the craft unions and the Guild.

I think generally we have a rather good relationship with the craft union, but we have had some tremendous breakdowns. Peterborough was one. Certainly, Toronto was a bigger one.

Senator Macdonald: I would like to change the subject unless somebody else has a question.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow wanted to ask a question, but why don't you carry on? We will come back to Senator Sparrow.

Senator Macdonald: Does your union resist any changes in the technical operation of the papers?

Mr. Rupert: No.

Senator Macdonald: I have in mind such things as the linotype.

Mr. Rupert: That is not our jurisdiction, sir. We do have automated processes introduced into our jurisdiction in the business offices now. We are told that it is coming in the editorial departments.

We have a collective bargaining program that is determined by our convention. One of the mandatory proposals we must make and try to achieve is that when an automated process is to be introduced that is going to reduce the work force, the publisher and the union discuss the most positive way to approach this. We insist that no one be displaced. We do so on the basis that without consumers, there will be no newspapers or ads. Therefore, people have to work.

Now, I was interested in the Woods Commission Report. They said that that was exactly what they thought management and unions ought to do. However, we still meet a surprising amount of resistance from some publishers in this area. They feel they ought to be able to introduce the process and displace people if they want to.

In some cases, they agree to a contractual provision. In other cases, they give us a side letter to our agreement which says "No one shall be displaced within the life of this agreement." We are inclined, in some cases, to take that side letter. We would rather have a contractual provision, which is what the Woods Commission recommended.

Senator Macdonald: Sometimes, by natural erosion or something, there would be fewer people employed.

Mr. Rupert: By attrition, our number of members would be reduced. That is something we think we have to live with in many situations.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow.

Senator Sparrow: Beginning on Page 15 through to Page 17, and referring to number 72 on Page 17, you state in reference to concentration of ownership that "This high degree of concentration of ownership . . . disturbs us greatly."

Then in your verbal presentation you referred to fewer owning more which troubles you. Are you advocating legislation in this regard? If you are, have you a firm proposal to make so far as legislation would be concerned to put some controls on the ownership of the media?

Mr. Rupert: Well, yes, we advocate legislation; no, we do not have a firm proposal. However, if any agency that is empowered to show an official interest is interested in this approach, then we would make certainly a firm proposal.

Senator Sparrow: Have you any further comments on this subject?

Mr. Rupert: Well, I was going to refer to an article that was in the Globe and Mail magazine some time ago, which I think rather dramatically points up the dangers of concentration of ownership.

If I may, I am just going to read the first few paragraphs. This was written by Ken Bagnell in the Globe and Mail.

"You are, let us say, rolling out of bed in the old city of Saint John, misty and gray in the New Brunswick morning. You reach for the morning paper. It is K. C. Irving's paper. You switch on the radio. Chances are good it is K. C. Irving's station. You turn on the TV. It is K. C. Irving's channel.

"You stroll to the drydock. It is K. C. Irving's drydock. You walk to the famous Reversing Falls and lift your gaze to a belching pulp mill. It is K. C. Irving's mill. You scan a hill and a sprawling oil refinery. It is K. C. Irving's refinery and maybe even his hill.

"You board a bus. It is K. C. Irving's bus. After dinner, you buy the evening paper. It is K. C. Irving's paper. You pick up the out-of-town papers from Moncton and from Fredericton. They are K. C. Irving's. You are in the domain of one of the most incredible men in Canada."

I think that is a dramatic example of how concentration of ownership can be dangerous. I think a man who controls so much of the economy in the lives of a group of people in one city must present a tremendous problem to a newspaper management which sincerely believes that it ought to be responsible to the public that it services.

I just think that this creates tremendous problems for the people who are running this newspaper and that is the sort of concentration of ownership that disturbs us.

The Chairman: May I ask you if there is any different attitude towards the Guild from these various common ownership companies? You may not be able to answer that.

Mr. Rupert: It is a good question.

The Chairman: Presumably, you are working in newspapers which are owned by these various companies.

Mr. Rupert: Yes.

The Chairman: Do they respond differently to the Guild?

Mr. Rupert: I think it varies from one ownership group to another. In some instances, there seems to be total autonomy in terms of employer relations. In others, there seems to be a rather large degree of central control. So I think it varies from one to another.

If for instance, we are up against an employer who is unfriendly to the Guild—such as Lord Thomson obviously has proven himself to be—he learns an awful lot of lessons on that organizing drive that he can use to defeat us somewhere else. I think that this may be the extreme case, but it can happen that concentration of ownership can, in fact, make it more difficult for a newspaper group of employees to gain collective bargaining, a right to which they have a democratic right.

The Chairman: Perhaps you fellows learn something out of the same situation.

Mr. Rupert: We like to think we learn something.

The Chairman: Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: You refer to the article by Bagnell in your brief on Page 17, 73. You make the statement "We feel the treatment given news adverse to K. C. Irving's non-newspapers holdings by his New Brunswick papers gives ample demonstration of the potential for dishonesty inherent in such monopoly."

Do you have any evidence to support a statement like that or do you simply go on the basis of Mr. Bagnell's story? That is a rather broad statement.

Mr. Rupert: I know to what he is referring. I was trying to put together a response.

I think basically we are relying on the findings of reporter Bagnell. Now, I do not know personally whether the newspapers in that town have been unwilling to honestly face the pollution problem that mill may be creating. I personally do not know.

Senator McElman: I was wondering if you had any evidence or whether you were accepting the sense of the Bagnell story at face value.

Secondly, you speak of where you had Guild contracts with publishers—you do have Guild contracts, I take it, in the Atlantic Provinces somewhere?

Mr. Rupert: No.

Senator McElman: Have you attempted to establish the Guild?

Mr. Rupert: Yes. I had a feeler, an indication of interest from the Maritimes a matter of three months ago. It was from an editorial person who, because of no exposure to the Guild thought that the Guild was an editorial-only union.

This person pointed out that the newspaper that he or she was employed by was one owned by a person who also owned other newspapers. She said, "If you are going to work in this area, you are going to have to work for this man. He can control the wages. All we need is a Guild."

So I wrote a letter to this person and said that our experience had been it was very, very difficult for us to negotiate a respectable contract in an area where there is no Guild and in an area where we only have one department organized. I did not get an answer which indicates, to me, this person just felt that it was a bigger job than we could handle.

We are very interested in pursuing. We do not deny the benefits of Guild membership to any group of newspapermen, no matter how large or small anywhere, provided we think there is some practical possibility that we are going to be able to achieve a contract and do something for them.

We will not organize people simply so we can say we represent them. If we cannot represent them effectively, then we do not want to represent them at all.

Senator McElman: The information we have thus far indicates there is rather substantial disparity in the wage levels as between some parts of the prairies relative to B.C. or the central part of the nation. The same holds true for the Atlantic provinces relative to Central Canada and B.C.

Would it not be one of the purposes of your Guild to endeavor to move into these areas of apparent need and overcome this disparity?

Mr. Rupert: That is exactly our goal. Any time we have any reason to believe that we can organize a group of newspapermen, anywhere, anywhere in this country, no matter how remote, and that we can do a good job for them, we will go and try to do it.

Now, because we will take on almost any organizing situation, we frankly have some failures, but we think that any group of newspapermen that indicate a real interest should have an opportunity. It is their democratic right and we are the union to represent them.

Senator McElman: In view of this wage situation that I refer to, does it not seem strange that you could be described almost as a Toronto-based organization rather than a national organization?

Mr. Rupert: In view of our goals, you think...

Senator McElman: In view of your goals and some of the disparities, such as wages, that I spoke on, is it not a strange thing that you come out in your membership, etcetera, almost as a Toronto-based organization rather than a national organization?

Mr. Rupert: I think it is unfortunate, but I do not think it is a strange thing. We have pointed out that on smaller newspapers conditions are such that internal turnover is so rapid that we cannot establish a base. It takes a long time from the day you sign the first person to a card until you get to the Labour Board and get certified.

It takes a much longer time from that point until you achieve a contract. If you have a situation where there is no stability and people are moving and going to greener fields all of the time, and management is not likely in many of these cases to hire somebody who they think might be sympathetic to the Guild, frequently what you can wind up with is a contract and no members or certification and no members.

That is why we have had some problems in the Maritimes and also in other small cities.

Now, we have had, of course, problems in Quebec that the whole nation has had. Ours are no different from anybody else's except that we have had our separation. We have lost through a Labour Board decision supported by the CBC. We have lost our French-speaking news people in Quebec, but we still are trying to achieve strength in Quebec and the Maritimes.

Anyway, I think it is unfortunate, but I do not think it is strange. I think there are some clearly identifiable reasons for our inability to get into the Maritimes.

Senator McElman: Would this be one of the principal reasons then why you are an international rather than a national organization as well? Would you look to strength at the international level that you cannot get nationally?

Mr. Rupert: The history is that the Guild was organized in Canada by an international union. The start was made, as you have seen from the brief, in Toronto. I think that most Canadian Guild members feel that the whole concept of unionism is where the members of a group can enjoy the strengths of the group.

I think the strength in Canada is too small. Certainly the larger group can be, in my judgment, the stronger. I suppose that is just an academic argument in favor of international unions rather than national unions.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow.

Senator Sparrow: Referring to wages again, you refer, of course to the fact that local members make the final decision on the acceptance or rejection of a proposed contract settlement under which they will work.

Now, in 25 on Page 6, you discuss minimum beginners' salaries as ranging from $118.84 weekly at the Toronto Telegram to $75.40 at the Oshawa Times. Why would there be such a difference under a Guild contract with you representing both?

Mr. Rupert: Very simple, sir. The publisher would not go any higher. The way we achieved our initial contract in Oshawa was to strike. We had to strike to achieve that kind of a figure and that is the best we could do.

We were faced with the practical decision: "This is all we can get. Are we going to desert the people because it is less than we have somewhere else?" I do not think we can afford to do that.

Senator Sparrow: Would you comment on the economics of the newspapers themselves? Why is it one can afford the higher wage and the other cannot?

Mr. Rupert: I suppose like in any other business, there are some newspapers which are more prosperous than others. I do not know how prosperous the Oshawa Times is, but I do know it is the only newspaper in that town and that they have a very big expensive new building. They have a rather large circulation. They have very low wages. They have lots of ads in the newspaper.

We have to assume that this is one of the Thomson cash boxes and we contend that he is not giving us our share or giving our people their share. But we really were faced with a practical decision: If that is the most this man is willing to give, no matter how long the people walk around the building and how much his image in the community suffers, we either have to take it and wait for another day—which is what we have done there—or we have to stage a strike. Now we struck to get the first contract there and we had great support from the labour community.

We could not have achieved the contract without them. Now, the second time around, we thought that we had achieved as much as we could. Even had we gone on the street, we felt that we could not have achieved any more at the bargaining table. So we accepted that.

Senator Sparrow: Do you know the circulation of that newspaper?

Mr. Rupert: The Oshawa Times?

Senator Sparrow: Yes.

Mr. Rupert: I am sorry; I do not.

The Chairman: I am sure we have that.

I think, Honourable Senators, that perhaps our time has just about elapsed. Are there any final questions?

Senator Macdonald: Do I take it you have only two full-time paid staff in Canada?

Mr. Rupert: Really, there is only one staff member in Canada of the International Union and that is me.

For an organizing drive that we are conducting among the CBC employees—I feel free to mention it because it is above board and we have a power base now—we put for a period of two months one of the local members, a CBC newsmen, on our staff. He was paid by the International.

Now, the larger locals in Toronto and Vancouver do have their own local staff people.

Senator Macdonald: You say normally only the President and the Secretary Treasurer are the only two.

Mr. Rupert: No, sir. They are the only two paid people on the International Executive Board. All of the other members of that Board are working newspapermen. Now, there is a staff of maybe 20 people, but only two of them are at the policy-making level.

The Chairman: Does anybody else have anything to ask because I want to—Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: I just want to go back for a moment to the reference to the involvement of field members or groups of newsmen or newspaper employees in politics. Correct me if I am wrong. I drew from Mr. Ogilvie's remarks that involvement in municipal politics would be an acceptable thing, but at the Provincial, Federal levels not so acceptable.

When Mr. Rupert said that this would be negotiated in the contract, surely there would not be any difference between the three levels, would there?

Mr. Ogilvie: I am sorry. I hope I did not indicate that. I said there had been resistance at the lower level municipal level and at a higher level, leaves of absences had been denied. People had been placed in the position of resigning a position to take part in politics.

Senator McElman: I misunderstood you then.

Mr. Ogilvie: We are not limiting to one sphere. In the area where the amount of work involved would interfere with the daily work, it is obvious there would need to be leaves of absences or some such arrangement.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I have two or three short wrap-up questions, Mr. Rupert. Will you kindly turn to Paragraph 12, bottom of Page 3 of your brief, and look to the Ottawa situation where both the Citizen and the Journal have Guild contracts.

It is a fact, is it not, that insofar as the Citizen is concerned, all its reporters are members of the Guild; whereas, so far as the Journal is concerned, only the circulation employees are members of the Guild? I believe that is correct.

Mr. Rupert: We are not fully organized in either newspaper in our jurisdiction. At the Citizen, the editorial, circulation, business office and plant maintenance employees are members. We do not have the advertising staff. At the Journal, we only have the circulation people.

Mr. Fortier: My question is because of the Guild contract at the Citizen, have you in fact experienced at the journal higher salaries paid to those employees who are unionized at the Citizen?

Mr. Rupert: Yes. That has been our experience. I am recalling a few years ago that the Journal management gave their editorial people an increase; that they had rather closely predicted what the Guild settlements were going to be in the past. They thought they had done so in this case.

After the Guild contract was negotiated at the Citizen, the Journal had to give an additional salary increase to its people to keep them $.50 or $1.00 above the wage level of the Citizen.

This is a tactic that we are faced with in almost every city where one newspaper is partially or fully organized and one is not.

Mr. Fortier: Going to another city and speaking of an area, have you encountered similar experiences also in an area where, say, grouping together a number of small towns, if you have one Guild contract in one particular city, in another nearby city the salaries would tend to be on par with the ones paid to that Guild newspaper?

Mr. Rupert: Yes, sir. It is our impression that publishers watch closely the Guild settlements at the closest city—the ones with which their employees would most readily identify—and that guides them in many cases to the kind of money they pay.

Now, what they do not do is match all of the fringe benefits, but their employees tend not to be aware of fringe benefits of Guild membership—not as aware as they are of the salary.

Mr. Fortier: Take-home pay.

Mr. Rupert: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: What has been the experience of the Guild in this respect in the United States?

Mr. Rupert: It is identical.

Mr. Fortier: Identical?

Mr. Rupert: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Do you have the same percentage of coverage?

Mr. Rupert: I think in terms of circulation, our coverage in Canada might be higher.

Mr. Fortier: Is it?

Mr. Rupert: In the United States, there are major papers like Dallas and Houston, the Los Angeles Times, one of the Chicago papers—the Tribune, Atlanta that we do not have any contracts with. Those are just some of the big ones.

Mr. Fortier: You speak on Page 6, Paragraph 22, of local members having a final decision. Is it not a fact that all contracts have to be approved by Washington?

Mr. Rupert: Yes. We set standards, the International Union, in convention that we want each local to meet or attempt to meet in its bargaining. Before a contract can be submitted to the membership for ratification, the approval of the Contracts Committee has to be secured, except where there is a strike vote or a strike.

If there is a strike vote or a strike, then the settlement can be referred directly to members for ratification without going through the Contracts Committee.

Mr. Fortier: So, except for a strike vote, the measure of local autonomy is somewhat qualified.

Mr. Rupert: There are qualifications. I would say that the decision as to whether a contract will or will not be accepted is always made by the members. Now, we may be instructed to go back to the bargaining table and attempt to improve it.

Mr. Fortier: Could the members approve a contract that has not been approved in Washington?

Mr. Rupert: That has happened. Some form of disciplinary action, which usually is not very stern, has been taken by the International Union.

Mr. Fortier: Finally, on the bottom of Page 7, Paragraph 28, I was interested in being reminded that in Peterborough, the City Editor, the District Editor and the Chief Editorial Writer had joined the Guild picket line. Is it not a fact that the Chief Editorial Writer, Mr. Dunwoody, has gone back to the newspaper since the strike has been settled?

Mr. Rupert: I do not know. Glen, do you know?

Mr. Ogilvie: I do not know. He was one of the last few who took part in the strike who had not found an acceptable position to my knowledge up until six weeks ago or a month ago.

Mr. Fortier: Do you know, Mr. Ogilvie, what happened to the City and District Editors? Have they gone back to the newspaper?

Mr. Ogilvie: Well...

Mr. Fortier: Have they been accepted back into the fold?

Mr. Ogilvie: I am sorry. I cannot say where they are now. I do know that with the exception of five members, who went on strike, all have secured jobs back at their old papers or with other newspapers out of town. A sixth did have a position and decided it was not his cup of tea and relinquished it.

Since that date, they have not communicated with us or with me, so I cannot say what they are doing at the moment. That was back in mid October.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you. Have any Canadians served as President of the International Union?

Mr. Ogilvie: Not up to this point.

Mr. Rupert: No Canadian ever has run for that office, but I guess you know from the brief that there are two International Vice Presidents on the Board from Canada. They have one vote, the same as does the President.

The Chairman: I would like to thank...

Senator McElman: One final question.

To go back to where we started on the question of privilege for reporters. That would come under Provincial jurisdiction. I wonder if any Province has given that privilege, that reporters can protect their sources.

Mr. Rupert: Not that I am aware of at this time.

The Chairman: I would like to thank Mr. Ogilvie, Mr. Rupert and Mr. Desjarlais. You have assisted us greatly. We have been delighted to have you present.

Honorable Senators, we will now adjourn for exactly ten minutes. We will reconvene in this room in ten minutes to receive the brief from the Canadian Managing Editors Conference, in exactly ten minutes.

Thank you.

(Brief recess)

(Upon resuming)

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, the next witnesses are representatives of the Canadian Managing Editors' Conference. There are a number of them. This is why I am standing.

On my immediate right is Mr. Ivor Williams. He is the President of the Canadian Managing Editors, the chief witness. He is the Managing Editor of the London Free Press.

Other people are Bill MacPherson, Managing Editor of the Ottawa Citizen; Mr. William H. Metcalfe, Managing Editor of the Ottawa Journal; Mr. C. M. Fellman, Managing Editor of the North Bay Nugget; Mr. Robert D. Owen, the Editor-in-Chief of the Kingston Whig-Standard; Mr. Gordon Bullock, Managing Editor of the Hamilton Spectator.

Gentlemen, perhaps you have been here earlier today. Your brief was received some three weeks ago. It has been circulated to the Senators, presumably studied by them, so we can take it as read.

I should like to give you a few minutes, if you wish, to summarize or expend or explain or, indeed, to talk about anything else. You may use the time as you wish. If you do not mind, we suggest 15 minutes. You may talk about whatever you might wish.

Following that time period, we will ask the Senators to proceed with their questions which, I am sure you know, may be on content or on other matters.

Mr. Williams.

Mr. Ivor Williams: President, Canadian Managing Editors; Managing Editor, the London Free Press: Thank you, sir. Mr. Chairman, Honourable Senators, in response to this invitation of the Committee, the Canadian Managing Editors' Conference submitted information regarding the function of the organization, the membership and financing. A number of members have provided requested information individually.

Mr. Schrader of Ryerson Polytechnical Institute of Toronto advised me he prepared for your information a digest of the reports of the annual meetings.

The association exists for the professional interests of its members, and so forth—editorial improvement of Canadian newspapers. Our membership is composed of newspaper executives whose basic responsibility is managing the news departments, of daily newspapers in most cases.

The Managing Editor is responsible to his Editor or to the publisher for the daily news content of the papers.

The Canadian Managing Editors' Conference plans annual meetings. Our function is to try to develop annual programs at these conventions for the professional interests of our membership.

With me today, Honourable Senators, are two past Presidents of our organization, our Treasurer, a Director, and our Program Chairman for next year's meeting, which will be held in Winnipeg. If there are questions regarding organization or function, we will be pleased to answer them.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. That is brief and to the point.

I think Senator Sparrow is going to begin asking you some questions.

Senator Sparrow: Could I ask what the total membership of your association is?

Mr. Williams: Memberships, sir, are based on attendance at the annual conference. It is, I believe, 46 at the meeting last year in Ottawa.

Senator Sparrow: There are permanent membership lists as such, or who do you notify that a conference is being held?

Mr. Williams: We have a list of all Canadian Managing Editors, who are advised and receive bulletins.

Senator Sparrow: You say in your brief that you hoped to make available bulletins to your membership. Would these go to the same group that you notify of the meeting itself? Is that correct?

Mr. Williams: Yes, sir.

Senator Sparrow: In your membership, do you notify the weekly magazines as well as the dailies?

Mr. Williams: No; we do not.

Senator Sparrow: This is strictly a daily newspaper?

Mr. Williams: Yes, sir.

Senator Sparrow: Why?

Mr. Williams: We have decided that our role is quite different to those of weekly editors. We prefer to function as an organization of the daily Managing Editors, rather than weekly.

Senator Sparrow: Have the weekly newspapers such an association as well then?

Mr. Williams: Yes; oh, yes.

Senator Sparrow: They do.

Senator Smith: I do not believe that one fellow is the Managing Editor.

Senator Prowse: Your problem is that one fellow is apt to be the whole staff?

Senator Sparrow: You refer to the fact that annual dues are $35.00 paid by those members attending the conference. Do the publishers support your organization financially? Do they support the individual members attending?

The reason I ask is, are you receiving the cooperation of publishers for this organization?

Mr. Williams: I believe we are because of my conversations and the attendance that we have at our meetings.

Senator Prowse: Bills are paid by the firms; are they?

Mr. Williams: I believe they are. I never have taken a survey to determine this.

Senator Sparrow: You say in Page 5, number 20, "Our individual members at all times are directly concerned with the freedom of the press in general..."

You use the word "concerned." What are your concerns at the moment? What are your concerns so far as freedom of the press is concerned?

Mr. Williams: The association has no role in this. I meant in that to refer to our individual membership in their own job functions.

Senator Sparrow: Have you further comments than that on "freedom of the press"? The way that is worded, it seems to be a general statement of concern, of concern of freedom of the press. You say it is not; is that correct?

Mr. Williams: I would like to read it again, sir, if I might. "Our individual members at all times are directly concerned..." This is in their own job functions and their individual newspapers. We have discussed, of course, in our association, freedom of the press.

Senator Sparrow: What freedoms concern you individually then?

Mr. Williams: I think there is a freedom that we have spoken about before, that the press in itself has no freedom that the individual does not.

Senator Sparrow: All right. On Page 3, Number 7, you state "Our programs have been planned to assist managing editors in anticipating changes in technology which have, and will, affect their responsibilities..."

What technological changes do you foresee that vastly affect your jobs at the moment and in the foreseeable future?

Mr. Williams: I am speaking personally now, sir. I believe technological changes will change the Managing Editor's responsibility for hiring and selecting of the staff. I think technological changes will have great effect on the role of the Managing Editor.

Senator Sparrow: After your deliberations at these conferences, would you think that your publishers cooperate in having and implementing recommendations and suggesting that come out of such a conference?

Mr. Williams: I have no knowledge on that. I have no knowledge of how this is applied to other groups.

Senator Sparrow: Well, the purpose of the conference is to have a better newspaper, I would think.

Mr. Williams: Yes; yes.

Senator Sparrow: Does it in fact accomplish that task?

Mr. Williams: We feel it does, sir.

Senator Sparrow: That is all. Thank you.

The Chairman: Senator Smith.

Senator Smith: There is a question that is on my mind. I believe it is accepted that your responsibility is with people who form this association and are in the area of managing the news department. This leads me to a question that must be of great concern to you; I would like to have you give a few of your comments on it.

What problems have you encountered in the last few years in acquiring the kind of staff that a Managing Editor would like to have on his newspaper in the profession?

Mr. Williams: There again I am here as President of the Managing Editors' Conference. We have not discussed this. It may be that those who are with me will appear again as individual Managing Editors of their own newspaper.

Senator Prowse: May I interrupt?

Senator Smith: Certainly.

Senator Prowse: Mr. Williams, you are here as head of a very important organization. You also have a great deal of responsibility yourself. We are trying to get information about what is a very complex thing, but a very important facet of our temporary community or society here in Canada.

Now, I know you do not want to be pinned down but you are not going to be pilloried for anything you say. You have a tremendous amount of experience at your finger tips. It will be most helpful to all of us, and much simpler for all of you, if we can get away from any idea that have to protect yourself here and if you could be completely frank with us and say, "Well, I do not know; I cannot speak for everybody." Let us have your personal opinion.

The Chairman: I am grateful to Senator Prowse's observation. I think it is a fair one subject to the observation that I do not think Mr. Williams thinks he is going to be pilloried.

I think the point Senator Prowse is making, and it occurred to me several times this morning, is that you are here as the Chairman or President of the Managing Editors' Conference and we would like you to speak in that capacity. We quite appreciate the dual role which you occupy. We are not asking you questions in your capacity as Managing Editor of The London Free Press or, indeed, any of the Managing Editors.

I think that we would hope that you could express views as Chairman of the Conference.

Does that say it properly?

Senator Prowse: I am not suggesting anybody is going to be pilloried. There seems to be a background—everybody seems to be very, very careful. What I say is a witness has been carefully briefed by his counsel not to do any more than barely answer the question. Now, we want a little more than that, please. That is what I am saying.

The Chairman: I think, Senator, in fairness to this witness and other witnesses who represent a conference or an association, they are in a strange position. We appreciate that.

Therefore, let us go back to Senator Smith's question. Do you want to frame your question again?

Senator Smith: Let me give a little background to the question. I have been thinking it must be rather difficult to get people who are able to participate after some on-job training and be capable of going out on the police beat or city beat, then come back into the editing desk and make themselves useful salaried people on a newspaper staff.

I am wondering in the comments that you might care to make whether your conference discusses problems of this kind, whether it discusses ways and means of perhaps making it more simple to obtain educated journalists and the kind of staff that you like to have on your newspaper.

Is this not of some concern? If you do not discuss it, you must not have problems on it.

Mr. Williams: We do discuss it at great length. We discuss the methods used by experienced editors from across the country of recruiting from campus newspapers, journalism schools and such, which are quite different.

Almost every university has a newspaper. Ambitious young students may be enrolled in any one of the disciplines and may be working on the newspaper. We wonder whether or not we can attract them to our business. We contact the institutes, such as Ryerson, which has plenty of journalism courses.

We discuss among ourselves the progress that people from the various schools are making, as well as better ways of attracting young people to our business. Some newspaper organizations and individual publishers provide scholarships for this purpose. We discuss all of the things that go into job satisfaction really.

Perhaps I could field this question to my colleagues, too.

The Chairman: If any of you other gentlemen wish to chime in, please do.

Mr. C. M. Fellman, Managing Editor, North Bay Nugget, North Bay: I think it forms a great deal of the deliberations of our organization. We spend a good deal of time talking back and forth amongst ourselves on how to get good staff and, after getting them, how to train them and hold them.

I myself have picked up pointers from other men at the conferences that have helped me a bit. I hope, perhaps, I have given them tips that will help them. This business of trying to get the right person and people is a very important part of our conference.

The Chairman: Senator Smith?

Senator Smith: I really am quite satisfied with the answer. I would hope that you exchange ideas and this sort of thing. I would have expected you to paint a pretty difficult picture on the great competition that exists for the kind of people you might employ on your staff.

For instance, these people can jump into a pretty good position with the public relations firms or jump into television journalism or radio journalism—after you have then trained a little. I should think it would be one of the most difficult things you have to deal with at this point.

Mr. Williams: Many people do not feel that to jump into public relations or to another type of journalism really is that attractive. We try to make the written word as attractive and profitable as we can for the people who are involved in it with us.

Senator Smith: In other words, you do not think you lose too many because your salaries are not high enough and another medium might be able to steal them because of the attraction of higher incomes?

Mr. Williams: In my personal experience again, it is not true. In fact, the flow is the other way now. Some people are leaving other organizations at a higher rate of pay because of the satisfaction of working on what I consider an excellent newspaper.

The Chairman: Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: Yours would be the body, I would think, which best could discuss the caliber of the service you are getting from the news-gathering service. How do you, as an association, consider the level of service you are getting from Canadian Press?

Mr. Williams: We never have had a direct relationship between our conference and the Canadian Press. The Associated Press Managing Editors in the United States has a direct relationship with the Associated Press there.

In their normal function, our members have a very close relationship individually with the Canadian Press. We regularly meet, at circ meetings and some annual meetings, members of Canadian Press and the performance of the agency is assessed. We never have gone deeply into it in our organization.

The Chairman: I think Senator Macdonald has some questions.

Senator Macdonald: I just am wondering how effective an organization you are trying to have. I notice your conference is financed by a payment of $35.00 a year by those attending the conference. There were 45 attending the conference.

I do not think you are going to do a great deal of work on something around $1500 for a budget.

Mr. Williams: This is one of our faults as an organization. We do not continue our functions throughout the year, but we try to make our two or three day conference as meaningful to those individuals who can attend as possible.

If we can get a good speaker at a very low price... We do operate and it is surprising how profitable our annual meetings have been, sir.

Senator Macdonald: I think I would be surprised.

The Chairman: Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: I see they have some of the politicians as speakers. They must be cheap politicians.

The Chairman: I was going to ask something to follow Senator Macdonald's point. Is the conference the sum total of the work of the Managing Editors' Conference? From conference to conference, nothing happens except to plan the next year's conference?

Mr. Williams: That is true, sir, except for personal contacts.

The Chairman: You mentioned Professor Schrader's paper. It is indeed an excellent resume of the Managing Editors' Conference going right back to the first one. Is this a fair observation: At the Managing Editors' Conference, useful projects are planned and set forward in ideas, but understandably, because you only meet annually, there is no follow-through?

Mr. Williams: The projects are not planned. In the type of discussion we organize, there is normally a day-long discussion where groups of editors of similar size circulation discuss many problems which are of concern to them.

It is surprising how the same problems affect the small newspapers and the large newspapers. At the end of the discussion, we come in and the Committee Chairmen report on the suggestions that were made in the discussions that were held by the individual groups.

We often find that a large newspaper has had a problem that has been solved in a very small newspaper. We find these discussions are very helpful to us.

It may be a matter of regret to us that we do not have a continuing organization throughout the year.

The Chairman: Is that a source of regret?

Mr. Williams: Personally, I would hope eventually we have a more continuing relationship.

The Chairman: Meeting three or four times a year?

Mr. Williams: No; no. A more continuing relationship, some contact, some exchange of views and attitudes around the country.

The Chairman: Senator Prowse.

Senator Prowse: I gather that at the present time your conference merely provides a facility where Managing Editors, who are people with presumably the same kind of problems, can get together with their counterparts from across the country and discuss the problems.

Mr. Williams: Yes; exposure to new views, too.

Senator Prowse: There is a two-way thing to it?

Mr. Williams: Yes.

Senator Prowse: You may pick up answers to problems you may have. You may be trying to get some information that will enable you to anticipate a problem. This is as far as you go?

Mr. Williams: We try to anticipate problems by attracting to our meetings speakers who can talk about problems which we may not have met yet.

Senator Prowse: Now, on the other hand, I think this is the pity: The Managing Editors, as I understand it, are the people who decide what goes into the newspaper.

Mr. Williams: That is the function on some newspapers, sir.

Senator Prowse: Generally?

Mr. Williams: In most cases, on most large newspapers, we have to delegate the responsibility. It is too much for one man.

Senator Prowse: Delegate down, but finally, you are the fellow who answers to the publisher if something goes wrong on the news end of the paper. You are the fellow that has to have the discussion.

Mr. Williams: Yes; that is true, the publisher or whoever we are responsible to.

Senator Prowse: So that in the country where we are dependent to the extent we are, and we must be today, on what we read in our newspapers, your group are the people who decide what the Canadian public are going to read daily, or who are responsible for what they read—maybe I had better put it that way. TV and radio people will forgive me if I leave it at that.

Mr. Williams: Our individual members, perhaps; not the group.

Senator Prowse: It is the individual members that make up your group. I am dealing with you as an organization.

Now, we are concerned about whether Canadians are getting the kind of information that they ought to get. If they are not getting the kind of information they ought to get—and maybe they are—what specifically might be done by not just the Government, but by anybody else? Can you think of anybody that would be better able to advise us than your collective membership?

Mr. Williams: I think the whole industry must share this responsibility, sir, and not only our own role as Managing Editors.

Senator Prowse: Your job on papers, particularly, would be to argue for example with the publisher about the wages of boys in the editorial and news departments.

Mr. Williams: And the space in the newspaper.

Senator Prowse: And how much space we are going to get.

Mr. Williams: And the type of material we publish in the news services that are available to us, those that we could buy that are commercially oriented newspaper services that are available.

Senator Prowse: Now I will put this question out to any one of you gentlemen. Would you say the news that is being given to the public through the newspapers today is being adequately provided, or do we need a better calibre of person in there?

The Chairman: Better calibre of person where?

Senator Prowse: As a reporter and news writer and editorial writer, all of the way through. I do not give a damn about the advertising end of it. I mean this is business and this is going to go one way or another.

I am interested as a Canadian in what we get in the news because it affects our thinking and judgments and social attitudes. Now, are we doing a good job; could we be doing a better job? If we are to do a better job than is being done, what is necessary? Schools incentives, or what?

Now, it is a 14-barrel question. I am sorry. I think it opens a field that maybe we will get a little help from you here on.

Mr. Williams: Well, in my opinion, I believe Canadians are well served by the media. I believe we have excellent newspapers. We have an opportunity from time to time to visit with American managing editors and I am delighted and proud of our product that we have in Canada in most cases.

There are newspapers who are excellent and some less excellent. There are good stories in most newspapers; there are poorly written and poorly edited stories. There are poor headlines. This is not entirely due to staff shortages. We are producing a new product twice daily, many times daily in many cases.

The human element is very real in the presentation and editing of news. We are attracting to our industry now, a higher quality of individual. I believe generally, our publishers are allowing us greater budgets with the scope to provide more news space in the newspaper when necessary.

I think very few publishers in this country would deny a Managing Editor's recommendation if he felt he needed an extra two pages in a paper to cover a given story. Yet there are Managing Editors who would suggest they needed that extra space all of the time.

We realize we are competing for the reader's time, too. The reader only reads so much. We cannot fill the newspaper with junk. We try to fill it with pertinent information.

My answer probably is more ambitious than your question.

Senator Prowse: No; it is fair enough.

Mr. Williams: I am sorry for it.

The Chairman: Would anybody else care to speak to that question?

Mr. Robert D. Owen, Past President of Canadian Managing Editors' Conference; Editor, The Whig-Standard, Kingston: I would, for a minute. I am the Editor of the Kingston Whig-Standard and immediate Past President of this Canadian Managing Editors' Conference. I have been devoted to it since its inception. I have a feeling that the Senators here, and the listeners too, have a feeling that the Managing Editors' Conference is some sort of three-day break from a rather monotonous session or year or period or whatever you like to call it. It is not so.

The Managing Editors' Conference is pretty serious; it is a dedicated organization. I have attended all sorts of newspaper meetings and conventions on this continent and I never have attended one that pays so much attention to work and so little attention to fun, though our agenda looks rather slim.

Certainly if you are not a newspaper editor, to see that we began a session at nine and adjourned at noon, it looks like a pretty light day.

The Chairman: Except the noon hour.

Mr. Owen: Yes.

Senator Prowse: That is one you could have got along without.

Mr. Owen: It does not just stop at noon. We have all kinds of meetings of circulation groups, as Mr. Williams said, and more so.

Really, many of the talks are among newspaper people themselves in rooms and in hallways. I do not think the planned programs, as such, are very impressive when you look at them because they seem pretty dry. However, they have relevance to the whole newspaper business, the daily newspaper business.

Our concern mostly is in keeping abreast of new trends, certainly trying to attract better types of people into the news rooms. For my newspaper, and I am sure for almost all, I can say that we now do not hire people unless they are journalistic graduates either of a polytechnical school—such as Ryerson, or of a university, or at least an arts graduate.

We are raising our sights. We think our readers are becoming much more alert and much more aware of what goes on. I think newspaper readers also read and observe more than they did 10 or 20 years ago for various reasons.

Much as I hate to mention the word, television is a very constant and prominent part of our lives. I believe that newspapers today are much more seriously concerned with informing people, not just entertaining them.

I hate to sound like a preacher, but I feel the call. We are doing a very serious and honest job and trying to turn out the very best newspapers we can. My little newspaper is expanding constantly its newspaper coverage and the amount of space given to news. As a matter of fact, I think that the Kingston Whig-Standard has the largest so-called news hole of almost any newspaper in Canada. We are running about 60 per cent news on an average and will continue to do so. I hope there are others.

Senator Prowse: No commercials by the Whig-Standard. We will get a good argument going.

Mr. Owen: Well, I have said enough. I just want to try to make it clear to you that the Canadian Managing Editors' Conference is not a fun thing. We try to do the best we can to make all of the newspapers better.

The Chairman: As a past President, what would you say the greatest single achievement of the Managing Editors' Conference over the years has been?

Mr. Owen: I think to make newspaper editors aware that their occupation is a pretty serious one and a demanding one that never eases up. I am sure that 20 years ago, lots of editors thought if they could get the papers out by noon, and may be wrestle through a second edition, and forget it, that was okay.

However, I do not think that is true any more. I think we are all trying to do better, not just today, but better between editions.

The Chairman: I think Senator Everett indicated he wanted to ask a question.

Senator Everett: Mr. Williams, in the last brief that was submitted to us by the American Newspaper Guild, they spoke of the "unfair criticism of newspaper men for unsophisticated and occasionally inaccurate reporting of extremely complex and specialized subjects."

This criticism they said is "unfair to journalists who are not allowed sufficient time to research a subject or enough time on the specialized news beat to develop a thorough and sensitive understanding."

They enlarged on this statement and more or less concluded with the statement that "too many affluent newspapers still are operating with skeleton staffs and demanding impossible interpretative, in-depth reporting jobs of junior and over-worked people."

Could you tell me whether or not your association agrees with that statement, or if in fact they have discussed it at all? If they have not, could you tell me what your own personal views of that statement are?

Mr. Williams: First of all, we have not discussed it at all, sir. I guess I overheard it this morning or afternoon. I suppose there are newspapers that operate with such a tight staff. They have to perhaps. Maybe they cannot develop the trained specialist.

In my own opinion and experience, it is not a problem. We have reporters that we have been able to break off for four weeks very recently and still haven't seen the material he has written. We assigned him to do a special job.

We sent him away and we know he will come up with it. We know it is worth waiting for. We felt we could spare him for this period of time for in-depth reporting. We know it will be well-documented. It will not be a hurried job. We will display it in the newspaper when we get it.

I do not think anyone can say generally newspapers are understaffed or generally we are not able to develop specialized reporters or that we are rushing too much into print. I do not believe that that is the case.

Senator Everett: One of the criticisms I have heard is that if a reporter gets a lead on a story and he might require, in order to develop that story, four or five days of research on that particular story, many newspapers are not prepared to pay for the investment in time to take him off his normal beat and put him on that story.

Would you agree or disagree with that statement?

Mr. Williams: I would say I would disagree on the basis of my own experience.

Senator Everett: Could you tell me the feeling of the Managing Editors is generally? You must be in touch with it through these conferences. Is this a problem with papers or do you find that papers are generous with their funds in permitting reporters to follow up special leads or to research special subjects?

Mr. Williams: In my opinion, yes, we do have the resources to do such special projects.

Senator Everett: I know you have the resources, but does the publisher allow you to employ those resources?

Mr. Williams: Yes.

Senator Everett: Would that be the general view of all of the Managing Editors here?

Mr. Williams: It would be on the papers I have worked for, but I think it quite true that many papers do not devote the length of time they should to research. It is questionable.

Senator Prowse: They may not even have the facilities to do it.

Mr. Williams: Well, some of them would not. Some would not even know if they did.

The Chairman: Senator Everett.

Senator Everett: I think Mr. MacPherson has something.

Mr. William MacPherson, Managing Editor, Ottawa Citizen: It depends on resources available on any individual newspaper and they vary vastly of course; primarily depending on the size of the newspaper.

I think that so far as the conference is concerned, I suspect there would be a unanimous vote of approval of the opinion that reporters, if they come up with leads, should be given all the time they need to develop that story. I think that the Managing Editor generally would agree that that should be done.

Now, they might not in their own particular circumstances be able to do it. They might just not have the resources, but my guess would be that certainly the vast majority of the Managing Editors would be aiming towards the situation where they could devote to his resources.

Senator Everett: You are mostly an Ontario organization; are you not?

The Chairman: Senator Everett is from Winnipeg. Do you want to comment on that?

Mr. Williams: Just a lot of imports.

Senator Everett: But are there any of you there who feel that on your own papers the resources are not available to you to follow up leads and do the necessary research and turn out a good paper?

Mr. William H. Metcalfe, Treasurer, Canadian Managing Editors' Conference; Managing Editor, The Ottawa Journal: Well, it is a relative thing. Certainly the resources are available to me on the Ottawa Journal to do the kind of a job—not as much as the Globe and Mail because their resources in staff are much greater than mine. You have to figure this out. Within the limits of the staff and the establishment, I would say that our reporters are pretty good.

I think it is the same with Mr. MacPherson.

The Chairman: What about Senator Everett's point that you all are from Ontario? Is that an accident?

Mr. Williams: It happens by volunteering, eally, sir.

Senator Prowse: It is a matter of appreciation.

Mr. Williams: Our executive members are spread from Saint John, New Brunswick—at his time—to Vancouver, British Columbia. Most of them attended a meeting in Montreal about a month ago when we discussed, among other things, the presentation of this brief.

At that point, I was delegated to appear. I asked, "Who will come with me?" and fortunately, the people from Ontario said, "Yes, we can come."

Senator Prowse: It was a matter of "We can come." The important thing was "can".

The Chairman: At the May 1969 meeting, you had 45 members attend?

Mr. Williams: Yes.

The Chairman: Was there anything significant about the geographic breakdown of where they were from?

Mr. Williams: They were spread from across the country. We have found if we meet in Halifax, we will have some members from small newspapers who we would not see in Vancouver.

Similarly, in Vancouver, we will have members from small newspapers who can attend from a shorter distance.

The Chairman: Senator Bourque.

Senator Bourque: Being a French Canadian coming from Quebec, I was just wondering this. You had in 1968, 44 members and then 45 in 1969 attending the conference. I was just wondering what the proportion of French Canadians would be attending the conference—or would there be any?

Mr. Williams: Sir, we do not break them apart. I am trying to recall the number. Individually, we had perhaps eight representatives of French language newspapers, in that proportion.

Senator Bourque: Eight representatives; that would be about 20 per cent or about 18.5 percent?

Mr. Williams: Yes.

Senator Bourque: Well, I am interested in a better understanding between all of the elements of the population of Canada. I was just wondering about the fact that as I was looking it over, I found not one French Canadian on that list.

Now, we have Montreal Matin, Le Devoir, La Presse, the Petit Journal, and all these different papers. They do not send representatives to the Conference?

Mr. Williams: Yes, they do. I would not be here today except for the retirement of the Managing Editor of La Presse about a year ago. He was First Vice President and would have become President this year. He retired from his role as a newspaperman and from the organization.

Otherwise, we would have a French-speaking President this year.

The Chairman: I think Senator Bourque had another question.

Senator Bourque: Well, I was just wondering if it would not be a fair thing in the midst of this organization if they had a French Canadian there representing one of these papers. It might be a way of bringing the French press into having an interest in this.

The Chairman: I think in fairness, Senator Bourque, they did indicate that there were eight, at least, Managing Editors at the last conference. As I understand it, at the meeting which arranged for representation of that organization at this meeting, presumably none of those people volunteered to come. They were not excluded, of course.

Mr. Williams: Of course not.

Senator Bourque: They were invited?

The Chairman: Presumably, they had the opportunity of coming.

Senator Bourque: It is regrettable they did not come because it would have been to their advantage to come to this meeting. If they had any grievances on anything, they could have presented them so that we could know what the situation is in the newspaper world.

The Chairman: Well, I think, Senator Bourque, that I take your point that it is regrettable that they did not volunteer to come as part of this particular delegation; I do not think we can be critical of this delegation because they are not here.

Senator Bourque: I am just asking if they were invited and if so, why did they choose not to come?

The Chairman: I think also it is very important to assure this to you: They will be coming to subsequent hearings in the course of some this week, some next week, but not as part of this delegation.

Someone else has his hand up. Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Chairman, Mr. Owen referred to the impact of television on the newspaper. Could he give us specific instances of the ways in which newspaper journalism has changed in recent years because of the advent of television?

Mr. Owen: Television is on the scene instantly. I am talking, of course, of live television. They film something that is happening at this moment, such as the business in Chicago during the Democratic Convention. That gave a new aspect, I think, to newspaper reporting because a great number of people saw exactly what went on.

Therefore, I think as a result—not directly because of that, but because of that instance as compared to the fact—television is on the scene and does tend to make newspaper reporting more careful, more specific and certainly deeper than just a fill or something.

A newspaper reporter does vastly more, I believe, than a television camera because the reporter tries to tell the people, who either saw or did not see what the television camera showed, what went on behind it—before the event, during it and after the event.

Certainly, anything that brings news more readily into our perception should, I hope does, improve the reporting of these events.

In that way, I think perhaps television has been of some assistance certainly. I repeat, I think conscientious reporters have to be more sure of their facts and certainly more concerned with telling people why a thing occurred. Then, having assumed that the people reading it, saw it, what happened afterward.

Well, really, you do not have to be quite so serious as the brutality in Chicago; just recording a football game, the Grey Cup, that most people perhaps saw on television. I saw and read about it with the greatest interest. I wanted to see if my eye recorded what the reporters saw. Sure it all helps.

The Chairman: Did it?

Mr. Owen: Yes; in part. There was one fumble I was not sure about.

Mr. Fortier: Has Mr. Owen in mind that possibly prior to 1953, newspaper journalism was not as exact as it should have been?

Mr. Owen: You could read the implication into what I said certainly because what were the criteria, who was the critic?

Mr. Fortier: That is a very interesting example of adaptation by newspaper journalism to the electronic media. Are there other instances, Mr. Owen, that you would care to elaborate upon?

Mr. Owen: I am not going to get into an academic discussion on this subject with you or anybody else.

Mr. Fortier: We just want to hear your views.

Mr. Owen: Right. As clearly as I can express my views, I have expressed them. I do not think any newspaper owes anything to television. I think television probably owes a great deal to newspapers, but it is all a media or a medium, if you wish. Surely, it is not fair to say that because in 1952 there was not any television that newspaper reporting, as a result, was sloppy, inaccurate. I never said that. I certainly would resent anybody who implied it.

I would resent anybody who implied I said that. Newspaper reporters today, as they would have done 20 years ago, try very seriously to present a sensible picture to their readers of what happened. Now, you could say the same thing in the news picture.

Mr. Fortier: In your opinion, would you say television does a good job of reporting news, all things being relevant, or does a newspaper do a better job?

Mr. Owen: You are not going to trap me into that one. That sounds like Mr. Agnew and I do not want to be bothered with him. Television reporting is fine in certain areas. I think that because I am a newspaper man that I would say the way to find out what really happened is to read it in the newspaper.

Mr. Fortier: Would you care to answer this question, Mr. Owen? Do you find in a given community that a newspaper appeals to the same audience as television?

Mr. Owen: In a given community?

Mr. Fortier: Yes, such as Kingston. Do you find an overlapping audience?

Mr. Owen: Well, I hope so. They are either reading the newspaper or—surely you are not suggesting they read the newspaper or look at television?

Mr. Fortier: I am asking if in your experience, there is a segment of the population that does one or the other?

Mr. Owen: No. In my experience, there is no such segment.

I am not aware of it. I certainly think our circulation increases and I know that people watching television watch it more. I could not say that there is any overlapping.

Mr. Fortier: Has newspaper journalism had to adapt itself also to the evolution of radio news?

Mr. Owen: Yes; I think so.

Mr. Fortier: In what way?

Mr. Owen: Well, I think that newspaper reporting has evolved. Now, whether radio or television spurred it or not, I really do not know. I think it has, but I think more and more newspaper editors, such as I, allow reporters to speak freely, much more so than we did even 10 or 15 years ago.

However, it is such a delicate line between interpretation and editorializing that we all are frightened of allowing a relatively inexperienced reporter to make sort of asides or interpretation of what someone said. So we—newspaper editors—do not encourage that sort of thing, but I think it is a natural thing that newspapers more and more try to tell the reader, not only that Joe said this, but that Joe works in that job and therefore, there is some relationship to what he said because of what he knows.

I think that is reasonable interpretation or sort of enlargement of the story. Certainly radio and television does it all of the time. I think both of those two mediums express opinions editorially as they go about their reporting far more freely than newspaper people are allowed to do.

I think it is a weakness of both radio and television because I do not think you can make an immediate analysis. Well, you remember Nixon's speech on November 3, I think, and the blast that television people got for immediate interpretation.

I think a newspaperman, sitting down for a couple of hours and really looking at the script and thinking carefully about what he had heard and knowing his background, could make a pretty reasonable report.

Mr. Fortier: And still get a blast like that from the Washington Post?

Mr. Owen: Sure; that is fine. I think that the worst thing that could happen to newspapers is for people like that not to get up and say those terrible things—"If you don't agree with me, you have to be wrong."

The Chairman: What about a Senate Committee?

Mr. Owen: We are delighted.

The Chairman: I think Senator McElman wants to ask a question.

Mr. Fortier: I am sorry. I have one last question.

The Chairman: Perhaps you could ask it and then Senator McElman can ask his.

Mr. Fortier: Directed to Mr. Fellman—Desmond Morton of the Canadian Forum recently said, and I will quote, "It doesn't matter whether the North Bay Nugget is owned by Roy Thomson, Max Bell, or the local hardware merchant, they all represent the same business interests."

Do you agree with that statement?

Mr. Fellman: Well, it is not owned by any one of those people in the first place. No; I do not agree with that statement. We do belong to a group of newspapers, but I cannot, for the life of me see how any newspaper—particularly in our category—could have more independence or more autonomy than we have. I say that in all honesty.

Mr. Fortier: Well...

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier, do you want to explain the question more fully?

Mr. Fortier: Yes. What I really...

The Chairman: I would like Mr. Fortier to explain his question.

Mr. Fortier: Well, Mr. Morton implied that in any given community, particularly in a relatively small community, the newspaper represents the local business interest. This is the way I understood the statement. My question is do you agree with that.

Mr. Fellman: I do not agree with it. If he is implying that we are influenced by local business, I certainly...

Mr. Fortier: But it does not matter who the newspaper belongs to, whether it belongs to a group, to a chain, or local people, it is always representative of the business interests in that community.

Mr. Fellman: We certainly are dependent on local business to keep publishing.

The Chairman: I think Mr. Morton's article which I recall was saying that—would suggest to a committee like ours which is examining the ownership of newspapers, whether they belong to which company, which company owns how many papers—this is an academic question or exercise because really it is the same kind of people who own all of the newspapers in Canada.

It seems like Mr. Fortier related this to the North Bay Nugget. I think the question specifically is do you think the same kind of people own all of the newspapers in Canada.

Mr. Fellman: Well, I think there are better owners or proprietors on some than on others, certainly.

The Chairman: I think that probably is reasonable.

Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: Yes. The Guild made quite a point of secrecy of source of information to the newspaper reporter or journalist.

What is the attitude of your conference on that?

Mr. Williams: It never has been a problem except for the recently mentioned cases where a newspaper reporter or editor had to go to jail for refusing to identify a source.

It comes to the question of whether he justifies his story directly to the reader, but to his editors and there may be several. There may be a City Editor or whatever. The story is judged before it goes to the reader. It becomes a matter of taste, whether it is in good taste or fair.

I think if the story stood the test of fairness and accuracy, there is no concern about the source. If it fails that test, then the story should not have been published, in my opinion.

Senator McElman: I do not think you got the import of the question. Okay, say it is a criminal case; somebody is charged with an offence. There is a trial and a newspaper reporter said such and such a thing. You put this in your paper. You say to the reporter, "Where did you learn that?" He will say, "I have to protect my source and I will protect my source and be in contempt of court and go to jail."

Mr. Williams: It was an error in publishing something that might be considered evidence in the first place. There again, this would have failed the test; an editor would not have used it. He would have said, "This will put us in contempt. We will be liable if we use it. It is pre-trial evidence."

Senator Prowse: If a paper wants to publish something, they are going to take the risk if they think it important enough to be published.

Mr. Williams: If it is important enough.

Senator Prowse: If you are satisfied it is true and it is important enough to publish, it will be published and to hell with what happens.

Mr. Williams: Yes, sir. The defence normally is truth.

Senator McElman: Apparently you were not here when the Guild meeting was discussed.

Mr. Williams: Yes.

Senator McElman: Well, their suggestion was perhaps this should be written into law, such a protection of source be provided in law. Do you feel that is necessary? Do you feel it was worth consideration?

Mr. Williams: I am afraid I have not given sufficient consideration to make a judgment which would be a snap judgment. I think it is not necessary because it is not something that has been proven necessary. I could be wrong.

Senator McElman: Well, there are current cases that have just been brought before the courts.

Secondly, what attitude would your organization take towards a press council, not with Government intervention, but a self-policing type of press council—such as they have currently in the U.K.?

Mr. Williams: We have discussed this many times. There is a great deal of divergence of views of the Managing Editors. I think among publishers or anyone in the country, individually, many of us favour some.

Generally, I believe we do not see a national press council. Some people favour a purely local press council; others say it should be regional. We have not reached agreement on it and I do not think we will do so.

Senator McElman: You would have no recommendation as an organization at this point?

Mr. Williams: We have taken a very close look at the press council that is functioning in Quebec. Some of our members do favour such an organization provincially. Others think it should not be provincial. Some think it should be local. The association has taken no stand on it.

The association is not a policy-making organization. Whether that is right or wrong, I am not prepared to say. We have made very few recommendations. Personally I think we should, but we are not going to discuss that now.

We never have submitted any formal recommendation or resolution in connection with our profession. We did take one little stand two or three years ago on people in the business seeking greater access and I think it was a measure of success.

That is the only time I can remember during the 20 years I have been a member.

The Chairman: Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: Having heard the Guild today, is there any preference among Managing Editors for guild or...

Mr. Williams: I am sorry.

Senator McElman: Is there any preference with Managing Editors for dealing with Guild or craft unions?

Senator Prowse: They do not have the choice.

Mr. Williams: I would assume, sir, most individuals would hope for as much freedom to manoeuvre as they can. Anything that restricts their ability to shift people to where they can be used for the greatest advantage for the ultimate product would be a confining restriction on that. As far as our own organization, I have no experience in this line. Perhaps one of the other gentlemen who has more experience in crafts would like to say something.

The Chairman: Do you care to comment on that, Mr. MacPherson?

Mr. MacPherson: Just to make sure I understand the question, you are saying as between the two types of unions, which would we prefer?

Senator McElman: Yes.

Mr. MacPherson: Well, I am not aware of any situation whereby a Managing Editor would deal with a craft union. If he is dealing with a union, it certainly would be the ANG in this country, invariably.

Senator Prowse: Is there any other union that is organizing in that area?

Mr. MacPherson: No; by and large no.

The Chairman: Does the Managing Editors' Conference enjoy any relationship with the Canadian Daily Newspaper Association?

Mr. Williams: Some of our members of the Managing Editors Conference are, because of their role in their own newspaper, members of CDNPA. However, there is no direct relationship.

The Chairman: I would like a comment again. Perhaps I am repeating; I apologize. In reading your brief and in listening to presentations, it seems to me that there is a great deal of merit in the Managing Editors convening annually.

Undoubtedly you feel it is of benefit to yourselves, and I suppose that as a by-product of that, it is of benefit to the people who are reading your newspapers. Would you comment on that?

Again I come back to the fact there is no continuing forum; there is no continuing representation. I wonder why.

Mr. Williams: Because of the role of the individual in other organizations, we feel there is a lot of continuity built in to the Canadian newspaper industry, some through their involvement with Canadian Press, some through CDNPA—but Managing Editors, no. We never have established the machinery; we have not felt this was an important role for us to take.

The Chairman: And you do not feel it is?

Mr. Williams: I would like to see more continuity.

Mr. Fellman: There also is the problem that the Managing Editors, whatever decision they may take, may be working in direct opposition to the man they work for, the publisher.

The Chairman: Does that happen frequently?

Mr. Fellman: It does with me.

The Chairman: Senator Prowse.

Senator Prowse: I was a little impressed this morning when the CDNPA were here. They obviously are interested to see where the money comes from and they have a well financed and well oiled machine for the purpose of making sure the flow is continuous and amply increasing.

Yet, from a social point of view, I think probably we have a greater interest in what you are doing which is the supply of news.

This would be your concern. Ours, I suppose, is it would be interesting to have your answer to it. Would it be possible or desirable to have a section of the Canadian Daily Newspaper Association given over to the particular types of problems that you have to deal with in your day-to-day operations? In other words, the type of people that you have available as staff and the problems you have in getting news, questions which come to my mind about access and diversity of opinion.

Mr. Williams: I think the function of each of us is in our own organization.

The Chairman: Senator Prowse.

Senator Prowse: But I was wondering if you had given any thought to it. It is pretty obvious this morning that one organization is well financed and you are not, which I think almost leads you to come to the conclusion that something must be important enough to put some money up and something else is not important enough to put money up for.

Mr. Williams: I am sure that if our organization were scheduled to dissolve for lack of funds, we would receive the needed support, if not from CDNPA, at least the individuals who are members of CDNPA.

As of this moment, we have needed none of this support, sir.

Senator Prowse: You problems are at your local level and there is some value in the interchange of information, but you do not really have a common interest right across the country like they have, dealing with national advertisers. Would that be a fair statement?

Mr. Owen: Well, I do not think it is a fair statement at all. I think our organization, our interest in across-the-country news is equally as great as the money-hunting members of the CDNPA—and the President is sitting immediately behind us, so watch yourselves.

Just because we do not spend an awful lot of money on our conference, surely that is not an indication that it is pointless or useless or even under-subscribed.

As Mr. Williams says, I know, at least I hope I know, that if the Canadian Managing Editors' Conference suddenly found themselves desperately in need of money, destitute, that our publishers would leap to our defence, even at the cost of the CDNPA treasury. I may be speaking a little enthusiastically. At least there is a possibility.

Senator Prowse: The next question I have has to do with one of the problems that everybody is aware of—certainly you are, and we are becoming aware of it. There seems to be a growing necessity for there to be one-newspaper areas out of Toronto, Vancouver, Winnipeg, Montreal. Nearly all of you operate in one-newspaper areas.

Now where you have in mind the importance of what you are doing in putting out the information—also keeping in mind the fact there is increasing tendency for the newspaper to be the in-depth and interpretive section of the news provision—how do we deal with the problem of maintaining your credibility? When you are in that position, you immediately become suspect. I am not saying you are necessarily, that you ought to be suspect, but people tend to be suspicious of one newspaper.

Now the question is how do we provide access of people to the newspaper columns without throwing away what has to be somebody's right to decide what is printed, and at the same time, insure that there is complete diversity of opinion or as wide diversity of opinion as possible so that the individual member of the public who is going to have to make up his mind will be able to base that on as wide as possible a diversity of opinion?

Have you given any thought to that question because I think it is a real one?

Mr. Williams: Sir, we must not assume because a newspaper happens to be the only one published in its community that it is without competition or its readers are without alternatives. There are many sources of information for our readers. To prove that, we provide opportunities for dissent.

I think the reader has to decide for himself. On the newspaper we encourage dissent. On our own newspaper we seek other opinions for our editorial page. When we are presenting one point of view, we try and get the other side. If we are covering a labour dispute, we make sure we get labour and management sides.

The reader must see this. I am sure if we did not, if newspapers generally did not provide the complete story, the readers would not be fooled. They would know very quickly and the newspaper would fail.

Senator Prowse: Would there be any value in having a provision that is similar to the one they have in the United States? First of all you have to identify somewhere in the papers, somewhere else or at regular intervals, who has the beneficial ownership in the shares of the newspaper. I think all of you would pretty well tell who your editors and publishers are now.

Then go on down and in every case where a story contains any element of interpretation or opinion, as compared to just the bare bones news stories, we used to know that this would be a signed article so that people can then evaluate whose opinion they are reading.

Mr. Williams: You mean sign every editorial?

Senator Prowse: You have an editorial. Where you have the ownership of papers, the editorials I don't think constitute that much of a problem. What I have more in mind is the article, and many are not signed articles, but they tend to be interpretive. This is the tendency today, to tell people what the news means.

Now, we used to have problems when all we were doing was selecting news or facts to be fair. Now, at the moment we start to get beyond where we are selecting facts to the point where we also are selecting opinions, it gets pretty damned difficult to be fair. Maybe we cannot be fair.

What I have in mind is if you can say this is so and so's opinion, for example, a column signed, you know who you are reading and make allowances. You know what business because it shows through. However, an ordinary story in the newspaper coming through, there is no way of knowing what the particular bias of the fellow was, who wrote the story, whereas if you knew what business he was in, you could say, "Oh, well, they got carried away here. I will buy this much. I will not take this."

Is there anything useful that can be done along that line?

Mr. Williams: If a story as obviously biased comes to us, the Copy Editor's job is to handle it so there is not so much bias. I am sure it is an important part of the job of the Copy Editor to remove the bias.

Many newspapers encourage their reporters, when they are covering something in which they themselves may be interested, to give us two stories. Let us have the hard facts of the report; then do us a piece for the editorial page—a by-line column.

Senator Prowse: That is how you try to cover that today.

Mr. Williams: We get rid of bias news stories. Otherwise we make sure the reader knows it is biased.

The Chairman: Mr. Fellman.

Mr. Fellman: I think a lot of papers are adopting the habit of using little boxes in opinionated stories with the word "analysis" written in it as a sort of tip-off to the reader that this is not just a routine news story, that it is an interpretive story and you can expect some opinion on it. I personally think it is a good way of treating the story.

The Chairman: Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: Mr. Williams, in your last comment, you say in such an event you would get rid of bias. What would your feeling be of only partisan reporters? For instance, do you feel it would be appropriate for only partisan persons to sit in the press gallery of the Parliament of Canada or in the Provincial Legislature?

Mr. Williams: I would assume that would be a problem for a publisher, his employer.

Senator McElman: That is what I asked. Do you think it would be appropriate? We had the other side of the coin here with the Guild suggesting that they should be able to move into partisan activities individually.

Mr. Williams: Personally, I would very much hate to see that a newspaper that I work for had this.

Senator Prowse: You would pretty nearly have to have a partisan for every party; would you not?

The Chairman: Senator McElman, do you want to ask more on that point?

Are there other questions, Senators?

I think we might soon adjourn. Are there others who might like to ask questions of the people here? Perhaps this will be the last time I will ask you.

Mr. Fortier?

Senator MacDonald?

Senator Macdonald: As the Guild mentioned this afternoon when they were trying to organize a certain newspaper, they met with a considerable degree of resistance, to put it mildly.

Would the Managing Editor be the one to say whether they recognize the union or would that be the publisher?

Mr. Williams: I assume it would be the publisher.

Senator Prowse: On the recommendation from the Managing Editor?

Mr. Williams: You might hear from him or solicit his views.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

At these annual conferences, Mr. Williams, have there ever been discussions on control exercised by individual publishers on the news contents of newspapers?

Mr. Williams: I cannot recall one, sir. We discussed what we considered to be the right amount of space and how to apportion it, but I cannot recall a special discussion.

Mr. Fortier: No complaints ever have reached your ears along those lines?

Senator Prowse: Recently.

The Chairman: Would you like to go further on that, Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: No.

The Chairman: I would like to ask one other question, Mr. Williams. You stated orally, and please correct me if I am wrong, that the Managing Editors' Conference is particularly futuristic in its thinking and that you are interested in keeping the Managing Editors across the country current in what is happening in the industry.

Mr. Williams: This is one of our projects.

The Chairman: In your brief it says "anticipated changes in technology." Could you comment on the changes that you have anticipated?

Mr. Williams: Some of us have seen developments with cathode ray tubes which will provide editing facilities, improved methods of type-setting, changes in the actual press equipment and in the mechanical processes.

I think the newspaper production starts in the news room. There is a great deal of work done in the other departments, but the production on shift starts in the news room. I think Managing Editors are all very interested.

At our next meeting in Winnipeg, we hope to have a display from an American firm which will demonstrate the CRT combined with a typewriter, which I think only a handful have seen. We are going to have demonstrations of facsimile equipment which one or two newspapers are using. We will see a Canadian press which is used to transmit material from one source to another. It may eliminate the need of the teletype between bureau offices and head offices.

Some of us are closer to these than some other newspapers. For this reason, we are trying to introduce these to the members at the next meeting.

The Chairman: It is going to concentrate on technology; is it?

Mr. Williams: This will be a part of it.

The Chairman: Also on page 3, paragraph 7, you make reference to "The changes in reading habits of subscribers". Are there changes in the reading habits of subscribers?

Would you care to comment on that? What are the changes?

Mr. Williams: This really related to what Mr. Owen talked about a few minutes ago, the impact of television, the type of material our reader now has. The reader has the time to read and wants to read. There is an increased sophistication of our readership. This is what we are trying to keep ahead of.

The Chairman: Do you think they are more sophisticated because of television?

Mr. Williams: Of course television does have a role. It is no longer easy to tell a person from a rural area from one from the city. This may, in part, be credited to television.

The Chairman: You are assuming that is a good thing?

Mr. Williams: Oh, yes. They say magazines also have quite a bit of influence.

The Chairman: Do you do a continuing study of reader habits as a conference?

Mr. Williams: No, sir. But those individuals who have access through their own organization will within certain limits make it available to others.

The Chairman: So the readership study has been done by the Managing Editor of, let us say the Toronto Star, the Managing Editor might bring it to all of you?

Mr. Williams: Yes.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. We are most grateful to the six of you for coming. I think you have assisted us materially.

I will adjourn the meeting in just one moment. For the members of the committee and other people who are interested, tomorrow's agenda is as follows: We start at 10 a.m.; we will be receiving the Canadian Press and Broadcast News Ltd.; 2.30 p.m., the Windsor Star; 4.00 p.m., The St. John's Evening Telegram; 8.00 p.m., Mr. Claude Ryan. All of the meetings are in 356S.

Thank you.

The Committee adjourned.

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Wednesday, December 10, 1969

The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 10.00 a.m.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, I will call this meeting to order.

This morning we have briefs from the Canadian Press and from Broadcast News. Sitting immediately on my right is Mr. J. R. I. Sutherland, who as well as being the publisher, president and managing editor of the New Glasgow News in Nova Scotia is also the president of the Canadian Press.

Sitting on his immediate right is the general manager of the Canadian Press, John Dauphinee.

On my immediate left is Mr. W. A. Speers who as well as being vice-president of Selkirk Holdings Limited is the president of Broadcast News.

Sitting immediately on his left is Mr. Charles Edwards, the general manager of Broadcast News Limited.

Now, there are other representatives here from Broadcast News and from Canadian Press but I will let the presidents of the respective organizations introduce those gentlemen.

We have received briefs from Canadian Press and Broadcast News more than three weeks ago as we requested and the briefs, gentlemen, have been circulated to the Senators and presumably studied by the Senators, and so for the purposes of our discussion this morning we will take those briefs as read.

I am proposing, honourable Senators, that we will deal with both of these briefs at the same time and therefore I am going to ask first of all Mr. Sutherland to take perhaps ten minutes and summarize the CP brief or talk about it, discuss it, expand it; indeed talk about anything you may wish, sir.

Following your ten minutes I will perhaps turn to Mr. Speers for a ten minute resume of his brief or anything else you may wish to say and following that we will be open to the floor for questions from the Senators—questions which may be on the content of your brief or things which you may say this morning, or anything else indeed which the Senators wish to discuss.

Mr. Sutherland, would you introduce the rest of your team?

Submission of:

Beside him, Mr. Gabriel Gilbert with Quebec Le Soleil, a member of the Canadian Press Executive Committee.

Next, Mr. Gillis Purcell, former general manager.

Perhaps I should say that I am here under the great experience of roughly two weeks because Gil Purcell retired on November 25th, 1969, after 24 years as general manager, Beside Mr. Purcell, Mr. William Stewart, Chief of our Montreal bureau, from which we operate our service in French. Beside him, Mr. Larry Lepp, who is the chief of broadcast news in Quebec Province.

Mr. J. R. H. Sutherland: Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen. If you visit the news room of the Canadian Press, at 55 University Avenue in Toronto, you can't miss seeing a beaver pelt behind glass on the wall near the entrance.

Everyone in the head office editorial staff passes it on the way to and from his work. Inscribed on the pelt is this tribute to Canada's national news co-operative:

"In pursuing its objective of independent, factual and unbiased information its contribution to informed citizenship has been of enormous importance. At the same time it has given Canadians everywhere a glowing feeling of what it means to be a part of Canada."

That beaver pelt was presented to CP in 1957, one of the first citizenship awards made by the Canadian Citizenship Council.

The paragraph I read to you is a good summary of the job CP was formed to do, the job its staff tries earnestly to do every day.

CP isn't very good at blowing its own horn but Canadian editors and publishers, Canadian broadcasters, public and private, newspapermen and particularly news agency men around the world know what CP means. It means a really top-notch news service; one that this country or any other country can be proud of.

The CP brief which has been in your hands wasn't intended to sell anything. It was just supposed to be a business-like and factual document trying to give you some idea of how CP works, what it tries to do, and some of its problems.

One of our past presidents wrote that he was disappointed about this; that the brief didn't do enough to overcome an impression that CP is nothing more than an efficient organization without a soul.

Here is a great national institution whose service to the country should be played up, not down.

Well, I can tell you something about what CP means.

I come from a small Nova Scotia town. The New Glasgow News, the paper I represent, has a circulation under ten thousand. It is a small newspaper.

Because of CP, and only because of CP, the New Glasgow News can have the same news report as is provided for much larger papers in Sydney and Halifax and Saint John and Moncton and Quebec and Montreal, and so on across Canada.

If I do my job as a publisher, the people in my community can be as well informed as any Canadian. That same basic news report, a blending of CP's own Canadian and world news, with the news of its associated worldwide agencies, Associated Press, Reuters and Agence France Presse, is available to newspapers and broadcasters large and small from St. John's, Newfoundland and Victoria and Prince Rupert. Yes, and even to the Yukon. The Far North's brand new first daily, the Yukon News, is now getting CP service in Whitehorse.

It happens that I am the longest service member of the Canadian Press with 33 years. In all that time no step of the organization has been more satisfying in my view than the setting up of the French language service.

A service in French started in 1951 as a pre-translated service with six editors in Montreal.

Now, there are 21 editors and reporters, 12 at Montreal, five (and a sixth has just been authorized by the Canadian Press) in Quebec, three at Ottawa, one at Toronto, a staff correspondent in Paris as a member of our French language staff to write the French.

The service is no longer just a translation service. Its aim is to cover in French all major events that occur anywhere in Canada.

Its reporters are assigned abroad on occasions when there are happenings of particular Canadian concern. More than half of all its news service in French is original French-copy news from its own reporters for French language newspapers and broadcasting stations and from the world service of Agence France Presse.

Improvement in the French service, as in the English language service, is gradual but steady.

For instance, in the last few weeks the amount of news delivered from the night French wire has been increased by seven or eight columns, so that now the French language papers get as much news in French on their wire as English language papers get in English.

The charge by the news service is the same whether it is delivered in French or English. This of course depends on the circulation of the papers involved.

Another great development has been the establishment of a comprehensive news service specifically prepared for broadcasters. I shall leave it to my colleague and good friend, Bill Speers of Vancouver, the president of our associated company, Broadcast News Limited, to deal with that.

I should like to draw your attention to a few paragraphs of our CP brief that describe our news operation.

Starting on page 8, paragraph 37:

"The national news agency in a confederation has a hard task. CP has tried to cover the local news of small communities, the news of the metropolitan cities, the news of the provinces, "the news of the developing north and Yukon, the news of Ottawa and Parliament."

Paragraph 38:

"CP is non-political, non-regional, non-racial, non-factional in its approach to news. Its members papers represent every phase of Canadian character and opinion."

Paragraph 39:

"The only way a news organization of this scope could possibly serve all its masters is to serve objectively, accurately, carefully. CP avoids sensational journalism. Its goal is integrity and reliability."

Paragraph 40:

"Nowhere is the attainment of that goal more difficult than in reporting political news from the legislatures and Parliament. Many of the larger papers have their own correspondents writing their reports and impressions and opinions on some of the debates and the bills that come forward. It is CP's task not to select "only the big news, or just the sensational or controversial, but to cover all the news that should be covered."

Paragraph 41:

"CP must report on the state of agriculture and the development of housing and the price of fish and the advances of science, art and health. We must report on welfare schemes and tax revenues, on the revolution in transport and our labour laws and so on. If it is news of importance to any sizeable group of Canadians, CP must try to get it out to the papers and broadcasting stations across Canada. That is why CP has its own reporters and editors in Ottawa and the provincial legislatures with the exception of Charlottetown, so that all the papers and broadcasters get all of the news at a reasonable cost."

The paragraph goes on but I would merely like to mention here that CP of course must cover sport and must gather news of particular interest to women.

The brief goes on to explain how CP's Canadian news is the news of Canada which goes to foreign lands through news agencies that work with CP AP, Reuters and AFP.

It mentions just briefly the constant discussions that are being held on service improvements. Meetings of publishers and the owners of broadcasting stations and also meetings of the men and women on the news desks of the country, the people who deal with the CP news report on a day to day, minute to minute basis. In 11 years the total budget has more than doubled, from just under three million to more than six million.

The editorial staff is one-third larger and now stands at 180. Two additions, one at Ottawa and one at Quebec, have been authorized for 1970.

I mentioned a budget of $6 million. That doesn't include the large expenditures made by all the newspapers in gathering the news which goes into the pool, or the contributions coming from most of the broadcasting stations through their news department.

Just two more paragraphs from our brief:

Paragraph 48:

"The CP by-law states that membership in the co-operative "shall be open to the widest extent compatible with the expectation that the newspaper to be represented can be established and maintained as a self-sustaining business enterprise. No applicant for membership has been turned down in the last 35 years."

Section 49—under the heading of Freedom and Responsibility:

"It is submitted, in conclusion, that by the very nature of its organization and by the character of the traditions that have formed and maintain it, the Canadian Press believes in the freedom and the responsibility of the press and tries to serve those beliefs 24 hours a day throughout the year."

The Chairman: Thank you very much. I think perhaps before we have questions we might have your statement please, Mr. Speers.

Mr. Speers: Thank you Mr. Chairman. Honourable Senators:

May I begin by making a correction in paragraph 6 of the Broadcast News brief. At the time the brief was written, Mr. Gillis Purcell was the general manager of Canadian Press and chief executive officer of Broadcast News and as you have learned, since that time he has retired and Mr. John Dauphinee now holds that position.

The wire service started by Broadcast News Limited is the basic international and national news service to almost every privately owned broadcasting service in Canada.

We have achieved this position by providing what we feel is an outstanding service. As noted in paragraph 15 of our submission we report objectively all aspects of the news, interpreting the facts but not expressing its own opinions.

Also, BN participates actively in the training and development of editors and reporters in the private stations across the country.

As a result we feel our news audiences of our subscribing radio and television stations are as well and as accurately informed of events at home and abroad as the people of any country in the world.

Although Broadcast News was not established until 1953, the private stations had access to Canadian Press News long before that.

CP established a special wire for Canadian radio in 1941 through a CP company, Press News Limited. Press News provided a good service for broadcasting but it operated strictly under the direction of the Canadian Press.

We people in private broadcasting felt that we should have the same development in our news services. From time to time we investigated the possibility of setting up our own news service but the question of developing the best possible news service for the private stations came to a head with the advent of television.

We broadcasters recognized that television would become a vital medium for dissemination of news and we recognized also that television would take over from radio much of the audience seeking merely entertainment.

For many radio stations, the future appeared to lie in developing information broadcasting. News broadcasting would be vital for the continued existence of many radio stations.

The Canadian Press proposed to the private stations that they join with CP in the operation of a company whose sole purpose would be to provide news service for privately owned Canadian radio and television.

Radio and television competed strongly with newspapers for advertising revenue and some broadcasters had serious doubts about the sincerity of the CP newspapermen inviting us to join them in developing a good news service.

Nevertheless, we agreed to give it a try and the result was the organization of Broadcast News.

Now, we have no doubt that Canadian Press was sincere. From the outset broadcasters and newspapermen have worked together harmoniously on the BN board of directors. Their joint effort has developed what we feel is an outstanding service.

We recognize that we cannot stand still but must continue to improve and expand service as communication makes the world smaller whetting the news appetite of the Canadian people.

As noted in paragraph 3 of our submission we feel that a joint effort of broadcasters and newspapers in operation of a strong national news service would serve the country better than independent operation by each group.

We are pretty proud of what we have accomplished. The broadcasters are glad that we can contribute to the news pool with first-hand tips and sometimes the essential details of many of the important news stories breaking in Canada.

In Broadcast News we are proud that our predecessor, Press News, established the first news service in French to operate on this continent. Press News started its French service in 1945 with only four French language radio stations taking their service. Today, they broadcast news service in French operating from Montreal, serving a total of 60 stations, 45 AM radio stations, 5 FM stations, and 10 television stations.

We are also proud that we have been leaders in other areas of news. BN pioneered on this continent the first service of Voice reports of news operated outside the network. Our Voice service continues to be strong despite the entry of four other audio news services in private broadcasting in Canada.

Our submission was prepared as a factual outline of how Broadcast News operates. We shall be happy to provide any further information that any of you may require.

The Chairman: Thank you very much.

Honourable Senators, I think we can address our questions to Mr. Sutherland or to Mr. Speers and I assume to your general managers, Mr. Dauphinee from Canadian Press and to Mr. Edwards of Broadcast News and indeed to the rest of your team.

It would be helpful then if the Senators did indicate to which person the question is asked.

Mr. Sutherland: May I ask that the questions in French not be directed to the president. We have people here who could answer them.

The Chairman: Fine.

Senator Prowse: How is Canadian Press financed?

Mr. Sutherland: By assessment from the member newspapers. We sell news to the broadcasting units.

Senator Prowse: How do you charge for this?

Mr. Sutherland: The charges to the newspapers are based on circulation. Basically, the total cost is broken up in units and put out. We are a co-operative.

Senator Prowse: You are a non-profit co-operative?

Mr. Sutherland: Oh, yes.

Senator Prowse: As far as you are able to work that?

Mr. Sutherland: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Well, what I had in mind is usually you have to end up the year with either a little on the plus or a little on the minus side, and you can make your own financial adjustments.

Mr. Sutherland: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Do you have a contract with Broadcast News as such?

Mr. Sutherland: Yes.

Senator Prowse: And they have entered into contracts with individual subscribers?

Mr. Sutherland: The purpose of the separate corporation, sir, is to give the broadcasting people an opportunity to be represented. The Canadian Press is basically newspapers and we as a co-operative—we are all members. It would be unfair to the broadcasting industry and the local newspaper industry to control this source of news so we have a separate corporation.

But that question really should be directed to Mr. Speers, who is a broadcaster.

Senator Prowse: What is the basic source of your news? Where does this come from?

Mr. Sutherland: Well, the basic source of the news is the pooling by the individual newspapers, and in recent years the news that is put into the pool from the broadcasters, and I think it is well over half.

The broadcasters have a more competitive situation and I suppose I can say that we have been building up a co-operative spirit. We pool the news and if it is not put in, you don't get it out.

Senator Prowse: I think in the newspapers the practice is that a fellow writes a story and he makes a duplicate and the duplicate goes to the CP people. Is this correct?

Mr. Sutherland: In the larger sense. That isn't always possible in the smaller papers such as my own. In a paper of my size, it is my responsibility.

Senator Prowse: You can't afford it?

Mr. Sutherland: Well, we are 100 miles from the nearest bureau.

Senator Prowse: How do you get your news to them then?

Mr. Sutherland: By wire or by telephone. When I say by wire, I mean what we can't punch out ourselves.

Senator Prowse: Well, where there is a bureau the dupes go across.

Mr. Sutherland: Yes.

Senator Prowse: And where there isn't a bureau then you report through to them anything you think might be of interest to them?

Mr. Sutherland: That is the basis of it and we are increasing our capacity to go out and get our own. You take a place like Ottawa where there is so much going on—to avoid concentrating on the sensational and controversial and bigger news of the day, leaving the other interest uncovered, we have a larger force here and we go and cover it.

Senator Prowse: How many reporters do you have in your Canadian Press staff across Canada?

Mr. Sutherland: I have the figure here, sir, 180, which includes two to be found and appointed this year. This is in French and in English.

Mr. Dauphinee: The figure of 180 is the figure of the Canadian Press editorial staff as a whole. We have relatively few reporters because we can draw on the news resources of all our member newspapers, 103 of them across the country, and we have access to the production of all their reports.

In a city like Edmonton there may be a day when we have no reporter on the streets whatever, but on the other hand, we have perhaps 100 Edmonton Journal reporters whose copy is coming into our office for us to select and to distribute. We are in effect a sort of clearing house.

We take all the news that is gathered by the Canadian daily newspapers, and as Mr. Speers said, by many broadcasters, and we process that news for distribution outside the place where it takes place.

Senator Prowse: Well, your own reporters—where do you use them? If you have access to all the other things and they are doing a job, what do you need reporters for?

Mr. Dauphinee: Well, Ottawa is a case in point. We do a basic job of covering Parliament and government. In other places we may need a story faster than a newspaper does because of deadline problems.

For example, an event that happened at 4 o'clock in the afternoon is too late for the Edmonton Journal so we need it for Broadcast News and we need it for the Vancouver Province for their first edition and the first edition perhaps in Montreal.

Senator Prowse: Do your reports carry your own reports of an event plus the local report, or do you just carry a composite report that is set up by your editors?

Mr. Dauphinee: If we have our own reporters on the job, primarily we use our own copy. We use the output of our own men and against that copy we check all the other material that is available to us from other reporters.

A job that one of our fellows on this hearing does, may in fact incorporate something that was reported by an Ottawa Journal man. Of course, this would take place when our fellow for some reason or other didn't report.

Senator Prowse: Well, with Canadian Press then we get a complete coverage of what the local papers are covering across Canada plus any additions to that for various reasons your own people go out and get?

Mr. Dauphinee: Well, according to the judgment of our editors. According to the judgment of our editors along the line who for one reason or another may send less of a given story to Vancouver than, say, is delivered in Halifax.

Senator Prowse: Because of what?

Mr. Dauphinee: Well, local interest.

Mr. Sutherland: I may interject something here along the line of your thinking. We are also developing through Canadian Press stories of a national nature and I think you may develop that.

Mr. Dauphinee: Well, take for instance, the price of fish.

Senator Prowse: Personally, I would be more interested in the sale of wheat.

Mr. Sutherland: We do develop on a national basis stories which aren't local and might not be possible either by assigning one man or two men or by gathering data from each of the bureaus and putting them together.

Senator Prowse: And this would be a headquarters decision—where is your headquarters?

Mr. Sutherland: The head office is in Toronto.

Senator Prowse: If we were after a national story, and you felt you get an inkling from, let's say your fish story, then you would take your Toronto bureau and you would put a man on picking up the story at that end.

Mr. Dauphinee: The idea for that story may come from St. John's, Newfoundland and so St. John's normally would ask our Halifax office, "How about a story on fish prices across Canada?" and assuming that this seems to be an interesting story because of news interest at the time, we would then say to all our offices across the country "Report on the price of fish."

We would specify what type of fish we are talking about so that we would get uniform figures on the same product coast-to-coast.

At some other city—perhaps it would be Halifax, because that would be a point of main interest—all that material would be put together and we would deliver it to papers across the country—a story which gives the national picture on what started out to be a local situation.

Senator Prowse: Now, generally the broadcasters are interested in a pretty well capsule form of news, is that true?

Mr. Speers: Well, it's true, I think, that we write stories more briefly in Broadcast News. Many of the broadcasting stations also get Canadian Press wires for amplification. This may be necessary on any story and particularly in local interest.

Senator Prowse: In other words, you would get comment from various places and perhaps the same thing would come into Canadian Press?

Mr. Speers: Well, we have access to the full Canadian Press wires.

Senator Prowse: Do you get the Canadian Press wire as well as Broadcast News wire?

Mr. Sutherland: At the cost of delivery, yes. This is for checking purposes.

The Chairman: Do most stations get both services?

Mr. Edwards: There are 42 stations I believe that have a Canadian Press wire or more. Some of them have three Canadian Press wires. Our contract provides for Broadcast News wires which all subscribers take, and the Canadian Press wire is available to them if they so desire. This is done at the cost of delivery.

Senator Prowse: Now, the Canadian Press wire is available to anybody who wants to subscribe, or do we have to make an application?

Mr. Sutherland: You have to make an application.

Senator Prowse: So, if I want to start a paper in Edmonton I have to make an application to you is that correct?

Mr. Sutherland: That is correct.

Senator Prowse: What things would you look at in determining whether I could get it or not?

Mr. Sutherland: Well, we would want to be sure you are seriously going into the paper business.

Senator Prowse: All right, let's assume that I am seriously going to the newspaper business. Now, what do I have to do to get it?

Mr. Sutherland: You make an application and we are primarily interested in the fact that you are not going to be a "fly-by-nighter."

Senator Prowse: Why?

Mr. Sutherland: Because we are not interested in assisting something that would disturb the rest of the newspapers.

If you are seriously considering going into the newspaper business and you start out as they did in Whitehorse, you can get one.

Senator Prowse: Let's suppose that I start in Edmonton a give-away sheet which I put into every home in Edmonton. This would give me a circulation of roughly 100,000 in the city.

I am not too concerned about getting outside because I have problems in distribution so perhaps you could tell us a little about that too.

Supposing I decide that I would like to break my ads up, with news, and I make an application to you now for Canadian Press service.

Mr. Sutherland: Excuse me sir, I don't quite follow you. You said you would like to break your ads up?

Senator Prowse: Well, I am sorry I didn't express myself. I think what we should do is have a little space between the ads in order that the little advertiser isn't going to get lost amongst the big ads, and we want to run news items in between.

Mr. Sutherland: I would not be very sympathetic to you sir. However, I think perhaps Mr. Dauphinee could handle this one.

We have a regular procedure which is being amended. It is being changed and we are rather proud of the last paragraph made here that no application for membership has been turned down in the last 35 years. I think that in general is your answer.

Mr. John Dauphinee: The by-laws of the Canadian Press—part 3, section 1—under New Membership. It says:

"Membership in the corporation should be open to the widest extent compatible with the expectation that the newspaper to be represented can be established and maintained as a self-sustaining business enterprise."

That is the only restriction on membership.

Senator Prowse: In other words, if I happen to have a million dollars and I want to go ahead and exercise my God-given right to lose my money, you are not going to let me do it?

Mr. Sutherland: No sir.

Senator Prowse: You will let me do it?

Mr. Sutherland: Well, we are not going to take that attitude.

Mr. Dauphinee: We have had cases like that sir, in the last few years. One was in Montreal—Nouveau Journal—which had CP service and similarly the Vancouver Times which had CP service when it started, and they ran into trouble.

Senator Prowse: Now, where a newspaper wants to start up, and when you set the price for a paper that is just starting, what would be the fees for a paper just starting?

Mr. Sutherland: It would depend on the size, sir. It would depend on the size and the range of circulation. The one that you cite would be a little awkward for us. We have never had one.

We have a thing called the ABC, which is the Audit Bureau of Circulations, and they measure the number of papers that are sold.

Senator Prowse: Well, I am starting, so we don't know.

Mr. Dauphinee: We base it on estimated circulation.

Senator Prowse: The reason I asked you this question is that I have been informed that if a paper is starting up, normally the fees will be about 25 per cent above what it would be for a paper that had been in operation for let's say ten years.

Mr. Sutherland: Well sir, this is a co-operative which is more than 50 years old. The various members which are that old, and the newer members, have been pumping money in and feel that somebody new coming in should make a contribution to that capital which has been accumulated over the years. Our present set-up is spread out so as to be as painless as possible.

Mr. Dauphinee: The fee structure is covered in article 3, section 5, under the heading of Continuity Discount. It says:

"In recognition of continuity of membership a new member's assessment shall be reduced by five per cent after one year, by ten per cent after two years, by fifteen per cent after three years, by twenty per cent after four years and by twenty-five per cent after five years."

So a paper that has been in business for five years is, as you say, paying roughly 25 per cent less than when it started.

Senator Prowse: Well, the first thing that I would have to do as I understand it—let's just suppose that we are starting this mythical paper, the first thing I would have to do would be pay this franchise fee and let's just suppose that I have a paper to start with. There is no basic charge to start with?

Mr. Dauphinee: Well, as I mentioned in the clauses, sir, the fees are set that way. There is no fee or franchise fee as you call it at all. It is a service fee for services rendered.

Senator Prowse: So, what you do during the first year—this is the way you collect the interest he has, and the rest is by a slightly higher fee at the beginning?

Mr. Sutherland: Yes.

Mr. Dauphinee: You have the cost of administration and installation and so on. Over the course of five years this reduction is provided in terms of a long-term business relationship in the co-operative and there is a reduced charge.

Senator Prowse: What I am looking at—so that we are not playing little games with each other here—I have been told that with the new offset presses, instead of needing three or four million dollars to establish a plant, which has been the situation up to now, that you might just get by with about $50,000? Is this right? I am not sure myself.

Mr. Sutherland: I would be very skeptical of it, sir. In the case of Edmonton, the equipment would run into many, many thousands of dollars.

Senator Prowse: I am not going to start a paper, by the way.

Mr. Sutherland: Well, take my own paper, which is much smaller. The capital cost there to do an adequate job would differ sir, and I am speaking now personally because I don't have the right to speak as president of CP.

You are not going to get along very long in this world—the newspaper world—filling in between ads. You can fool some of the people some of the time, and so on, but you soon develop an immense respect for the common sense of the common people.

If you don't put your news in there and so forth—you can give them away but they end up in the waste paper basket. You can't force people to read any more than you can force people to buy a paper.

Senator Prowse: So that any changes in technology are not going to overcome the heavy cost you are going to have to have an adequate editorial staff?

Mr. Sutherland: That is correct, sir.

Senator Prowse: And probably taking a loss for a while?

Mr. Sutherland: Not only the editorial staff but you have to have also your technical staff. You have your production people, your sales people, and you have to develop it completely through.

Senator Prowse: So, at the present time then, anybody that wanted to start a newspaper in this country would really have no difficulty if he satisfied you that he were bona fide in what he was doing in getting a Canadian Press franchise?

Mr. Sutherland: He is guaranteed that by the law of the land, sir.

Senator Prowse: I don't know what law guarantees it but I think it would be more apt to be your by-laws.

Mr. Sutherland: No sir, I am going to dispute that. There is a thing called freedom of the press which is basically the freedom to print what any man has a right to say on the street corner, and he is bound by the laws of libel and slander, and we are bound by the laws of libel, which is a little stricter. There is no license to print.

The Chairman: I think, Mr. Sutherland, the point that Senator Prowse was taking was that there is no law that compels CP to provide the service?

Mr. Sutherland: That's right. There is no law. This is our rule.

Senator Prowse: But under your rules at the present time as far as you are concerned as president of the organization, anybody who wants to start a paper in Canada will have access to Canadian Press under normal business arrangements?

Mr. Sutherland: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Is that fair enough?

Mr. Sutherland: Yes.

Mr. Dauphinee: If you have any plans like this, please let us know.

The Chairman: I think, Senator Prowse, Mr. Sutherland has just said that they were considering an amendment. Would you like to discuss that?

Mr. Sutherland: Well, Mr. Chairman, it is under consideration and I cannot speak because this is a co-operative and there is no control.

Senator Prowse: You go ahead and speak anyhow.

Mr. Sutherland: It will bring it down really; they will pay in a year's assessment and we will pay it back. So, it really becomes a banking proposition.

It is a little wider and it is getting away from this angle which you mention of the entrance fee. These are words that are banded round the countryside.

Senator Prowse: In other words, this is a business proposition. You say that I am going to have to put so much money out here in order to service you now, and if you want to lose your own money, it's your business; you say that we are not prepared to lose ours. So you are going to say "This is what it is going to cost us to put the service in and provide you with it."

Mr. Sutherland: Well, you are saying the words, sir. It could be interpreted that way, I suppose, but our basic thought is to get away from the idea of the entrance fee, but we are serious newspaper people. We are glad to welcome anybody else into the pool as serious newspaper people.

If somebody wants to come in and risk his money—as far as we are concerned we are all risking our money—that's fine. We would be very happy to have them. We don't want fly-by-nighters coming in and out.

Senator Prowse: Well, what you want—you don't want a political party deciding they are going to go into the newspaper business?

Mr. Sutherland: Well, there have been political papers in different parts of the land but we are not interested in playing ball with the politicians.

The Chairman: Mr. Sutherland, may I just ask you a question? You said you would be happy to have them. Surely you wouldn't be happy to have another daily newspaper start in New Glasgow? Surely the three Toronto papers wouldn't be happy to have a fourth newspaper start in Toronto?

Mr. Sutherland: May we have one question at a time?

The Chairman: Well, it is the same question.

Mr. Sutherland: In New Glasgow, I would be happy, but there are 99 other members.

The Chairman: Well, would you be happy to see a fourth daily start in Toronto?

Mr. Sutherland: I think they would be crazy but if they wanted to, yes. We would be happy to take them into the fold.

Incidentally, sir, there is a fourth.

The Chairman: You are quite correct. I stand corrected, and you are right. Would you be happy to see Senator Prowse start a daily newspaper?

Senator Prowse: Well, let's not put this on a personal basis.

Mr. Sutherland: Yes, I would be happy.

The Chairman: So the point you are making then, as president of CP you would be happy to see more members?

Mr. Sutherland: Yes, sir.

The Chairman: But obviously, you are not in a position to say whether individual publishers would like to see more newspapers in their cities?

Mr. Sutherland: This is a subject I must be extremely careful of, Senator, because this is a wide country and it is pretty obvious that my French colleagues don't want me to speak for them.

I assure you that I don't want anybody from Toronto telling me how to run a paper. We retain our independence and we have for more than 50 years. We have learned to co-operate.

Senator Prowse: Well, let's move to another area, and probably I should talk to Mr. Dauphinee.

In addition to the dupes you get from the various newspapers of a feed-back from the various services—the people you provide with service who have a reciprocal arrangement with you—what other services do you have?

What I have in mind is the national and international news rather than local news.

Mr. Dauphinee: Well, naturally, we have our own staff and we have the output of the newspapers and the broadcasting stations and a few stringers but basically that's the pool. That is the pool in the Canadian picture.

Outside, we have contractual relationships with the Associated Press, which is the comparable—much larger of course—world organization in the United States, and we have Reuters which is the similar newspaper-owned agency based in London and Australia and New Zealand. For our service in French we have the whole force of Agence France-Presse.

Senator Prowse: Well, how much stuff do you get a day from all of these places? Could you estimate?

Mr. Dauphinee: Well, Senator, a quarter of a million words or more.

Senator Prowse: What do you send out?

Mr. Dauphinee: Well, it depends where you are located.

Senator Prowse: Well, let's suppose I have my paper in Edmonton.

Mr. Dauphinee: Well, you would have roughly 24 hours—you would have probably 75 columns a day of news of national import and national interest. You would have national news and national interest and western interest and you would have 50 columns more of regional news, of interest only in that area.

Senator Prowse: Well, what I am particularly interested in is what percentage roughly would it be that gets on to your wire service in Canada compared with the feed-in you get from all of the other different places?

Mr. Dauphinee: Well, I don't know. Say a third or a quarter.

Senator Prowse: At some stage in your organization there is an awful lot of selection that goes on?

Mr. Dauphinee: Yes, sure there is.

Senator Prowse: Now, what criteria do you use in making the selection as to what news you are going to send out?

Mr. Dauphinee: Well, do you want a one hour lecture?

The Chairman: May I ask Senator Prowse, are you talking about international news or all news?

Senator Prowse: The whole thing that goes out on their wire services as compared to what comes in.

Mr. Sutherland: May I answer that question?

The Chairman: Yes, certainly.

Mr. Sutherland: What the paper wants. This is determined on two levels. The publishers meet once a year. There is also a semi-annual meeting which is not quite as well attended and then there are regional meetings of the actual working press with the members of the Canadian Press staff hammering away at each other and working things out and this has been going on for years.

Senator Prowse: In every bureau?

Mr. Sutherland: Oh yes, and in every region. We do not interfere.

For instance, the French members have a regional meeting of their own and they are as free as they can be to criticize and say "Why didn't we get more of this?" or "We want more of that."

As to the rest of Canada, there is quite a knock-down, scratch affair and it is encouraged to be that.

Mr. Dauphinee: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if it might not clarify things if I talk for a few minutes on how we do handle news.

Senator Prowse: Yes, please do.

Mr. Dauphinee: We copy in New York the full Associated Press news report which comes in on probably ten printers. There is some duplication between them but there is a printer that comes up the east coast and there is one from Washington and there is one that carries news across the country and there is a cable from London and so on.

Also in New York we copy the Reuters North American service, which is fed directly from London and comes into our cable office in New York.

Also in New York comes the copy from our Washington correspondent, from our man in the U.N., from our London bureau, from the man who might happen to be in Nigeria this week on special assignment, a stringer from Australia or New Zealand, and so on.

All this package comes to the news desk in New York where we have a staff of nine Canadian-trained editors who are used to the way we handle news and they are used to the requirements of Canadian papers and alert to Canadian news interest, and their job is to act almost as an autonomous unit to process the entire package of world news which will fit on the one wire from New York to Toronto.

Now, at Toronto this world news is delivered not only to us but to the papers in Toronto, to the papers in Hamilton, London, Windsor, and to Ottawa and Montreal. The bigger newspapers. They receive the world package exactly the same as it comes into our head office.

Besides the New York wire which goes to the six big cities we have, for simplicity, I would call a westbound wire, which runs from Ottawa to Montreal, back to Toronto, Hamilton, London, and Windsor. Beside it, and again for simplicity we will call it the eastbound wire, which runs from Windsor through to Montreal and Ottawa, we have a wire which carries all your Parliamentary news and all your news of Quebec Province.

The eastbound wire carries all the news of Ontario and the West and the Maritimes and delivers it to the big papers, so each of those papers has got three news wires; two Canadian, one world.

The rest of the country, because of the mileage and distance and cost of wires, and partly the size of the paper, is served on one news wire which packages a condensation of the content of the three central Canada wires and distributes the national package coast-to-coast which works roughly this way.

About 50 minutes of every hour a wire running 66 words a minute—that's three and a half columns—carries the same news from St. John's, Newfoundland, to Victoria. For roughly 10 minutes we break it down into sections and we carry news of regional interest.

For instance, on fish which we were talking about earlier, a story would go to the Maritimes, and wheat for the West.

Our fellows are working on the basis of long experience and they move around the country and they know the country and they know the interest, they watch the papers, and as Harry has said, we have regional meetings and we seem to be always answering questions about what we did wrong.

Our fellows are constantly being informed by the publishers and the editors—particularly the editors—as to this is what we want for our papers, and this is what we deliver.

Senator Prowse: Now, when you say "This is what we want" you have in effect 100 publishers and you have 100 bosses in a way?

Mr. Dauphinee: 103.

Mr. Sutherland: And those 300 broadcasters.

Senator Prowse: So that you then have to decide what they want. When you say what they want you are not referring to a particular story, or are you?

Mr. Dauphinee: It may be a particular story. It may be a particular story in the Vancouver Province.

Senator Prowse: You receive a special request?

Mr. Dauphinee: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Day to day operations?

Mr. Dauphinee: I don't mean what any individual paper insists on having at 10 o'clock in the morning, but I am referring to the overall package.

We are concerned with all of the western papers and their interests. We make sure that those interests are met to the best of our ability.

Similarly, for the Maritimes. Overall, we are delivering the same package of news to St. John's, Newfoundland as we do to Victoria.

If there is a story involving Canada in Nigeria, we don't say "Oh, that is of no importance in Newfoundland." We actually operate our trans-Canada wire on the basis of 50 minutes of national news and then ten on a regional basis.

Senator Prowse: Now in the selection of this news. There has to be a lot of selection here?

Mr. Dauphinee: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Do you just depend on the experience of your individual editors then to make this selection?

Mr. Sutherland: It isn't that easy, sir.

Senator Prowse: Well, what I have in mind is do you have any style books?

Mr. Sutherland: Oh yes.

Senator Prowse: Do you have any guide you can give them?

Mr. Sutherland: Incidentally, this style book which has been developed—this is the sixth or seventh printing and it runs more than 100 pages and it has been adopted in fact as the style book for almost all Canadian dailies.

Mr. Dauphinee: We have another one, a little alphabetical deskman's guide on capitalization and so on, which has also been adopted by most Canadian dailies.

We have a similar style book which is developed for French service which sets out our principles and the method of writing the news and how to handle the certain types of copy and so on.

This style book was highly commended in Le Monde in Paris as an excellent guide to the handling of French.

Senator Smith: Excuse me, I wonder if I might ask the Chairman a question. Do we have these publications on file? I would think it would be an asset to have them tabled.

The Chairman: We don't have those, Mr. Dauphinee, and we would be pleased if you could supply us with a copy.

Mr. Dauphinee: I would be happy to supply one for each and every Senator.

The Chairman: Fine.

Mr. Sutherland: I think it might be of interest that the French language office of the Quebec government had a look at this style book and ordered a number of copies.

We are very proud to say that our French staff produced this. We in the English section are extremely proud that this is the calibre of the French staff that we have working for us.

Mr. Dauphinee: You were asking a moment ago what our criteria was for selecting a news story. I think perhaps you are thinking that we serve all papers and we have nothing to compare with except our own guidance system. This is not really correct.

We have many ways that our selection is checked day to day by other people. For instance, the New York Times service comes into Canada, the Washington Post and the Los Angeles Times and the CBC and CTV—all these are a double check on our selection.

Senator Prowse: What I am really getting at is this. In the process of selecting even facts, the personality of the person making the selection is bound to filter through in the finished product. Would you agree that that is the case?

Mr. Sutherland: That is correct but I hope it doesn't filter through very much.

Senator Prowse: You hope that it is not discernible.

Mr. Dauphinee: Actually, we don't care whether it's discernible or not. The point is that I think an individual can have a feeling on a given subject but through long experience and training and working for CP and working for all papers with all political views, he can and has learned to put behind his own personal feelings and deliver the story the way it should be for the information of the public.

Senator Prowse: Well, how many of your stories carry any interpretative writing? In other words, perhaps by interpreting I mean explanatory. There has to be a value judgment for an individual to say, or go into a story and say this is what this really means.

Mr. Sutherland: I would like to come in and say this. The very word "interpretative" is a bit on the galling side, it rubs us the wrong way amongst us older men.

We grew up with this idea that we must be objective because of the nature of Canada. As things developed the broadcasters began to be able to deliver news almost instantly where we were coming out in the case of a smaller paper once a day and with the larger papers several times a day.

We began to range a little bit and we are sort of watching this word "interpretative" and we are trying to develop something. We think it can be dangerous. It's not the strict straight reporting of what is happening, what is the news.

Senator Prowse: How much of your Canadian Press stories contain anything but the news?

Mr. Sutherland: It's the straight story.

Senator Prowse: In other words you provide...

Mr. Dauphinee: I have to say this. In every news story there is some interpretation. Even if you are covering an auto accident in which two people are killed, it is interpretation, because you select what goes in and what stays out.

I think what we are talking about though is when a reporter puts in explanatory material which is not something that was said or done by the principals in that particular story.

There is a distinct difference between interpretation and editorializing and it's a narrow line. I think we do a very careful and solid job of making sure that our reporters do not editorialize.

Oh, sure, every now and again it happens and we write a letter to the bureau chief and say "Make sure it doesn't happen again." But overall our copy is backgrounded to explain why things happen or to relate today's events to what happened last week.

I don't think that that is really—it's called interpretation—it's not. It's just sensible reporting to make a story better understood.

Senator Prowse: In other words to give a person a better understanding of what he is reading?

Mr. Dauphinee: Yes.

Senator Prowse: And you keep this to a minimum?

Mr. Dauphinee: For instance, you could say this is interpretation. If you make a speech this week in Edmonton and you make a speech in Winnipeg and say something different, to refer back to what you said in Edmonton might seem like interpreting, but for me it's just honest reporting.

Senator Macdonald: Well, you said if he made a speech one day and said something else some time later, you say it is your duty in reporting his last speech, to say that this man didn't say this a year ago?

Mr. Dauphinee: Well, I didn't say a year ago. If it was matter of moving from Calgary to Edmonton and making a different speech to a different audience, I think it would be fair reporting to specify if there has been a change of opinion over that in Edmonton.

Senator Prowse: "It looks like Prowse has changed his mind in 24 hours"?

Senator Macdonald: That doesn't seem to me to be objectivity, if I could use the word. You are not reporting his last speech.

Mr. Sutherland: We are not expressing an opinion on this now. This is a case of actually still reporting but we are not going to argue the point. We are simply drawing attention.

Senator Prowse: It is an objective statement, the fact that this man says one thing in one place and says something somewhere else?

Mr. Sutherland: Yes.

Senator Macdonald: But that is not reporting. You are going beyond your reporting stage there.

Mr. Sutherland: Well, we are going beyond—I would agree with you with our original concept, 10, 15, 20 or 25 years ago, where we just simply put the speech in and let the readers themselves recall back.

Senator Macdonald: Is that the way you work with all political figures? Is that the way you work with, say, any member of the government or say the Prime Minister makes a speech today somewhat different from what he may have said in his election campaign? Would you point out that there is a difference?

The Chairman: Now Senator Macdonald, that you know is a hypothetical question.

Mr. Sutherland: It's not possible sir, to cover all the various phases of the story as it goes along.

Take Prime Minister Trudeau, who is moving around the countryside making many speeches. We just can't review everything the man has said in the past year, but if it's pertinent, it will be used.

Senator Macdonald: Now, who says it's pertinent?

Mr. Sutherland: It has to be done at the editorial staff level.

Senator Prowse: In other words, Canadian Press runs its own truth squad these days?

Mr. Sutherland: No, sir, no. This is not intended to be sensational journalism. It's intended to be informative.

Senator Prowse: In other words, you are going to try to put everything in balance so people can form a complete objective opinion insofar as you are able to do it? Is this fair enough?

Mr. Sutherland: Yes.

Senator Macdonald: How far back would you go to say that Senator Prowse said something different on this same subject?

Mr. Sutherland: Well, that is a hard one to answer sir, because it is a hypothetical question and I think we would leave that up to the editorial staff.

The Chairman: Mr. Dauphinee, would you answer that question?

Mr. Dauphinee: I think it might be interesting if we went back over the election campaign right now and wrote a story on what has been promised and what has been accomplished.

Senator Macdonald: Yes, but that is not the point.

The Chairman: That was not the question.

Mr. Dauphinee: It's not the question but it is the same thing.

Senator Macdonald: No, you are writing a story in this case, you are saying that I said something this time and I might have said something differently here five years ago.

In this case you are saying that if Senator Prowse makes a speech this week and he says something different from what he said last week...

Senator Prowse: I never do that, Senator Macdonald.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Dauphinee said he would withdraw the remark and that will satisfy you Senator Macdonald...

Senator Macdonald: I think it is very interesting, you know. You can't say that Canadian Press is only objective. You are reporting the news and then if you come around and say well, apart from that we are doing a little more than that. We are pointing out inconsistencies in a person's statement.

If you are doing that, I want to know how far back you can go to do it. This is where the bias of your editors could come into effect.

If you had an editor who is very partisan, say to some political party, then he could keep a file for years and come back and say "Here, this is what this man said in '52."

Mr. Dauphinee: I don't think that would be a practical problem. This is the sort of thing that we guard against all the time. We have a general news editor whose duty it is to watch the news reports and to watch for places where he feels we are out of balance and newspapers all along the line are watching for places where they think we are out of balance.

If you had a friend who is a publisher and we wrote a story, as you say he would write immediately and say that we were unfair to Senator Macdonald.

The Chairman: May I just say that we will turn away from Senator Prowse for the moment and perhaps come back later on.

Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: I would just like to say that perhaps Senators Macdonald would tell us how many years ago he made the statement he is worried about...

The Chairman: I am wondering along the same lines, if we might put the same question to Mr. Speers. Supposing, particularly with your voice reports, what if you voice-report a person or a politician or a businessman who is making a speech in Toronto today, and he says something and makes the same speech tomorrow in Montreal and says something different? Would you run back to back?

Mr. Speers: Well, it has been our experience sir, that we don't have to. One of his political opponents will undoubtedly do it for us. We report that.

The Chairman: And if the political opponent did this you would then take it up?

Mr. Speers: Yes.

Senator Bourque: In the submission by Broadcast News Limited, I see in paragraph 38 on page 9 it says the following:

"In line with BN's aim to make its services available to all Canadian stations at reasonable cost, BN voice is non-exclusive."

Just what would non-exclusive mean there?

Mr. Sutherland: Well, it means that we won't sell to—we won't sell it in this community only. We won't sell it to one radio station, not to another.

Senator Bourque: Like in Montreal you might sell it to six stations?

Mr. Sutherland: Yes, sir.

Senator Prowse: Bona fide stations?

Mr. Sutherland: Done by the government sir, not us.

Senator Bourque: And it goes on to say:

"Charges are based on stations' advertising rates. At present BN Voice serves 35 English language radio stations with subscribers in every province except Prince Edward Island."

Now, in the next paragraph it says that this service has been offered in the French language provided the stations are prepared to underwrite the cost. Would the cost be very high?

Mr. Sutherland: Sir, if I may direct your attention. I am really a newspaperman.

The Chairman: Mr. Speers?

Mr. Speers: I think perhaps Mr. Edwards could answer that question.

Mr. Edwards: You are getting right down to the end of the line. It depends on how far you want to go in developing a service. One might say a million dollars a year to develop a news service in French, or you can get by with a very good service for $150,000 a year perhaps, or maybe less. It depends on how far you want to go.

You look at it—as I explained it to the French language stations, to start a service basically I would say you need good reporting staff in Ottawa and a good reporting staff in Quebec City. These would be for the French language stations in Canada.

You would probably need two men in each place but certainly one full time man and a stringer assistant.

Senator Bourque: Well, if I understand correctly then, you have seven provinces, excluding Prince Edward Island and Quebec, and that would make eight. The cost would be really then too prohibitive for the few French papers that could take advantage of that service?

Mr. Edwards: It's not prohibitive, but the fact is they all have—I am talking about the French language stations—they all have news wires but most of them have our teletype wire service and on top of that they get voice reports which are complementary or supplementary, which they air.

These are voice reports from news sources. Maybe actuality by yourself, sir, or some political figure or news figure, and they would like to get these things inclusive if they can.

If they were all to band together and pay for the circuit cost of feeding this news to them, say, 60 French language stations, the cost to each would not be high. So far, they haven't wanted to do that.

They have voice services—there are two services operating in the Province of Quebec, rival groups or competing groups, providing service in French, but they haven't asked us to do it, although we are quite prepared to do it.

Senator Bourque: Well, the fact that there are only 35 English language stations that have taken advantage of that service would show that practically the French population or the French radio stations would be eliminated from that because the cost would be too prohibitive? If you can only get 35 radio stations in all of Canada with the exception of Prince Edward Island, then you couldn't get very many French stations to take this up and it would make the cost prohibitive.

You are not in any way trying to hinder them from getting the service. The only reason is because the cost would be too prohibitive because there would be too few stations. Is that correct?

Mr. Edwards: That's right. They have services of their own just as in the English language area—there are four other voice services operating in competition with us.

The Chairman: Would you identify them for us?

Mr. Edwards: Their names—and I think perhaps some of them are represented here today—Standard Radio News, which is operated by Standard Broadcasting; CFRB Toronto is the basic station, and it is allied with National Broadcasting Company—and when I say allied, they have the NBC network coming in and they gather Canadian news and they select news from the NBC network.

Another service is called News Radio which is operated by Stevenson Thomson, who I believe has the basic interest in it at Toronto—which is a firm of advertising representatives—serving a number of stations, and they have an office here in Ottawa with reporters and they gather Canadian news and they use the Columbia Broadcasting System network as their international source. Contemporary News is owned—the affiliation is with CHUM in Toronto, by Alan Waters, who also owns CFRA here in Ottawa and some other stations around the country, and he is allied for international news with United Press International. CHFI Toronto is the basic station of Rogers Radio News, which is Edward S. Rogers, who owns CHFI, and some other radio stations have Rogers Radio News service.

Senator Bourque: That doesn't answer my question.

The Chairman: Senator Bourque, I would just like to pursue this and I will be right back. Does the CHFI service have an international tie-up?

Mr. Edwards: Yes, with ABC.

The Chairman: With ABC?

Mr. Edwards: Yes.

The Chairman: Does the BN Voice have international tie-ups?

Mr. Edwards: We have Westinghouse Broadcast Co.

The Chairman: So your service puts on Canadian Voice and International so that all of these services are put on Canadian Voices, International Voices?

Mr. Edwards: Yes.

The Chairman: If Senator Bourque would just allow me to ask this question. Could you tell us, do you have any way of knowing what use is made of your service and of these other services? Presumably, you send out a number of voices. Could you explain how the voice reports actually works?

Mr. Edwards: Yes. Our service, and the others are comparable, for a collection of news we copy the Westinghouse network, which is two full time wires coming in and feeding their stations from the United States and they are news-oriented stations, and we copy that.

By copy, we receive that network feed—not network in the sense that it is being aired, but hooking the stations together.

We receive that in Toronto where we copy the full feed and select from it the news that we feel is of interest to Canadians and Canadian stations in broadcasting. They would be the major international stories and also we cover Canada—we have two voice reporters in Ottawa all the time and at the moment we have three because of the Federal-Provincial Conference and one of our reporters is here and we call on our subscribing stations. Not only the stations that participate in voice services but practically all the stations that subscribe to our service and they request that we feed news to their area.

Usually, we ask for it, although they frequently volunteer, but we know from watching the news what is developing and we knew for instance that this Committee would be holding hearings this week and we prepare in advance for coverage of such important news events and we bring that into Toronto, sometimes by leased wire, a voice circuitry, but sometimes by telephone, and we then feed it from Toronto to stations on a lease wire that would be leased across the country from Newfoundland to Vancouver Island, and we feed this at various intervals.

If there is a major story we may feed it immediately.

The Chairman: Do you have any record of use?

Mr. Edwards: Not recently. We have surveyed, and some stations say that they use about one-third what we provide, which is about 55 cuts a day.

The Chairman: I am curious, Mr. Edwards, to know of the use of Voice cuts which are Canadian as opposed to those which are international?

Mr. Edwards: Well, I can't answer for the stations. I know at the present time more than 50 per cent of our service is Canadian. It is Canadian content originating in Canada.

I have some figures here for last month and it is running about 60 per cent Canadian at the moment.

The Chairman: But you don't know what they use?

Mr. Edwards: No.

Senator Bourque: I am satisfied with the answer. I can see there is no discrimination and that is fine for me.

Now, if we turn over to the Canadian Press brief, page 11, paragraph 46.

"The directors are elected for two-year terms by regions, three from the Atlantic provinces, one from Quebec, six from Ontario, four from the Prairie provinces, two from British Columbia and three representing French-language papers."

Now that can exclude completely having a French director. Now, if you will listen to my reasoning you will see what I mean.

You say one from Quebec. Well, now, it could be a gentleman from the Gazette or—

Mr. Speers: That sir, is one of Quebec's English newspapers.

Senator Bourque: Yes.

Mr. Dauphinee: And then, we have the three representing French-language papers.

Senator Bourque: Yes, but that doesn't say from Quebec.

Mr. Sutherland: All our French members are not from Quebec, sir.

Senator Bourque: I know, that is the point I want to make. You could elect as directors, three gentlemen, one from Manitoba, one from Ontario and one possibly from Nova Scotia, and then you would have no directors for the Province of Quebec—no French-Canadian director.

Mr. Sutherland: These are from French language papers, sir. The only one in the Maritimes is in Moncton.

Senator Bourque: But, you could elect nevertheless three French-speaking directors who are not from the Province of Quebec and eliminate the Province of Quebec insofar as the French are concerned.

The Chairman: I think, Senator Bourque, that wouldn't be possible because there are two French dailies outside of Quebec. Assuming that both of those people were elected as directors...

Senator Bourque: Well, that may be today, but suppose tomorrow a big French newspaper starts in Toronto?

Mr. Sutherland: May I reply, sir, and I am not going to be facetious, I think if that happened the rest of us would just have to take off while our Quebec members go berserk.

There is an old tradition, sir—it's not written into the Constitution—that French matters are French. This has been going on for some 50 years. .

Senator Bourque: Well, sir, I may tell you that I used to be a member of the Canadian Press and I used to operate the Le Nouvelliste 50 years ago.

Mr. Sutherland: Is that so, sir?

Senator Bourque: Yes.

Mr. Sutherland: Well, sir, I am very happy to learn that. You attended meetings, sir?

Senator Bourque: Yes, sir.

Mr. Sutherland: Well, sir, I think you will agree with me sir, that French matters were French. The English language people didn't interfere with the French language.

Senator Bourque: Yes, but that still doesn't answer my question. It is a particular case, as you say. One from Quebec—well, as I said it could be a member from an English paper. I don't object to that, but there is no provision made for having a really French-speaking director from Quebec because the three others could be eliminated from the Province of Quebec—it could be for instance representing Le Droit or it could represent some other paper that is in Manitoba or somewhere else.

The Chairman: Senator Bourque, a member of the Executive Committee of Canadian Press is here in the delegation, and it is, as a matter of fact, Gabriel Gilbert who is the president of Le Soleil and I am wondering if he might comment on this point.

Mr. Gabriel Gilbert, Publisher, Le Soleil: Mr. Chairman, honourable members of the Committee, gentlemen: I believe that the possibility raised by Senator Bourque may be real on paper because the Canadian Press constitution does not specifically state that there must be at least one French director from Quebec, but in practice I think the situation could not arise for two reasons.

In the first place, there are not enough French-language newspapers outside Quebec at this time to permit the election of three directors from outside Quebec. Secondly, I feel that the Canadian Press today, like several of our other truly national associations, is not only bilingual in spirit and outlook but it is also bicultural. This being the case, I believe it would be absolutely out of the question for its combined membership to come to a decision as surprising and unacceptable as that.

Senator Bourque: If you will allow me to interrupt, Mr. Gilbert, you are saying it is not possible, but I say it is, and I can prove it for you in a few words. It says here "one from Quebec". And that one from Quebec may very well represent The Montreal Star, The Gazette or The Quebec Chronicle-Telegraph or some newspaper like that. But here for instance, when you say "three representing French-language papers", the members could easily choose three newspapers published outside the Province of Quebec; not being from the Province of Quebec, these would in no way represent it.

Mr. Gilbert: I believe if we stick to the letter of the Constitution, you are absolutely right; there could be a good man, say from Moncton, New Brunswick, another in Hull and a third in, say Winnipeg, since there could certainly be a French newspaper on St. Boniface.

Senator Bourque: There might be one in Toronto.

Mr. Gilbert: We may see that too, some day. But I believe that in practice, in view of the genuinely bilingual character of the Canadian Press—and I do not mean that only in the narrow sense of the French and English languages, but bicultural in the sense that we know French-Canada contributes more than just another language to the country—I believe the Canadian Press members would find it absolutely impossible to function for a year or two without a French-Canadian from Quebec on the board of directors. Judging from conditions as they are now and from the moving spirit behind the agency, I am convinced that it simply couldn't happen, although I agree with you that, given the facts, it could.

Senator Bourque: This is 1970 and I believe that anything can happen in 1970.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Gilbert, would you permit me to say a word while you have the floor? In view of the point raised by Senator Bourque and your very candid and honest admission, do you not think it might be advisable for the Canadian Press to amend its by-laws, to change them so that, even in theory, it would not be possible for such a situation to arise? Because I believe I understood Mr. Sutherland to say earlier, in speaking of amendments to be made in the by-laws, that this might be done soon. Perhaps the point we have been discussing could be covered in an amendment.

Mr. Gilbert: First let me thank you for using the word "candid" with regard to me. I only wish you would repeat it some day when my wife is present. As for an amendment, personally I have no objection. The Canadian Press is living organization, which means that anything can be corrected, and I feel sure that the amendment you suggest will receive consideration.

Mr. Fortier: I notice in the Canadian Press brief that six French-Canadian newspapers were members of the co-operative in 1917, and nine in 1969. Is that correct?

Mr. Gilbert: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: How many of the nine are published outside Quebec? I presume that Le Droit is one?

Mr. Gilbert: Le Droit and L'Évangéline.

Mr. Fortier: L'Évangéline. Then the other seven are in Quebec?

Mr. Gilbert: That is correct.

Mr. Fortier: That means, therefore, that during a period of 52 years only one new paper was accepted as a member of the Canadian Press?

Mr. Gilbert: I cannot give you a history of newspapers in Quebec since I have not studied this matter in depth, but I can tell you that there are definitely fewer newspapers in Quebec than in Ontario, for instance, in proportion to the population. We could talk for a long time and not discover why this should be. It may have something to do with the reading habits of our people, or with a standard of living which was somewhat lower than Ontario's for several years, or with all the economic and social factors that are peculiar to Quebec. I agree with you that the number of Quebec newspapers has not increased much over the years. A number of newspapers went into publication but eventually folded up, while a good many political papers stayed in circulation for some time before going out of business.

Mr. Fortier: There was the attempt to launch Le Nouveau Journal, for instance, a few years ago.

Mr. Gilbert: True.

Mr. Fortier: With all your experience in written journalism, have you any theory as to why Le Nouveau Journal failed to crack the market?

Mr. Gilbert: I would rather tell you when I'm here for the Canadian Press. I'll tell you the next time I come.

Mr. Fortier: I know you are to come back. I must confess that when I read that there were only seven newspapers—I believe there are about eleven daily papers in the Province of Quebec, is that correct?

Mr. Gilbert: Yes. There are some that are not members of the Canadian Press.

Mr. Fortier: What is the reason—and now I am speaking to the man wearing the Canadian Press hat—what is the main reason which keeps these newspapers from becoming members of the Canadian Press.

Mr. Gilbert: First, I should say it must be a matter of budget. These people probably say to themselves: we have been publishing a newspaper for a number of years and our circulation is on the rise; we are getting out a paper just the same. It may never enter their minds to ask whether it is better or worse than it should be. Second, it is a matter of money. They say: if we join the Canadian Press, it will cost so many extra thousands of dollars a year. After all, the Quebec newspapers which are not member of Canadian Press at this time have fairly large circulations. One example is Montréal-Matin, published in Montreal with a circulation of over 100,000. Obviously, it would cost money to join the Canadian Press. However, these papers cannot be accepted as members at lower rates merely because they are joining for the first time.

Mr. Fortier: Is it a question of funds with Montréal-Matin?

Mr. Gilbert: Personally, I am inclined to believe that the main obstacle is money.

Mr. Fortier: Are they members...

Mr. Gilbert: It is because they have less need for it since their publication is growing anyway. Take the Péladeau papers for example; we would have to admit that they are making progress, yet they are not members of Canadian Press either.

Mr. Fortier: But is Montréal-Matin not a member of Agence France-Presse?

Mr. Gilbert: They may be receiving AFP, but at this point I rather think they are receiving UPI.

Mr. Fortier: That's it—UPI is what I was trying to remember.

Mr. Gilbert: That gives them international coverage, but not...

Mr. Fortier: What does it cost them?

Mr. Gilbert: I really couldn't say; these are special contracts with individual publishers and I have no idea what UPI would charge Montréal-Matin. Mind you, we at Canadian Press have been in contact with these newspapers for several years, talking things over in an attempt to bring them in. So far we have not been successful.

Mr. Fortier: There is Montréal-Matin, Le Journal de Montréal, Le Journal de Québec, and what would be the other newspaper that is not a member of Canadian Press?

Mr. Gilbert: I don't know. Le Nouvelliste and La Tribune are members.

Mr. Fortier: These are the only ones?

Mr. Gilbert: Those are the only ones.

Mr. Fortier: In short, Mr. Gilbert, do you receive adequate service from Canadian Press as a French-Canadian newspaper published in Quebec?

Mr. Gilbert: Definitely, but I shall answer this question more precisely on my next appearance.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you.

The Chairman: Senator Bourque.

Senator Bourque: I would like to thank Mr. Gilbert for his remarks. They have enlightened me a bit but he hasn't answered nor has anyone answered the question that I put to these gentlemen.

My question is, one from Quebec. Now, six from Ontario—there just doesn't seem to be a fair proportion if you base it on the population, but on the other hand there are—there is a compensation—three representing French language papers throughout Canada but these are not from the Province of Quebec.

We might find some heavy criticism from the people who are trying to create trouble—I am for a united Canada, but I do believe that if we have any affair that can cause trouble or give somebody cause for criticism, that we should immediately do something to eliminate this danger.

Anybody could say now that there has been discrimination against the Province of Quebec. There is only one director from the Province of Quebec and he could be from an English newspaper.

Therefore, you could find yourself at some time without a French-Canadian director or through other circumstances as there may be newspapers coming up and everything.

Mr. Dauphinee: I am going to make a comment, and I hope Mr. Purcell will correct me if I am wrong—I may be, but it seems to me that the reason—this was before I was connected at the management level—but it seems to me that the reason that the three French language members are selected at present at large is because this was the way that all the newspapers taking their service in the French language, including one in Ontario and one in New Brunswick, would, if there were three from Quebec, never have representation as French language directors. This brought all your French papers together with a representation of three directors for nine papers, which is a very high proportion, and if the occasion ever occurred where a situation such as you suggest occurred, then it would seem logical at that time that the membership of the corporation would probably amend the by-laws to correct the situation.

There seems no need to do it now because the situation as it is provides for a high representation for the papers with interests similar to each other.

Senator Bourque: What I had in mind you see, so that there wouldn't be any criticism from separatist groups or any group that wants to cause trouble, was if you had two from Quebec; one from the French papers and one from the English papers, and then two at large for the others, you would eliminate the situation. You would assure that there would always be one French-Canadian director.

The Chairman: Well, I would like to go on to another point, but I think that Mr. Sutherland has something he would like to add.

Mr. Sutherland: I would like to say that when Mr. Fortier was talking, I had the same thought that we might get an amendment in here. There is no reason why we simply couldn't acknowledge the facts of life that there is no Canada without Quebec, sir. We thought we should guarantee the French outside of Quebec a feeling that they belong. I think we have overlooked the angle that perhaps as such it is not guaranteed anything and perhaps our lawyers will look after it.

In the matter of the Montreal papers which do not belong to us, Mr. Gilbert handled it and I would merely like to say—and perhaps speaking as best I can representing the English segment—that we would be most happy to have them in but we on the English side must be careful not to put ourselves in the position of seeming to force them in. We can do no more than welcome them. This we have done.

The problems as to why they don't come in—that's their business.

Senator Bourque: Don't think for a minute that I meant to say that you had discriminated against anyone because it has been running well, but now there are times—I think it is time that we looked into all the different situations and found out what just could create trouble.

Mr. Sutherland: In a cooperative, sir, no one can speak with authority, and I think you made a point sir, and I myself would be somewhat surprised if a little consideration isn't given to this problem somewhat shortly.

Senator McElman: Mr. Chairman, for those smaller cities of the country where there may not be a CP bureau, what is the rule or agreement on the timing for input of stories to the CP wire by member newspapers? Must they file at the same time they are doing their own stories?

Mr. Sutherland: Well, sir, they can't file while they are doing it, but right afterwards. Now, there can be slip-ups, as our own paper has slipped up, because you are thinking of getting your own paper out, but our duty and our obligation is to get the news through to Canadian Press, to the nearest bureau, as quickly as possible.

Senator McElman: I note in Charlottetown and in Prince Edward Island that you have no CP staff and no coverage of the legislature.

Mr. Sutherland: There is no bureau there, sir.

Senator McElman: Why?

Mr. Sutherland: Well, Prince Edward Island is a very small province, and we just wouldn't warrant having a bureau in Charlottetown. We have a bureau in Halifax covering the Atlantic area.

Senator McElman: You have stringers in Charlottetown?

Mr. Sutherland: I think we had better pass that one to Mr. Dauphinee, as it is on the technical side.

Mr. Dauphinee: It's not quite correct to say that we don't have reporters at the legislature in Charlottetown. We do. We do have reporters from Halifax covering news events like the budget day and so on, but to go back to your original question, the duties and obligations of members read this way.

"Article 11, section 1, District News Coverage.

Each member shall promptly furnish to the Canadian Press all available news of his district, the area of which shall be determined by the board. In centres not served by both morning and evening newspapers, this shall include the news of the full 24 hour daily period."

This means that in Ontario for instance the papers on our Ontario wire—32 or 33 in number—are all evening papers but they are all responsible for providing coverage to the Canadian Press through the night when they are not actually manned.

Roughly one-half of the news from Ontario wire points—all evening papers—is actually provided at night.

Senator McElman: Perhaps this is only a personal opinion but I seem to sense there is almost an alarming lack of news that receives national attention on CP wire. I mean emanating from the—I am a Maritimer—emanating from the Maritimes. Is there any measurement conducted by CP of the input by the member newspapers of a given area such as the Maritimes to determine whether the feed is coming through?

Mr. Dauphinee: Yes, sir. We have across the country a number of what we call news analyses which are issued monthly to newspapers in the service. They are issued for the information of the members, so that even though a newspaper has been doing a good job, it also gives us the constant running check on how the papers themselves are doing for us.

Let us say for example that the bureau chief in Halifax is responsible for the whole Atlantic region. He feels that the coverage he is getting from the New Glasgow News is not sufficient for some reason or other, or he checks the New Glasgow News and he finds a story that is published prominently in the New Glasgow News was not delivered to Halifax.

Even though Mr. Harry Sutherland is our president, he will receive a blast from our bureau chief in Halifax. This happens all the way across the country.

Senator McElman: The same measurement of course is taken then of how much of the national feed they get and how much they use?

Mr. Dauphinee: No.

Mr. Sutherland: There is no measurement on news, sir—relating to paying?

Senator McElman: On the news services.

Mr. Sutherland: This is up to the individual paper, sir.

Senator McElman: You don't keep a measurement of it?

Mr. Sutherland: No, sir.

Mr. Dauphinee: Not in column inches, sir. Part of the job of our editor on any circuit is to watch what we call the exchanges. These are exchanges that come in to us from down the line and the editor on the Ontario wire in Toronto has access to every daily newspaper in Ontario.

He skims through these papers when he has a few moments and he watches for the type of thing that is published, and we may make a spot check.

For instance, Keith Kincaid, one of our executive assistants, recently travelled coast-to-coast for a series of articles on student unrest. It happens that there isn't very much student unrest, but that is what we were trying to find out.

I hate to think of how much that series cost, but aside from that, this was six stories, because it was a major project—an enterprise project, and we wanted to know what happened, and we had a bureau chief report on the use of that series. It is still running and I don't know what the results will be but it won't be outstanding.

On a day to day run we don't check news on specific stories.

Mr. Sutherland: Sir, I think we have to be careful—it may be tremendously important to the Maritimes but it may be of no interest whatever, or relatively small interest in Quebec or Edmonton.

We as a co-operative, as an organization, don't try to force this point.

Senator McElman: I appreciate that point.

Mr. Sutherland: We make it available. If it is of no interest, that is it.

Senator McElman: Well, I was interested in whether it gets fed or not to the CP wire.

Mr. Sutherland: Oh, there is no question about that. As a matter of fact, we have developed some very major stories over the years from the Maritimes; shipwrecks, coal mine disasters, and some of our Maritime premiers seem to be able to get into the news in a controversial way and so on.

Senator McElman: Well, this is a personal view but I am inclined to think that more happens in the Maritimes than just shipwrecks.

Mr. Sutherland: I can accept your opinion, sir, but I must say that our news does get out.

Senator McElman: Does CP have any view to give with respect to the possibility of a press council for Canada?

Mr. Sutherland: Again, by the the nature of our organization, we will have divergent news, and Canadian Press is a news gathering and distributing organization.

For instance, I wouldn't dream of telling our French members that they should or should not have a press council.

Senator McElman: I am not suggesting that you tell them sir, but I was wondering do you have a view on it?

Mr. Sutherland: As an organization?

Senator McElman: Yes.

Mr. Sutherland: No, sir. By our very nature we wouldn't think of having one. I had a personal view. Speaking as president of Canadian Press, no.

Senator McElman: Would you care to comment on future technology such as facsimile printing and the effect it might have on your operations?

Mr. Sutherland: The Canadian Press operation?

Senator McElman: Yes.

Mr. Sutherland: Well, we are watching through our allies and otherwise everything of a technical nature. As equipment becomes available, we are glad to make use of it.

We are rather advanced in the use of facsimile in transferring news from one spot to another. Our French service in teletype was the first in the world.

Mr. Dauphinee: The only one, yes.

Mr. Sutherland: It was developed in Nova Scotia as you probably know a good many years ago now, marketed in England, but the inventor was a Nova Scotian. He was a Nova Scotian from Canso but perhaps I should pass the ball here to Mr. Purcell, who actually has been our contact man and former manager, and we brought him here with us in case some question would come up where Mr. Dauphinee hasn't had the experience and background yet.

Would you care to direct that question to Mr. Purcell?

Mr. Purcell: Well, sir, I think the Canadian Press is extremely advanced in technological developments. We went into teletype setting in 1952, the same week as the AP, and I may say that it was 30 years after it was done in England, but the two outfits started it at the same time.

We computerized our central circuits, our main circuits to the big cities, with coded circuits as well about a year before the A.P. did.

We went into high speed transmission for stock tables and text about four years ago, and I guess there are many papers in Canada who are using them. They are available for anybody who wants them and we are now using facsimile for transmission from bureau to points or bureau points to correspondent points, and we are in touch with other developments which may come, and our technical men are fully advised of these matters.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Senator McElman: Perhaps I should direct this to Mr. Speers. There has been expressed the view that in the Maritime districts for television and radio news, we get almost on the spot reporting of freedom marches and activities of the Ku Klux Klan in the southern States, but something that might happen in one of the more remote areas of the Maritimes of some importance, there is probably a 24 hour delay on it.

Would this be related to the feed they receive, or is it oriented more to New York than perhaps Canadian content?

Mr. Speers: No. I would think the opposite of that. I would think the opposite of that to be true but I am going to turn the question over to Mr. Edwards because it is a technical question.

I think it is a question of gathering the news but I would like to be clear on this. Were you talking about actualities—when I say actualities, I mean pictures or voice reports or a report on what happened?

Senator McElman: Both. Voice reports and pictures.

Mr. Edwards: Well, I doubt that there is a 24 hour delay but I can imagine that there would be on occasions. There could be on occasions from any part of the country if the news was not known, but once news becomes known, if we haven't got it on the wire—we just have to have it on the wire promptly and we have many sources to get it from.

In the Maritimes, we serve all of the broadcasting stations in the Maritimes and the Atlantic provinces, and most of them file news as soon as they get it, receive it and do a good job of gathering it.

For that, we have the full service of the Canadian Press and I believe that we relay very fast.

As far as voice reports are concerned, we trace for voice reports when we can get them and in fact, frequently, a voice report is the first story that breaks on a news event.

In other words, an interview perhaps with some political figure today who arrives in Fredericton—he might be interviewed by a radio reporter who would tape what he says and then forward it to us—give us the taped report, and this becomes the first word Canadians hear about.

In fact, this is the only such interview, so we would turn it over to the Canadian Press, use it ourselves. There may be 24 hour delays. I know there have been on occasions, both through error or lack of any knowledge of the stories. I would doubt it happens very frequently.

Senator McElman: In the filing of stories from regions—take the Maritimes again. You have your Halifax bureau and you have a particularly hot or controversial story that say gets fed to your Halifax bureau in the late afternoon.

Supposing this story gets fed to your Halifax bureau in the late afternoon or early evening and it doesn't feed to Toronto until the next morning perhaps, and it may possibly rest in Toronto for say another half a day.

Is there some level of clearance that a controversial story has to go through before it can be fed?

Mr. Sutherland: This is a radio or news, sir?

Senator McElman: Take it as news generally.

Mr. Sutherland: Well sir, the thought of a story resting half a day in this day and age just isn't practical. Stories don't rest. There would be the devil to pay if they did, because this is the value of our annual meetings, where there can be the sharpest of criticism or even more so at the regional meetings.

If there was a delay like this it would be heard from.

Mr. Dauphinee: We work in seven time zones and somewhere at almost any hour of the day, every 15 minutes, there is a deadline.

If the story that you are talking about happened to be an inconsequential story it might sit around, held back by the pressure of other news for a matter of hours, that is possible. But you talked about an important story. If that story isn't on the wire from Halifax within five minutes and if it isn't relayed to the west within five minutes—a hot story—then somebody hears about it.

We work in minutes, in seconds in some cases, sir. To have a story lying around for half a day in Halifax and for all night in Toronto is inconceivable.

Senator McElman: What I am getting at is this. In the case of a very controversial story, there is no designated level for clearance? They go through as routine, is that correct?

Mr. Dauphinee: If a story has potential danger—I am thinking in terms of libel—a story of that nature, then it may be messaged to Toronto immediately, marked as we call it CPO, which means Canadian Press only, not for publication.

This would be done for a check by the main desk or we may phone Mr. Robinette to ask for a ruling whether this is a safe story, and we may look at it, but this doesn't apply to a story that is controversial, let's say, just because it is political.

Senator McElman: No, no. I wasn't thinking about that. Thank you.

The Chairman: I would just like to ask this question. Did I understand you to say, gentlemen, that there is no record kept of how the service is used by the member newspapers?

Mr. Sutherland: I don't know of any.

Mr. Dauphinee: That is correct.

The Chairman: I find that incredible. Don't you think it would be a great advantage to keep a record of what use is made of this service?

Mr. Dauphinee: Well, we have a general idea of what use is made of it all right, but we don't know what any group of papers necessarily does with any one particular story.

The Chairman: Well, do you know for example—could you tell me—pick any paper at random which is a member, let's say your own paper—perhaps that is a poor example because you are the president and you are here, but let's take for example the Regina Leader-Post. Do you know what use or how extensively does the Regina Leader-Post use the services of CP over the past 12 months? Do you know exactly?

Mr. Sutherland: No, sir.

The Chairman: I find that rather surprising. Do you not think it would be an advantage to know?

Mr. Sutherland: No, sir.

The Chairman: Why?

Mr. Sutherland: Well, what good would it do?

The Chairman: Well, I think it would be terribly useful to know. I think there would be one measurement—you may correct me if I am wrong—but wouldn't it be a useful measurement of what the member papers think of the service?

Mr. Sutherland: If I may say so, sir, I am not trying to be facetious, but a more important influence to us is what the publisher says, what the member representative says at the annual meeting, and still more important, what his regional editor says at the regional meetings.

Mr. Dauphinee: Every now and again sir, we make a check of the use of news in one paper, for specific reasons.

For instance, not long ago we did make a check with one of the larger papers to find out what proportion of the Canadian Press news report was used on a given day with relatively few editorial changes.

This was for a technical reason and that check sir, to be done with the accuracy that we wanted, took a senior employee roughly three days.

It seems to me that if I have the staff that has that sort of time available, there are places where I can use them to much better benefit, in producing more news for the Regina Leader-Post to use.

The Chairman: Well, I take your point. I don't agree with it because I think it would be terribly important to have this information at your fingertips. You could anticipate what reaction you are going to receive at the annual meeting if you knew what use was being made of the service.

Senator Macdonald: I was just going to ask Mr. Edwards one question with regard to radio notes. Not voice or anything else but just normal news.

You mentioned that you supplied all the stations in the Maritimes, and often there are times the station I listen to, their news is trivial stuff, perhaps that somebody is shooting themselves around Mississippi or something like that, and they wander all around the United States. They wander all over the United States with this kind of news. Do they select that or is that sent in to them and they have to use it?

Mr. Edwards: Well, they don't have to use anything we send them. They do select from what we send the news that they put on the air.

I would say that trivial news should not get on the wire, but sometimes, and this may be true on weekends when governments are closed, businesses are closed, and we are scraping the bottom of the barrel, and I know the stories that I have referred to...

Senator Macdonald: Perhaps I should explain. Usually, it's a five minute newscast. I don't know how much stuff you send in to them, but it's usually 8 o'clock in the morning.

It's not only on weekends; we get it pretty well every day of the week.

Mr. Edwards: Well, we send through a continuous stream of news, I estimate about 55,000 words per day, and we do provide summaries of news every hour once an hour throughout the day and night.

We recommend to stations that they don't use the summaries as they are laid down because they should select the items from the summary and use some of their own local and regional news.

In other words, there should be careful selection and editing.

Senator Macdonald: Well, what they do is that they give us a few minutes of summary of local news, then they go on to this type of broadcasting.

Take for example the 8 o'clock news in the morning. They will give a summary of local news which is supplied by the local newspapers, and then they will give this regular news.

Now, these are the private stations—not the CBC because they give their own news, but some of the material coming through is so trivial that you have to wonder just who is selecting it and why and it looks as if the fellow is just reading something that comes off the tape that is there and doesn't make any selection.

Mr. Edwards: Well, that happens at times, I think.

The Chairman: Why, if you don't think the stations should use the five minute summary, why do you send it?

Mr. Edwards: Well, it's more convenient.

The Chairman: Why don't you just send the items and they would be forced to edit them?

Mr. Edwards: Well, as I said, it would be more convenient, and I think that most stations do select their material, but I don't suggest—I don't suggest they don't.

Senator Macdonald: There are two privately owned stations there, and wherever they get the news from they get it from the same source, because it is exactly word for word the same. There is no selection, that is for sure.

Mr. Edwards: Well, I can't really comment on that. I would regret that that is the case if it is so, but we don't encourage them to do that.

Senator Macdonald: Take a look at what you send to the two Sydney stations, apart from the CBC, and see what I mean.

Mr. Edwards: We send the news also to the CBC.

Senator Smith: I may say also that my own personal experience is something similar to what Senator Macdonald has pointed out.

Although we have what I consider a pretty live wire radio station in my part of Nova Scotia, CKBW in Bridgewater, they pay some attention to local news and they do it quite well.

So often, I notice that they apparently buy a package of news and they will give the names of all the highways down the New York thruway or something, and it looks as if they are buying a package.

If I should switch to another local station somewhere that I can get in my region, I have picked up the same kind of package deal.

I might suggest that you take a look at your packages. You might take a look and see how frequently these packages, as described by Senator Macdonald—the smaller stations who can't afford to have the editorial staff to select from a big tape, but I suppose it meets their convenience and their budget to have packages.

I think it is a good subject to raise with you for your consideration.

Mr. Edwards: Well, Senator, we are very concerned about the problem.

Senator Macdonald: Do you receive it from some news service in the United States?

Mr. Edwards: We have access to the Canadian Press wire as Mr. Dauphinee has outlined. There are the three wires—all the CP wires, and we also have the Associated Press radio wire, and...

Senator Macdonald: At many times it seems to me that this is news for some locality in the United States. It seems to me that it was just taken wholesale and sent down our way.

Senator Smith: These things may not be your packages.

Mr. Edwards: It could be but I would suggest that if the stations would be using anything from outside their own area it probably originated with us.

The Chairman: Senator McElman, perhaps before you ask your question, Mr. Sutherland has advised me that he wishes to amend a statement or add to a statement.

Mr. Sutherland: On reflection sir, I can think of one case where there might be a delay. It is rather interesting, but as Senator Bourque may recall there used to be criticism from Quebec on the delays in translation.

Now that we are writing in French as well as in English, we get criticism from the English papers on the delays in translation from French to English. This is in the nature of things and it can't be done instantly but our staff is trained to do it as quickly as we can do it accurately.

Senator Macdonald: May I ask Mr. Sutherland just one more question?

The Chairman: Certainly.

Senator Macdonald: CP news for example is gathered by your local correspondent, somebody perhaps from a bureau and he might phone in a story. Do you check on that before you send it off to CP?

Mr. Sutherland: In what respect check on it, sir?

Senator Macdonald: To see if it is accurate?

Mr. Sutherland: Our staff is trained and expected to be accurate.

Senator Macdonald: I am talking now of some local correspondent who is perhaps part-time.

Mr. Sutherland: Well, we know our man and we won't double back if he has taken—depending on the story—anywhere from half an hour to five minutes in some cases, or an hour to develop a story, it would be a little ridiculous for us to spend another hour going through the whole thing all over again.

We have to know our man and if we have faith in that man our story goes out. It is done in the regular course of business.

Senator McElman: In your relations with your member newspapers do you find any difference in the calibre or the type of your relations as between the so-called independent group or chain ownership, multiowner-ship—cross-media ownership?

Mr. Sutherland: None, sir. The tradition is maintained that the individual member is responsible to get the news of his area out. This is also maintained at the level of criticism which is what keeps us going.

At both levels the membership at the annual meeting, where the members are present and at the level of the actual news desk, and similarly in radio.

Senator McElman: You speak of criticism. That includes both their feedback to you and yours to them?

Mr. Sutherland: Oh, yes, sir.

Senator McElman: One further question, if I may. You are probably familiar with a Fulford story which appeared in July of this year in Saturday Night. It's headed "About a Cry of Outrage."

In this instance, Health Minister Munro made some comment about the need for subsidization of sports and in no controversial fashion he related it to the subsidy for arts, the cultural aspects that sports were a part of our culture as much as art.

The story goes on to suggest that this was a rather low news time and the CP writer or editor who did the job on it decided it was time to make an impact and his lead paragraph to the Toronto CP goes on to say:

"Health Minister John Munroe's assessment of the relative merits of sports and the arts has been greeted by the Canadian cultural community with a cry of outrage."

What apparently happened was that the CP writer called several people in Toronto which he assumed was the cultural community of Canada, and asked them for their reactions to his interpretation of what Mr. Munroe said, and it goes on to relate the treatment of this by the various newspapers, which of course doesn't come within your purview.

I hope you are familiar with this story because I don't want to take your time of going through the whole bit, but he seems to document fairly well that the story was in fact misrepresentation of the facts as they happen.

His cry of outrage is a criticism of the way in which CP in a short news time sometimes makes a story interesting for their member newspapers and the Canadian public.

Do you have many occasions when this sort of thing may happen, or do you refute the Fulford story?

Mr. Sutherland: Sir, I haven't read the story nor have I heard of it before, and I don't recall the particular story that he was talking about. I think the pertinent question that you are asking is do we have many occasions, and I don't think that we would have that beaver pelt for pursuing the objective of independent, factual and unbiased information if we have many of them.

I don't think we would have the recognition that we have in other parts of the world.

The Associated Press relies on us entirely. There is no representative of the Associated Press in Canada. Reuters depend on us entirely, Agence France-Presse depends on us entirely for Canadian coverage.

All of us in Canada would like to see more Canadian news in the French papers and American papers and English papers. The editors there have their own choice to satisfy their own readers and their own people but I think the very fact that these three very large news agencies rely on us for accurate news is perhaps the best answer I can give to you.

On the whole, we do a good job. I think we could expect and we should anticipate and we should look forward to criticism outside our own ranks as we welcome criticism within our own ranks to sharpen us up and Fulford—I don't know. His father was one of my mentors when I was an apprentice but I have never met this man. He is free to say what he wishes. I may agree with him or disagree but this particular story sounds a bit far-fetched to me. It could have happened. It could be exactly as he says, and if you wish to go into it, since it is a technical point I think I should refer to perhaps the general manager.

Mr. Dauphinee: Well, I can answer your question sir, in one word. No.

Senator McElman: You are familiar with the story?

Mr. Dauphinee: No. We don't have many of those. I think perhaps it was a dull news day for Mr. Fulford.

Senator McElman: Perhaps Mr. Chairman, I can give the story to the gentleman and perhaps he could give me a comment on it.

Senator MacDonald: Just as a matter of general interest, I notice in your brief that when Canadian Press was organized you had 103 newspapers. Last year there were still 103 newspapers and I was wondering how many of the charter members are still in existence?

Mr. Sutherland: You mean the charter member newspapers?

Senator MacDonald: Yes.

Mr. Sutherland: We dropped down pretty close to 80 at one time.

Mr. Dauphinee: 84.

Mr. Sutherland: It has been building up since.

Senator MacDonald: I was wondering how many of those newspapers are still in existence?

Mr. Sutherland: Well, sir, quite obviously all those who have survived are still in. Most of the older newspapers would be amongst the charter members.

Mr. Fortier: If I may follow up, Mr. Sutherland, on one of your recent answers. You implied that one of the tests of how good you were was the fact that Reuters and Associated Press and Agence France-Presse relied on you for Canadian news.

Conversely in paragraph 34 of your brief you say we rely on them for European and other news.

Mr. Sutherland: Not entirely, sir, but basically yes.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, basically you do. A question that has bothered me is, do you really think that a Frenchman or an American would write the same story about the same event, or do you think they might write differently?

Mr. Sutherland: Well, sir, that is a little hard to answer, but may I suggest this, that in part we watch the different way that the stories come in from our three services; one basically American, one basically English and one basically French.

However, in the world-wide matters, if you check the A.P., they may have a New Zealander covering an item in Vietnam and Reuters may have a Spaniard or a Frenchman writing for them—I am talking about the Continental Frenchman.

I presume that Agence France-Presse won't be entirely French in its world operation, but there would be a vast amount of duplication if we were to go out and get it on our own.

In general, I think that we have an extremely good world-wide service by using these others, and where items have a particular Canadian interest, we staff it and we have quite a list here if you wish it of our membership last year.

We had a man in Moscow, but it was our decision to pull him out because we didn't think that we were getting enough out of Moscow and those countries in Eastern Europe.

Instead, we opened a bureau in Paris to cover free Europe. It is a matter of interest also that we now have our news flowing out of free Europe in French which we translate for those members who wish it in English.

Mr. Fortier: But do you agree ideally that you should have CP men in foreign countries rather than having to rely on foreign news services?

Mr. Sutherland: I think that as Canada grows we will grow. Our growth here, I think I said, has been gradual but steady. We aren't the biggest country in the world but I would like to think...

Well, for instance, my own newspaper—I will admit that the Hamilton Spectator is bigger than I am, but I won't say it's better. We wish to have the best service that we possibly can have, and the day will come and we will probably keep growing, but we are confident that we are getting more Canadian people a full comprehensive coverage of the news in world centres.

I am not speaking now of interpreting this or involving opinions that could be given on this, that and the other thing, but we are operating for the Canadian people and the news is being handled by Canadians.

Mr. Fortier: And to attempt to do otherwise at the moment is not economically feasible. Is that correct?

Mr. Sutherland: I think to be practical the economy angle would come into it when you get down to it. I don't think the basic service—if we were able to afford Canadians in every place that the A.P. has a man and that Reuters has a man and Agence France-Press has a man, in many instances it would be a duplication. The actual story would remain the same.

Mr. Fortier: It would be written by a Canadian.

Mr. Sutherland: Yes, Mr. Fortier, it would be written by a Canadian.

Mr. Dauphinee: Basically, Mr. Fortier, I don't look on this as a matter of cost. I think it is a matter of providing top-notch news service without waste, and experience on many international assignments such as our experience in Moscow where we did have two separate reporters for a two year period for a total of four years, the cost—the high cost of maintaining that Moscow office was not justified by the relatively small amount of material that we obtained that we did not already have access to in exactly the same terms from Associated Press and Reuters.

Accordingly, we assigned special reporters to cover stories when there is a specific Canadian interest.

Now, the president mentioned that we have a long list of places we have been and I think it might be of interest to the committee if I mention some of them.

We don't have a man for instance in Norway. We have had at least two reporters in Norway on stories that involve Canadians, and one was a military exercise that was held there.

In the last year or so we have had Canadian reporters, Canadian Press reporters, in Iceland, in the Netherlands, Belgium, frequently in France, quite aside from our permanent assignment in Paris, all parts of the United Kingdom, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Yugoslavia, and we have had Dave McIntosh of our Ottawa staff and Clyde Fox from our London bureau on separate trips to the Middle East.

We have had a man in Nigeria and we had an Ottawa reporter—he is helping to cover this hearing today—in Central America.

We have had a reporter in Japan—our sports editor who went over to cover the Pacific Games, and he subsequently took a look at the Expo site, and we will have two more Japanese trips at the opening of Expo and Canada Week, and we covered the Olympic Games I believe with a staff of four men, and we will have a staff of four at the Commonwealth Games.

This is the way we feel which is the economical way and the right way to handle our foreign coverage.

Mr. Fortier: Do you have any trouble meeting all these special assignments with your $6 million a year budget?

Mr. Dauphinee: No, sir.

Mr. Fortier: Is this a tight or a loose budget that you have?

Mr. Dauphinee: Flexible.

Mr. Fortier: How does it compare with the budget which you had say in 1960?

Mr. Dauphinee: Our budget has doubled—in our overall total the CP budget has doubled in 11 years. Our staff is also one-third larger.

Mr. Fortier: Is it your statement that you are not prevented from doing any work of a special nature on account of financial resources?

Mr. Dauphinee: If the Canadian Press feels that the story rates a Canadian Press assignment, then there is no problem of budget.

Mr. Fortier: And there is no other area of services which you render which suffers because you say you sent two reporters to Japan?

Mr. Dauphinee: No, sir. In my first budget with was presented to the executive committee a week ago, there is a provision for an increase of two in our editorial staff; one in Ottawa and one in Quebec.

Mr. Fortier: Are there special services of a more special kind? Let us say if Canadian Press decided to report more about the arts in Canada. Again, speaking personally, I think there has been a certain deficiency in news on the arts emanating from the Canadian Press.

Supposing we wished to develop an art section—with the existing budget that you have—I repeat the question that I asked a moment ago: would another area of your services have to be cut down?

Mr. Dauphinee: If I had to do it tomorrow?

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Dauphinee: Yes, sir.

Mr. Fortier: If you had to do it within six months?

Mr. Dauphinee: If the need is there, and if this problem could be solved at the board of directors, the money would be provided.

Mr. Fortier: So, it's as you well said, it's flexible budget?

Mr. Dauphinee: We budget a year ahead. We try to plan so that we might anticipate what we might be doing during 1970. This is the same as any business budget.

Mr. Fortier: Again, on the budget if I may, what proportion of your budget goes for the cost of transmitting news as opposed to gathering and editing news?

Mr. Dauphinee: About one-twentieth.

Mr. Fortier: One-twentieth?

Mr. Dauphinee: Yes. More than three-quarters of our total cost is straight staff expenses.

Mr. Fortier: On the question of membership, Mr. Sutherland, I noted your comment earlier, and I am curious—as your constitution now exists, do you have a membership committee or is it a board of directors which votes on the admission or refusal of a new member?

Mr. Sutherland: We have both sir, and it comes down to the actual membership.

Mr. Fortier: Is it a majority vote that prevails or does anyone have a right of veto?

Mr. Sutherland: There is no right of veto, sir. No one has been turned down in the last 35 years. An application is made and the dealing is done at the office level and negotiations are back and forth.

If the incoming member wants to find out what it is going to cost, what do I get and so on, this is all told to him, and then it comes to a membership committee. This is a matter of a meeting and then there is another meeting of 5 or 10 minutes, and the general manager explains it—this is routine—and then it goes to the board—I am sorry, it is done at the board level.

Mr. Fortier: And it is a majority vote which carries the day?

Mr. Sutherland: Yes. I have never actually known of a poll to be taken.

Mr. Fortier: The existing members in a city for example could not vote down the application of a new publisher—coming back to the Toronto and New Glasgow example?

Mr. Sutherland: No. Basically, it's a case of getting them in. There is an interesting thing sir, in this Toronto case. By our constitution which was set up—if Senator Bourque will forgive me—a good many years ago, by misfortune it was just French and English.

There is now a newspaper in Toronto being published in the Italian language and they applied for service and we were able to give them instant service by selling them Broadcast News but the point came up, why shouldn't they be able to get in Canadian Press? But our constitution bound us to French and English. We are now in the process of changing that and we will be approaching them. Again, we can't force them to join, but we would be glad to have them in.

We were tied down by this thinking of 50 years ago sir, but it is now being amended.

Mr. Fortier: I was wondering Mr. Chairman, if we might ask Mr. Sutherland to file with the Committee a copy of the by-law; I think you referred earlier to your guidelines but not to the by-laws.

Mr. Sutherland: We would be happy to supply that, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Fine, thank you.

Mr. Fortier: Your rate structure as it appears to me as a layman, appears to be very complex. Could you give us one or two examples. We will take two or three dailies—let's say one with a circulation of ten thousand. What rate—what annual rate would that newspaper be assessed?

Mr. Sutherland: My own newspaper is in that category.

Mr. Fortier: That is why I took it.

Mr. Sutherland: What do you mean by a rate increase? I happen to know there is a rate increase going through that the members don't know about. The decision was only made a couple of days ago in Ottawa, but we will be paying slightly above $12,000 per year.

Mr. Fortier: Well, let's move up to a daily with a circulation of 20,000?

Mr. Sutherland: Sault Ste. Marie...

Mr. Dauphinee: To compare figures evenly we should probably go to 1969 figures to put an increase on for this year. The year before, a paper with a circulation of 9,000—you paid $11,215 and in the same year a paper of roughly double the circulation, say 19,000 paid $19,182.

Mr. Fortier: And a newspaper let's say with a circulation of 50,000?

Mr. Dauphinee: $38,228.

Mr. Fortier: Those figures again?

Mr. Dauphinee: $38,228.

Mr. Fortier: It would appear from a very fast look at these three figures that the smaller papers pay relatively more than the larger newspapers?

Mr. Dauphinee: The rate per thousand reduces as circulation increases.

Mr. Sutherland: This is a very sore point with people like me. Again, I would like to say...

Senator Prowse: You are working on that one.

Mr. Sutherland: No. You can't be a co-operative and be fighting all the time. We fight for our own benefits to improve the service but we are 50 years old and we have a tradition and we work it out.

The rate does go down with the larger papers and we accept that.

Mr. Dauphinee: The thing is, Mr. Fortier, the thing that needs to be remembered about the fee structure is that this was not something imposed on the membership as would be the case in commercial companies. This was taken by decision—we first had an assessment committee study reported inequities, and then by the executive committee and then by the board and finally by the membership as a whole. So it is the membership that decided how the cost should be decided.

Mr. Fortier: Assuming a newspaper in Canada with a circulation of 400,000, what would be the annual fee?

Mr. Dauphinee: If it was in a city by itself it would be about $160,000.

Mr. Fortier: What do you mean by that?

Mr. Dauphinee: If it was in a city with no other papers.

Mr. Fortier: And if it was not?

Mr. Dauphinee: If it were in a city with other papers it would pay lower because the total circulation would be larger and the rate would be lower.

Mr. Fortier: And that is where that complex method of calculating the rates comes in?

Mr. Sutherland: If I may say so sir, it is extremely complicated. The only satisfaction that we have is that the A.P. in the United States, I believe, has been looking at us in recent years as theirs is even worse.

We are smaller and by the nature of things, we are closer to each other and our members over the years become friends. It is possible to work things out and get down to a sensible basis.

Senator Smith: Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question?

The Chairman: Certainly.

Senator Smith: So I may get a better understanding of this whole area, I am sure you can tell me how much newsprint a 10,000 circulation newspaper uses. Don't tell us what you personally use...

The Chairman: I should say in fairness, Senator Smith, that the witness is not here as a publisher of his own paper. By all means he can answer the question, but I don't want you to feel that you should have to.

Mr. Sutherland: I am sorry, I really can't answer that question. My brother Bill handles the business end and a man from your constituency could tell you this because we buy from a manufacturer there.

Senator Smith: My neighbour sells it to you.

Mr. Sutherland: I would think we use approximately somewhere between four and five hundred tons a year. This varies naturally by the number of pages and the number of advertising.

Senator Smith: Well, Mr. Sutherland, I was just wondering what your relative cost structure would be.

Mr. Sutherland: The smaller newspapers are hit less by an increase in the price of newsprint and hit more by an economy in which general prices—inflation hits, and the cost of wages go up, because proportionately more of our money goes into staff than in the bigger papers. I think this is general across the country.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Mr. Chairman, there is one complaint that we have often heard across the country and it is generally levelled at the local level against individual members of the newspaper fraternity. It is a complaint by organized labour that on union activity and disputes and so on, the union does not get a fair deal.

Now, understand me clearly. I am not supporting the contention. They suggest for instance that a strike in itself is flash news but not the best news, but what caused the strike is really the thing the Canadian people should be interested in. Now, this is from their viewpoint, of course.

Now, do you as a news gathering and disseminating organization face this charge or is it more at the localized level?

Mr. Sutherland: Well sir, the criticism also comes that we pay too much attention to strike news and we don't give enough attention to the management side. We endeavour to cover both sides and these are the instructions to the staff carrying this out.

I have never been in on the details of it, but perhaps this should be handled by the general manager, but I know in general it's a very difficult situation to get both sides to talk.

The Chairman: I think in fairness to Senator McElman's question and in fairness to you I should point out that representations reaching the committee—we have none that I know of from management complaining as you suggest. We have received and expect to receive more from labour, and I think that is possibly why Senator McElman asked the question.

It may be that management feels this way as well, but we are not aware of it.

Mr. Dauphinee: Well, we had correspondence with an old friend of mine who worked on the staff, Mr. Jack Williams of the Canadian Labour Congress, and we had an exchange of correspondence, which I appreciated, on many of the points which he felt was a lack of emphasis and a lack of attention to labour news.

I think similarly he appreciated a number of the points that I made in my reply, but we had to agree that labour news is of growing importance.

One of the reasons we have added a man to Ottawa or applied to have authorization granted for a man for Ottawa, is for the express purpose, to provide more time for labour reporting. This is specifically stated in our approach to the executive committee for permission to add the man to Ottawa.

The Chairman: Are there any other questions of the Senators?

Mr. Norman Smith: You raised what, if I may say so, seems to be a very understandable question as to why the Canadian Press could not keep a check of the news that it sends out as it had been run in the newspapers and I think on the face of it we replied no, we did not keep a formal full check.

On the basis that this looks as though we are not giving the customer necessarily what he wants—and I think that while you are thinking about that you might keep in mind that in the case of CP, the customer is also the buyer and is also the producer. The service is really tailored for the membership.

Now, in this case you had mentioned that it would seem a long time to wait before the publisher or the editor reached the annual meeting, but in fact as well as an annual meeting there is a spring meeting and there are regional meetings which go on in addition to that.

There is, in addition to that, a stream of letters going back and forth and there are managing editors who then come in daily to the publisher or to the editors and say, I have not got this, or they have been sending us too much of that, and for goodness sakes, get on the blower and tell them.

I think it is significant that if we were laying down too much news that was not being used, the publishers and editors would feel that this was probably news that they weren't getting and that they would like to get. When that is the case, we hear from them.

I think there is almost a daily rapport between what really gets into the paper not in the form of a formal check but the regional superintendent—and I have been with CP for a number of years—the regional superintendent always in fact checks the papers to see how the things get along and when there is too much news that is not getting in that should have got in or when we feel they haven't run a Canadian Press story, we check to see why it didn't get in.

I think it is a much closer check than you might get from the fact that we don't keep a formal one, but also lastly, the difficulty in keeping that check is further complicated by the fact that many papers have many editions, and you would not be just checking one edition.

A paper might decide to use an item in the first edition because it was the kind of item that suited the region that first edition would run to, but not in the second and so on and so forth. It would set up a very considerable bookkeeping operation and I really don't think it would accomplish what you have in mind.

I think really the customer would let us know—would let the Canadian Press know if he was getting too much stuff that he didn't want.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Senator Hays: Yes. I was pleased to learn that when the Canadian Labour Congress learned when they weren't getting the fair treatment as far as coverage was concerned—

Mr. Dauphinee: Not unfair treatment, sir; insufficient.

Senator Hays: Well, the coverage was insufficient.

Mr. Dauphinee: They didn't accuse us of being unfair.

Senator Hays: Do you as a group or does your executive sit down and say "Well, here is a field in industry that we feel is not getting a fair amount of the news and they should be given preferential treatment." That sort of thing?

Mr. Dauphinee: I mentioned sir, that that was brought to the executive committee with a request, as part of the reason for a request for an addition to the Ottawa staff.

Primarily, that sort of comment and dealing with people who may question our coverage—this is the type of matter that we would deal with at the next meeting of the executive committee.

Senator Hays: So that any group that felt possibly more exposure, or felt that they were entitled to more exposure, then you listen to this?

Mr. Dauphinee: That's right. We may not give them more exposure—

Senator Hays: Oh, I realize that.

Mr. Sutherland: This happens all the time.

Senator Prowse: I have two questions which I could put very quickly. I know you must be concerned with the question of providing diversity in the news. What technique do you use in order to assure that there is a diversity in news and this gets across to the public?

Mr. Dauphinee: You mean a diversity of opinion?

Senator Prowse: Yes, I guess it would come down to that, different points of view.

Mr. Dauphinee: The second paragraph of the principal section which is the introductory chapter of the style book which is required reading for every employee says:

"The Association has no interest except to fulfil its purpose unbiased, fearless recording of facts. Conflicting sides of a dispute are given balanced objective treatment."

This is the way we go about it. Sometimes there is criticism that because of the set-up in journalism there is a lack of access to the media by minority groups. I think I probably hear more criticism that we provide too much coverage dealing with the dissenting groups and minority groups, and I don't think that is necessarily bad. I think that ultimately this brings up the other side and you soon get back to a balance in any case.

Senator Prowse: Just by getting as much as you can?

Mr. Dauphinee: That's right. While we operate the service, we don't own the service. As you said earlier, we have 100 bosses and if the Edmonton Journal where an old friend of mine is the publisher, Ross Munro—if the Edmonton Journal thinks we are not providing sufficient coverage on some element of the populace, then he tells us.

Senator Prowse: The second question has to do with staff. Do you have any problems in getting staff that are qualified and what is your experience being able to hold people in the business?

Mr. Dauphinee: I think we have the best staff that we have ever had, partly because it is a larger staff but basically because it's better qualified.

I went into the staff records just for amusement and preparation and I found that on our staff—and I am talking now about Canadian Press only—I found that on our staff we have 177 in the last payroll. Editorial staff I am talking about.

We have 59 university graduates in that number; that is one-third. We have 38 B.A.'s, a half dozen with B.A.'s plus journalism certificates or diplomas, six Bachelor of Journalism, six M.A.'s, two Bachelors of Science and one Bachelor of Science and Social Sciences. 53 others on the staff attended university but didn't graduate. People like me—I ran into the Depression and got out of university. Six others have no degree but they have a journalism diploma.

So that a total of 118 that I have just mentioned, 33 were hired before 1960 and 85 since, and of that 85, people with university experience, 67 of them were hired since 1965. So the tendency is more and more to hire people with university training and university background.

Now, as for keeping staff, we lose more than I would like to see us lose. It is not all a complete loss. You get a friend up the line and you have someone in the department who knows how we operate and so on. We lose more people to government and public relations than we do to other newspaper or broadcasting situations.

Our salaries are getting better and we don't lose as many as we did. The last three young people we have taken on in the Ottawa bureau are out of the M.A. stream at Carlton. This is the sort of people that we can now attract.

These fellows are not old pros immediately, but they are the young fellows that ten years from now will be doing a hot shot job.

Senator Prowse: They have the basic equipment now?

Mr. Dauphinee: Yes.

The Chairman: I would like to ask just two questions.

The first is, do the editorial staff of Canadian Press belong to the American Newspaper Guild?

Mr. Sutherland: No, sir.

The Chairman: Has the Guild tried to organize the staff?

Mr. Sutherland: A good many years ago.

The Chairman: Have they tried recently?

Mr. Sutherland: I don't know. They may have.

Mr. Dauphinee: We would be the last to know.

The Chairman: Another question I wanted to ask: Mr. Sutherland, do you think it is one of the functions of the press in Canada as opposed to the Canadian Press to contribute to national unity?

Mr. Sutherland: Well, we at the Canadian Press take pride in our day to day work.

The Chairman: I am talking now not about Canadian Press but of the press of Canada.

Mr. Sutherland: You are asking my personal opinion?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Sutherland: I am happy to contribute to Canadian unity. I don't think Senator Bourque would want me to go over and shake his hand for being a Canadian, but I love to hear a Quebec voice.

My earliest training in newspapering was in the Province of Quebec, in Montreal, and I got along very happily there. I am very fond of Canadian unity.

The Chairman: Well, let me be more specific. In the Broadcasting Act, broadcasters by the Act must contribute to national unity. Actually that phraseology is in the Act itself.

I wonder if—I don't think newspapers should be compelled to do anything, but should they in fact—what interests me is the fact that this phrase is in your brief. You say the Canadian Press, one of its purposes and functions, purports to be contributing to national unity. I am wondering if that is the role and function of the Canadian Press, is it fair to go further and say that is the role and function of newspapers in Canada?

Mr. Sutherland: I would put it this way, sir. I quite agree with you that you shouldn't compel, because as soon as you compel you are not free.

I can't think of a newspaper which isn't interested in Canadian unity.

The Chairman: Well, interested and contributing—there is a difference.

Mr. Sutherland: All right, I will say contributing.

The Chairman: You believe that all newspapers do?

Mr. Sutherland: I should think they do by the way they operate and by their efforts and their editorial policies and their reporting from Ottawa and the thinking of the people who run them. They are all interested in seeing Canada stay Canada.

I am speaking now strictly on the English language papers. I must insist that I will not speak for my French colleagues. My French colleagues are very capable of speaking for themselves and I have the utmost confidence in them at all levels.

The Chairman: Well, thank you Mr. Sutherland, Mr. Dauphinee, Mr. Speers, and Mr. Edwards. We have been grateful to have you here and it has been a long session. I apologize for having been so long but it has been useful to us and we are grateful to you.

The Committee adjourned.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, this afternoon we welcome the publisher and the editor of the Windsor Star. The publisher is on my right, Mr. Mark Farrell. On my left is the editor, Mr. Norman Hull.

I say to them that your brief was received by us some three weeks in advance, as we requested. It has been circulated to the members of the Committee. I think that for purposes of this afternoon's discussion, we can take the brief as read.

I propose, Mr. Farrell, in keeping with the Guidelines, to offer you now as much as 15 minutes. You need not feel you need to use all that time, but by all means, if you wish, you may.

In that time period you can summarize your brief, expand, explain and review, or talk about anything else. Following that, we will have a question period on contents of your brief, things you may or may not say, or anything else that the Senators want to talk about.

I should say to the members of the Committee and to Mr. Farrell and Mr. Hull that as you people are the first publishers we have received, it could be in the course of the afternoon that the Senators will wish to ask questions pertaining to financial information, the nature of which you may feel is confidential.

Should that occasion arise, and of course, it may not, we would be prepared at your request to conduct part of the meeting in camera.

Mr. Mark Farrell, Publisher, The Windsor Star: I just want to make a very brief statement. We have tried in our brief to be brief and I think we can serve a useful purpose by answering your questions.

There is only one point that I want to touch on. Whereas I support the brief of the Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association as it is written, I think that my concept of the freedom of the press is somewhat different from that as reported of the President of the CDNPA.

Other than that I think I would rather answer questions.

The Chairman: Fine. Thank you.

I think that this afternoon's questions to begin with might be from Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: Mr. Chairman, perhaps the witness would care first of all to let us have his view of what the freedom of the press means.

Mr. Farrell: Well, as we said in our brief, it is an old whore that should be retired. It is used; it is supplied and it has been prostituted so often that I prefer the expression, a free flow of information. I do not consider the freedom of the press as anything to do with taxes, or finance. It is purely the free flow of information.

As we said in our brief, I think your colleagues, Senators are very impressed with the thing on freedom of the press.

The Chairman: Which is appended to your brief.

Mr. Farrell: Yes.

Senator McElman: You have in your brief given some strong views and support for the principle of a Press Council and suggested that it would work most effectively in a nation such as ours if it were operated at the local, provincial and federal levels.

Mr. Farrell: Yes.

Senator McElman: Would you care to elaborate a bit upon that?

Mr. Farrell: Well, you see, I think our country is so different from almost any other country that the newspapers are basically local. We have no national newspaper really, and as such, I think it has to start at the community level. If something happens there that is of national, or I would say in the first instance, provincial importances, it could move up to a Provincial Council and then in the final analysis, up to Ottawa here.

Senator McElman: Thank you.

Mr. Norman Hull, Editor, The Windsor Star: I just want to say when considering the community council, we also are being a little selfish because we feel not only would this benefit the Windsor Star, it would benefit us also if we had a group of responsible citizens who sat down and said, "What is wrong with our papers; what is wrong with so and so?"

We feel it is a two-way street and we both are coming down it.

Senator McElman: Would you take the second and third levels, provincial and federal levels, as being made up of publishers, newspaper people, as a self-policing organization, or in combination with private citizens, as he says?

Mr. Farrell: First of all, self-policing. It should be about 50-50 newspaper people. On the other hand, if the other half would be the public, then the Chairman should be a public figure and not a newspaper.

Senator McElman: Right. You state in your brief, Page 16, Paragraph 37:

"The majority of newspapers appear to be opposed to the formation of press councils. If the chains had one vote each it is debatable whether this would be the case."

Does this imply that chains, as such, are against press councils?

Mr. Farrell: I think you would agree that I should not mention any names. To the best of my knowledge, two of the major chains are opposed and the third one is in favour. But it is a question of newspaper numbers.

Senator McElman: Since you are the first spokesman or witness for the industry, the independently-owned press, and your brief shows rather clearly that you wish to remain so, as opposed to becoming part of a group-owned chain, can you tell us some of the principal problems that you face in remaining in it? Perhaps you could give particular reference, although you have dealt with it to a degree in your brief—the estate taxes and even more currently, the implications of the current white paper on taxation, as it would affect the closely held independent group and any other problems that you might wish to refer to?

Mr. Farrell: If I can start in order. We have no trouble in maintaining independence as of now. But the only reason we are in on account of a combination of good luck, good judgment, and very frugal operations of the newspaper to prepare these succession duties.

As of today, they are okay. We certainly have no past resources, but we have enough resources to publish a good, responsible paper. We have been extremely heavily hit by succession duties. As we said in our brief we do not believe it is fair to place a valuation on the paper, as valuation to what chain would pay for us, because it is obviously a higher price than an independent would pay for us.

I think we have incidents where taxation is somewhat unfair. I think it also is unfair that in the case of the independent newspaper, one has to pay straight away, instead of say 10 or 20 years to pay it off. It is a sudden bang.

As to the white paper, I do not think this will affect us one way or the other. I am only talking for ourselves because what has happened has happened in the past two years.

The Chairman: Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: Are there any particular areas of activity as an independent in which you face competition with groups or chains that you would consider out of the ordinary, such as for staff salaries and wages and advertising rates?

Mr. Farrell: No; no; absolutely no.

Senator McElman: My next question, and I ask for the patience of both the Chairman and the witnesses, is rather lengthy I am afraid.

The Chairman: Is it a question or a speech?

Senator McElman: It is a question with some foundation necessary.

The Chairman: All right.

Senator McElman: You make rather extensive reference to what you consider the ills of conglomerate ownership in the communication field. We assume you mean all media.

Do you believe that publishers, editors, and reporters—being human beings—could be expected to perform their functions in full conscience if the conglomerate owning their papers also owned or controlled—and here is where I ask you for patience—pulp and paper and saw mills, oil refineries, shipbuilding yards, bus lines, finance companies, engineering firms, base metal mines, fishing vessels, a deep sea fleet of vessels, boat companies, real estate companies, financial institutions, structural cement components, cement manufacturing for industry and construction purposes, steel fabrication plants, bus assembly, prefabricated homes and classrooms, a widely based gas, oil and automobile accessory distribution system throughout several Provinces, wholesale and retail hardware business, light and heavy equipment manufacture and sales—to mention a few of them, conglomerates that also have financial interests out of Canada—would the publishers and editors, reporters, et cetera, of the newspapers owned by such conglomerates be able to carry out their duties as responsible reporters of news to the public, or would they conceivably be conscious or subconscious in their consideration of the news stories as to the effect upon the other elements of the conglomerate?

Now, I hope this is not unfair to you, but you are an independent newspaper man—apparently without any inhibitions or strictures.

Mr. Farrell: Now, as we said in our brief, we only speak for ourselves. I think that I could answer maybe simply and I am not charging the answer is that.

It is hard enough for any newspaperman to do a good job and all that you cite, I think, makes it even harder to do a good job.

Senator McElman: Thank you.

The Chairman: Do you have more questions, Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Yes.

The Chairman: Is this also a speech or just a question this time?

Senator McElman: I would like to ask as well what your experiences are or your views are with respect to organized labour in the newspaper field. Are you a union plant?

Mr. Farrell: Yes; we are.

Senator McElman: Is it Guild?

Mr. Farrell: No. We have no Guild. Otherwise it is completely unionized by all the ordinary craft union, ITU, LPI, typists et cetera. They are like newspapers. Some of them are easy to deal with and reasonable. I think I would say reasonably good. Others are—well, like pulling a wildcat strike; they welcomed me as publisher that way. As a matter of fact, we were hit hard. I think there is only one union that has not played fair; I think the others play fair on the whole.

Mr. Hull: I would like to say, Senator, that we did have a fair vote under the Department of Labour of Ontario for the Guild and they lost.

The Chairman: How long ago was that?

Mr. Hull: It was in 1946.

The Chairman: 1946

Senator Beaubien: 1946?

The Chairman: 1946. Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: At Page 11 of your brief, Section 17(b), the question put to you was. Is it desirable and economically feasible for the Canadian media to have more direct representation in major news originating areas of the world? Your reply is yes, desirable and economically feasible. Does your answer mean through Canadian Press or some news-gathering service of similar type, or direct representations?

Mr. Farrell: I was answering that really in the context of the Canadian Press. We have in very round figures, about two percent of the circulation in Canada. We pay Canadian Press around $90,000 a year.

I would be very happy to pay them $95,000 a year, another $5,000 which would mean another 40 times that, another $200,000 for Canadian Press. We would like to see extensive coverage out of Washington in particular.

I do not think the Canadian Press does a complete job. I do not think they can cover

Washington with the staff they have. They cannot cover from a Canadian point of view. $5,000 would not be the cost of a reporter of our own down there. Staffing and everything else would cost us $20,000 and he only could touch the odd place here and there.

Senator McElman: We had an opinion on that this morning from CP and probably will get the other side of the coin.

Mr. Farrell: I have not heard anything CP said and I emphasize we only are talking for ourselves.

Senator McElman: You speak of Washington. You would feel the same way with respect to other world capitals where they presumably have events happening of intense interest to Canadians?

Mr. Farrell: Washington in particular.

Senator McElman: In 17(c) you say "Is there a Canadian viewpoint, or an attitude rooted in the Canadian experience, which is not receiving adequate expression?" Your answer is "Yes."

Would you elaborate on that?

Mr. Farrell: I think the answer to that really is in the answer to 17(a). We say "It is important here to define the difference between news that comes in or is gathered by the newspaper and the news that is published by the newspaper. We estimate that 65 percent of the news that comes in and is gathered by our own staff is non-Canadian. Publication of the news is another matter. We estimate that 70 percent of the news we publish is Canadian."

I think the mathematics of the situation indicates that we are not. We are not getting enough Canadian views so that we can make our choice. We send out our own people to cover important stories, elections and things like that, because we feel we do not get enough stuff over the wire.

Senator McElman: In your particular location, eyeball do eyeball with your confreres in the United States, do you feel a pressure to carry United States content?

Mr. Farrell: No; oddly enough, no. We cannot carry some United States content that we would like to because the syndicate with rights in our area has a different view. This is somewhat irritating.

Senator McElman: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Hull: I might add to that interest of American news. There is a definite interest in Detroit itself, which we consider one of our suburbs almost. This is to the degree that they are interested in who is Mayor of the City and they are interested in Michigan news to a limited degree. It is almost like another province because of the mere fact that we have about 4500 Windsor people working in Detroit and untold hundreds more who are former Canadians working in Detroit.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I think I should direct this question to Mr. Hull. I am reading from Page 7, item 8(d) of the brief: "What are the principles governing your selection of the news, information, and other material you present, and the apportionment of time and space allotted to the various kinds of material?"

The answer is "The truth. The balance and format of news is determined largely by tradition."

I wonder if we could have a more detailed answer. For example, you are a newspaper that publishes right on the shores of the Detroit River. How have you treated the problem of pollution in the river in your newspaper in recent years?

Mr. Hull: Starting with our editorial page, we have enumerated in editorials and numerous editorials bringing it to the attention of all parties, government agencies, and so on.

We have on our staff a man we almost consider a pollution expert because he is one who has done so much extensive research in it. Actually, we have a 16 column spread in the center of the paper which is an editorial and eight pages of comment. We have had innumerable articles pointing out with pictures—we have had one of our local members of Parliament essentially interested in that. We had him submit an article of his own.

I think that we definitely have stressed this, called it to the attention of authorities, just about as strongly as we possibly could. We are getting results. Mr. Kerr of the Provincial Government seems very interested. We have recognized his ability and his apparent concern and keen interest in this problem. So far as pollution is concerned, I think we had a very strong editorial not very long ago about pulp and paper companies polluting. We said "We are going to take a very close look at suppliers as to how they are treating the pollution problem."

In other words, clean it up or maybe you are going to lose some business.

Mr. Fortier: Were you assessing your performance in this respect, would you say that you performed truthfully and fully? Is that correct?

Mr. Hull: Yes; I would think so.

Mr. Fortier: On another front, Windsor is a labour town, a UAW town. How have you treated the labour scene in your newspaper in recent years?

Mr. Hull: I think the best way to answer that, sir, is there was a party in Windsor a week Friday night for a gentleman by the name of Angus Munroe, who is one of the senior reporters, with us almost 40 years. Most of his experience has been on the labour beat.

This was not a Windsor party. This was a party arranged by his happy public, some 200 people representing all phases of life—Red Cross, etcetera. The longest and finest telegram was from Walter Reuther saying how much he appreciated Mr. Munroe's very fair and accurate reporting.

Mr. George Burt, who had just retired as the Canadian Director of the UAW, was there and made a very fine speech. They were followed by Mr. Ron Todgham, President of Chrysler, who certainly had fine things to say about Mr. Munroe's labour writing, etcetera.

This was followed by the President of the Chamber of Commerce. This to me was a pretty close picture of how we presented the labour news. Mr. Munroe also said he was very proud of his editor for 40 years. He honestly could say he never had been instructed or advised how to write a story. This is with the Windsor Star.

We cover labour very extensively. We have two men who are, we feel, experts on this field. We have a labour column twice a week and it is a column of labour news, appointments in labour and long statements sometimes, along with editorial statements from Mr. McDermitt and people like that.

I would say that possibly this is one field of reporting that we have improved greatly on in the last 10 years.

Mr. Fortier: Would you say that you have become more labour oriented than management oriented in the last 10 years?

Mr. Hull: I would not say we were oriented either way. I would say we have improved. I would say this is the increase in coverage. We have a man in Ottawa today who is with the UWA presenting the brief to Mr. Pepin on the auto pact.

We cover all labour organizations, Canadian wide, provincial wide. We give a fair and accurate coverage of strikes, etcetera, as such. I would think that our relations with labour as such today are very good. I think they would agree with that statement.

Mr. Fortier: How many reporters do you have on your staff to whom you can give assignments in depth, on a particular topic to examine and study and report upon in a series of articles?

Do you have the staff available to do this sort of thing?

Mr. Hull: Yes. We have approximately 105 on our editorial staff. I have 25 city reporters at this time and, of course, every paper has major beats such as labour, education, church, city hall, etcetera.

Our staff today, I feel, is the strongest we have had in my 39 years with the paper for the simple reason you bring out—that we have been very successful.

If I may just take a minute to explain how we get staff; we originated a summer training program about four years ago. I hire eight to nine university men, preferably. They are students who definitely have decided to make a career of journalism.

We try to get as many first year students as we can. We pay them well. We have had some of them two, three, or four summers.

Mr. Fortier: What is the starting salary right now?

Mr. Hull: Roughly $90 a week. This is for the first year. We increase it every year, of course, if they come.

I should say this. Last year was our 50th Anniversary and we produced a 316-page paper. We had so many staff working on this, we had to curtail the student program. However, in the two years previous, 10 out of our 12 reporters came through this system.

Now, you asked me how they are as experts. I would say that we have in practically every major field a man who we feel can sit down with any expert in the field and talk sensibly to him. This also is achieved by a program we have of adding to the education.

We have maybe four now with BAs' working on MA's. We pay the salary. Any people on our staff who want to take night courses or anything, so long as it is not French horn or something like that, we will pay the full tuition fees. This has worked out very well. It is something like Russian roulette. We have educated and trained a lot of reporters for other papers, but we feel it is to our advantage.

Now, we try to steer them into increasing their education in the field in which we want them to work; for example our business writers take postgraduate courses in business and labour relations, etcetera. I would say we possibly have at least 14 to 15 members of our editorial staff who could be judged as experts in this field.

Mr. Fortier: Do you have a large enough staff at the moment, Mr. Hull, or could you use more money to hire more reporters?

Mr. Hull: I never have been instructed, especially by the present publishers, as to limitations of staff.

The Chairman: I think the present publisher wants to say something.

Mr. Farrell: On your question on labour, I thought you might be interested in the fact we have started a purely private survey. We already have done 250 in Windsor on a strictly statistically controlled basis. We will be happy to give your committee the final results after we get 750.

The Chairman: We will be glad to receive that.

Mr. Farrell: The first wave of 250 answered the question "Do you consider the Star pro-labour?" papers?", etcetera. The scale said pro-labour, 22 percent; slightly on the side of labour, 27 percent; in the center, 31 percent; somewhat anti, 10 percent; very anti, 10 percent.

Mr. Fortier: You have a very wide reading.

Mr. Farrell: And on our political base we asked what party they thought we supported. The answers broke down as follows: Liberal, 26 percent; Conservative, 9 percent; NDP, 1 percent; and 64 percent, no affiliation.

The Chairman: What is the correct answer to that?

Mr. Farrell: 100 percent no opinion is the correct answer to that.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you.

The Chairman: I want to apologize to the Senators and everyone present for the heat. I understand there is something wrong with the ventilation. It is in the process of being fixed. If you will bear with us, hopefully we will be able to adjust the heat downward in a moment or two. It is being attended to now.

Mr. Fortier: Well, Mr. Farrell or Mr. Hull, on this point of coverage of the labour scene, do Canadian papers generally—in your opinion—give adequate coverage to the labour scene in Canada?

The Chairman: Did you hear the question?

Mr. Farrell: Yes. I do not think I would like to comment on that. It varies from paper to paper. I think we only speak for ourselves. All the other papers will be appearing and we would rather have them speak for themselves.

Mr. Fortier: The Committee might also like to hear the views of the individual publishers on how other newspapers compare in the country rather than have a self-praise answer.

Mr. Farrell: Well, no. It is something that we are troubled with and I do not think the normal householder buys probably for four, five Canadian newspapers. I buy three. How can I judge?

Mr. Fortier: All right. I also was very interested to read and hear your remarks about the estate taxes.

Mr. Farrell: I know it is a matter of deep concern to you and other independent newspapers in Canada. Would you have a suggestion to make as to how this burden could be either removed or alleviated by legislation?

Mr. Fortier: Could we hear your views, please?

Mr. Farrell: I think in the first place, the evaluation as I previously said should be based on what other independent owners would pay for the paper.

In the second place, I think that there should be a 20-year delay. If the payments go over 20 years and you could set a rate of interest of five percent and if the paper were sold to a chain or group, all those taxes would become . . .

Mr. Fortier: Be recaptured.

Mr. Farrell: Straight away, plus your five or six percent interest.

Mr. Fortier: What about the suggestion that has been made in some quarters that there be no estate taxes levied if the newspaper shares were handed down to members of the immediate family?

Mr. Farrell: I would like it, but it is hardly equitable to everybody else who has to pay taxes. I think we should pay our fair share of taxes, the same way as everybody else.

Mr. Fortier: Your suggestion is that it be deferred over a period of time?

Mr. Farrell: Yes, and the valuation not be an excessive one.

Mr. Fortier: Yes. You are marrying the two answers together.

Mr. Farrell: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: You spoke very eloquently in favour of a press or newspaper community council. We read in your brief, Item 29, that the establishment of such a council is not an immediate priority for your newspaper.

Could you explain, Mr. Farrell, why you do not consider that it is an immediate priority and also, what are the immediate priorities of your newspaper today?

Mr. Farrell: I would say our immediate priority comes in having to hook up two different sorts of presses into one line, which is going to be a tough job. I think we are somewhat understaffed.

We are trying to get extra staff. Norm Hull and I want to work on those areas of the paper until we are satisfied. I would say that we would hope we would be able to start a community council before the end of 1970.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you.
Senator Everett.

Senator Everett: Mr. Farrell, in Item 2(c) on Page 3, you state that the concentration of ownership of newspapers "is obviously not socially desirable and obviously criteria other than the marketplace should apply."

I think it has been put to us by those who have concentrated ownership that it is desirable in order to maintain what they call freedom of the press. I wonder if you would mind commenting on why you feel concentration is bad.

Mr. Farrell: I could start simply then by giving a quote from the Hutchins Report, 1947, the famous report on a free and responsible press.

In the first place, a newspaper influences more than one would hope. Therefore, in a democratic society, I believe, there should be the greatest possible fragmentation so you get dissenting opinion.

I should like to add here that I do not mention any names. Again—there are chain-newspapers that are incomparably superior to some independent newspapers, and if I can quote the Hutchins Report to you: "Freedom of the press for the coming period can only continue as an accountable freedom. Its moral right will be conditioned on its acceptance of this accountability. This is a legal right that will stand unaltered as its moral duty is performed."

I think the concentration of ownership tends to mitigate against this.

Senator Everett: Mr. Farrell, I wonder what constitutes competition in the income sense for the Windsor Star? I think it is true to say that your income is from advertising revenue, circulation, and a certain amount of public job printing, and perhaps returns on investments of a short term nature or something like that.

Mr. Farrell: Well, our competition basically comes from the other media—television and radio. I think that the best way to express it is that the radio station AM-FM of CKLW is about to be sold for somewhere between $8 million and $16 million. Now if that is only on an advertising base, I would say any price in that range would be something that could not be.

$16 million certainly is way over the price that any sensible person would pay for the Windsor Star. That radio station is only one of six radio stations in our area, our community.

Senator Everett: Do those radio and television stations preclude you from raising your advertising rates, or do you find rather that a newspaper is a unique advertising medium? Within broad limitations, is your freedom to raise your rates pretty well as you see fit?

Mr. Farrell: Yes. I think we would raise our rates to what we figure the traffic will bear.

Senator Everett: And in raising those rates, you do not give then, presumably, a very heavy consideration to the rates of other media?

Mr. Farrell: No. We give more consideration to the rates of other newspapers because the national advertiser compares one newspaper against another, so one obviously has to hew to that line.

Senator Everett: The newspapers would be newspapers in the jurisdiction of other cities. You would not be able to give consideration to newspapers within your own circulation area.

Mr. Farrell: No.

Senator Everett: You really would have no competition.

Mr. Farrell: Well, we have competition from Sarnia and Chatham and the London Free Press, but this is only in what I call our fringe areas.

Senator Everett: So then, consideration is given for the most part to the view of the national advertiser?

Mr. Farrell: Yes; and the retailer.

Senator Everett: You say the national advertiser because he is the one who would compare say Toronto, Winnipeg, other newspapers that would not be within your circulation area?

Mr. Farrell: 50 percent of the retail advertising has a national base.

Senator Everett: You mean it is subsidized at a national level by national companies.

Mr. Farrell: Yes; plus the fact that in Windsor, I think every principal department store is owned outside of the city. One department store is home-owned; all the others are owned by chains.

Senator Everett: They, sir, would not be concerned though with what you are charging, say, Eatons in Toronto?

Mr. Farrell: Oh, yes.

Senator Everett: Would they? What would their alternative be if they thought you were charging too much in, say, relation to a Toronto newspaper?

Mr. Farrell: Well, cut the space or go into radio or television.

Mr. Hull: Shopping News.

Mr. Farrell: We have a Shopping News. In setting up the advertising rate, we hear "Really, we just hope you do not increase it too much; that is all."

Senator Everett: The point I am trying to establish is that a newspaper like the Windsor Star, it seems to me, because of its position in the community where there is no direct competition, has a very wide latitude in raising its advertising rates.

Mr. Farrell: Hardly; hardly. It is more a question of attitude, than a paper in Montreal, Toronto, Ottawa, Calgary—those are the only four cities where there is direct competition—and St. John's, Newfoundland.

Senator Everett: To what extent is profitability related to the concept of freedom of the press?

Mr. Farrell: I do not think it has any relation whatsoever. That is why I say freedom of the press is that old whore that should be retired. It has not got anything to do with it whatsoever. I do not think—I do not like the phrase "freedom of the press". It is the free flow of information.

Now in order to publish, a metropolitan newspaper has to be viable. It has to be profitable. Otherwise it will go under. However, subject to that, I do not think that it has anything to do with it whatsoever. I think there are two totally different things.

There is the free flow of information. It is your responsibility to handle the news, be in charge of your area circulation, and to get as much as you can from your advertising.

Senator Everett: As much as you can get from your advertising?

Mr. Farrell: Certainly, certainly.

Senator Everett: I put a question yesterday to Mr. Costello, which I will put to you. I said that in his judgment if a government agency were set up on the premise that an independent newspaper because of its independence and virtually non-competitive position in the community would be free to set its own advertising rates, and that newspaper should be handled much the same as a utility is handled. It should make representation to the government body about its costs, and the rate would be agreed upon between the newspaper and the public.

I am not saying whether that is the right thing to do or not. Frankly I do not think it is. But if it were done, would it in any way interfere with this concept of freedom of the press?

Mr. Farrell: None whatsoever. In my own opinion, it has not got anything to do with the freedom of the press at all.

If I were to ask an increase, I would be happy to submit it to any board. It probably would say to me, "I think you should charge more". I would say, "Well I would like to, but I do not think I can get away with it."

Senator Everett: One last question, Mr. Farrell. Page 5, Item 6(a), the question "In terms of practical application to your own operations, what do you see as the major technological changes likely to occur in the next decade?"

Can you tell me if, in your judgment, the development of computer applications, offset and facsimile printing in the next few years in any way is going to make it more possible or financially possible for new major newspapers to start in a community like Windsor in competition to the Windsor Star?

Mr. Farrell: I think so; yes. We have a facsimile operation, the only one of its kind in Canada, about 30 miles away from us at the moment, the Wallaceburg News. It is a small paper. It has just started a daily paper from a weekly paper.

In answer to your question, I think yes; I would say so.

Senator Everett: Thank you, Mr. Farrell. You are a most interesting witness.

The Chairman: Senator Hays.

Senator Hays: Mr. Farrell, Senator Everett was going to ask you to define freedom of responsible press, but you have pretty well taken care of that. I am wondering how you treat, or whether your newspaper as an independent paper has its own code of ethics within your own organization. Is this information given to all your reporters and that sort of thing?

Mr. Farrell: I am most fortunate. I only have been publisher since January. There was a magnificent tradition in the Windsor

Star of reporting the news. I can say only the other day that we were involved in a hassel over CKLW, the CBC and John Basset of Toronto. The instructions I gave to the reporter were "Play it straight, but if you lean any way, lean on the other side. They are involved."

Senator Hays: If, Mr. Farrell, you had misquoted Senator Paul Martin—which I know probably would not happen—and he became very annoyed about it and telephoned...

The Chairman: Which would happen.

Senator Hays: If he were pretty provoked and he wanted it corrected and this had been a headline of yours which was not too kind to him, how would you have treated that if it were an error on your part?

Mr. Farrell: We would publish a correction in the same way, in the same space, as the story has appeared.

We had an interesting example of this the other day. We have somebody who is very opinionated and he always has complaints about any story on him. He complained. We checked the story. We were satisfied our story was fair. I said, "We will not make a correction because we consider our story correct. However, you send us a letter in print and we will publish it."

He sent the letter. We printed it. Two days ago, we had somebody on the other side of the fence contradicting him and taking our side. That is how it happens.

Senator Hays: You said, Mr. Farrell, that you use the same amount of space on the same page to make the correction?

Mr. Farrell: Yes.

Senator Hays: Is this usual insofar as other newspapers are concerned?

Mr. Farrell: I think so. You notice the Globe and Mail, on Page 2, which I think is more prominent than some of the stories they run, they have a large box and they say "Our mistake."

Senator Hays: You feel that this is good newspaper reporting? Is that the way that all newspapers should handle this?

Mr. Farrell: Absolutely.

Senator Hays: On page 36, I am thinking of my own local newspaper, and a man was sued for $170,000 for a debt and by the same name.

The Chairman: By your name?

Senator Hays: No. He phoned up and he was pretty provoked on this. This was in the second section of the page and the publisher was quite disturbed about it. On Page 22, he said that this chap was a different person.

What is your thinking about reporting—say a man is charged with rape?

Mr. Farrell: Yes.

Senator Hays: And this is treated in a front page story if there are no other stories around. Then he is found innocent. How do you handle that?

The Chairman: Mr. Hull.

Mr. Hull: In the first place, anyone charged with rape or indecent assault or anything like that, we do not use their name until they are convicted. This is the practice. It is the same with drunk drivers and people like that. We do not use anything at all until they are convicted.

Senator Hays: Is it a general practice in all newspapers?

Mr. Hull: I do not think so. I could not tell you.

Senator Hays: Do you think it should be the practice of all newspapers?

Mr. Hull: The mere fact we do it; yes. Regardless of how strongly he is proven innocent, you have convicted him to a degree by an association with the crime.

Senator Hays: I would like to ask another question on a different subject.

Mr. Farrell, agriculture is—well, the fact that I am a poor farmer, I still think it is a great culture, the greatest culture in the world. They are suffering a great deal today. I am wondering if your newspaper, and I am sure you must feel the same way, how much space are you devoting to agriculture? As far as staff in your newspaper, how do you staff it agriculture-wise?

Mr. Farrell: I would say we are probably not handling enough of it. However, we did send our most senior reporter out west and we ran a good, long three-piece story on the opp-ed page on the wheat situation out west. I would say it is an area where we could and should do better.

Senator Hays: There is quite a gap now because of the very difficult time the agricultural press has had and the information is not available today. Would your feeling be that newspapers that are servicing quite large agricultural areas, which the Windsor Star is, should be doing more insofar as agriculture is concerned?

Mr. Farrell: In our own area, I think we cover our own agriculture, which is market gardening mostly and small mixed farming.

The Chairman: Excuse me. I think Mr. Hull wants to say something on this.

Mr. Hull: I am going to contradict the publisher to a degree.

The Chairman: Are you sure you want to say anything?

Mr. Hull: Along with the Senator before, when we were talking about experts in the field—we have three men whom I consider experts on farming. We staff all growers' associations meetings. We have one man who is out quite frequently covering various agriculture meetings of one type or another.

I agree possibly we do not do it to the extent we should, but I think we do it to a greater degree than the majority of other papers and it is part of our program of staffing important areas—labour, education, agriculture, whatever it is. We have a man there.

Senator Hays: Do you set aside a certain percentage of your news columns? Do you keep track of the amount?

Mr. Hull: Yes. We have 16 solid columns every day devoted to Kent and Lambton Counties, and a large percentage of this would be farm news. We have another eight columns, at least, every day devoted to Essex County other than Windsor itself—Leamington, Harrow and other farm areas. It is not a large percentage, but a sufficient percentage is dedicated to farming.

We have had main stories on Page 1 devoted to it. We play the newspapers by ear so far as this goes, not by edition. In other words, in our first edition, which primarily goes to these farm areas, we would line some accounts by the departments in Toronto which would not necessarily be on Page 1 in our final edition, which is strictly our City. We would use it in the inside somewhere.

Senator Hays: Have you found that the introduction of TV hurt insofar as your advertising was concerned or has it leveled off?

Mr. Hull: I would not say it hurt us; no.

Senator Hays: It did not hurt?

Mr. Hull: Not in any great degree anyway; no.

Mr. Farrell: I would say the automotive pact has had a very happy effect on Windsor from 1955 to 1960. It was a depressed area. I think that if there were no radio and television, there would be space in our market for other newspapers.

Mr. Hull: I was wrong there on the degree. I was thinking more of locally. It has hurt us from the national advertising point of view for the simple reason there is so much exposure to television and radio in our area. We have six Detroit TV stations and God knows how many radio—40 or 50 in that area. This market is looked at by national advertising.

The Chairman: Could I come off advertising for a moment? There is a statement in your brief which intrigues me. I would like to ask you about it, Mr. Farrell.

It is number 11 on Page 8: "Is there an 'establishment' which controls the mass media in Canada, or any one of the media?" The answer is one word, "Debatable."

I am wondering if you would discuss that answer for us, perhaps indicating if you will the pros, and presumably there are both pros and cons in a debate. What reasons are there for thinking that there is an establishment? Who is in that establishment?

Conversely, what reasons are there for thinking there is not an establishment?

Mr. Farrell: I think when you have heard all of the opinions of the newspapers, you will see that it represents a very different point of view in the sense that it is debatable. The very tendency of owning a newspaper is a fairly healthy, fairly well paid one, so one tends to associate with what is known as the establishment.

Therefore, it is the establishment point of view. It is apt to permeate one's point of view.

The Chairman: Well, we had a quotation yesterday which someone here used from an article which appeared in the Forum.

Desmond Morton said that it did not matter who owned the paper because the owners are all the same kind of people, wealthy businessmen, and what does it matter whether it belongs to this chain or that chain—I forget the exact quotation. You would then agree with Mr. Morton?

Mr. Farrell: I would not. I do not consider myself—I think I can give you an example. I am the only publisher who has been followed by both the RCMP and the Secret Police of Russia. Now, I do not consider that the establishment.

The Chairman: Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: Could I refer to Senator Hay's question.

The Chairman: Certainly.

Senator McElman: He spoke of the situation where an individual may be maligned or incorrectly reported, etcetera. I would like to raise the case of a community and the treatment that would be given it.

I think of one specific instance where this happened last Hallowe'en. The local newspaper in the community concerned carried a front page banner headline together with photographs of how people—I believe they were described as sadists—put razor blades into apples and the like and passed them to children.

The story went further. It isolated entirely three specific sections of the community where these apples had been handed out to youngsters.

It again referred to the people as pretty dreadful, in quite descriptive language. This story began, according to my recollection, and was fed to the CP wire and, presumably, went out to Canada in the overall coverage of Hallowe'en activities.

Two or three days later, the police authorities found this was a hoax. The children themselves had placed these razor blades in the apples. These children were the ones who reported having been given the apples.

Now in this instance, the community at large and specific sections of it had been described as sadistic.

The story which reported the fact of the hoax was printed somewhere around 12 or 14, about a two-inch story rather thoroughly buried. I do not imagine it was of sufficient interest to hit the CP wire.

Now, would this be considered fair and honest news gathering, where a community is maligned?

Mr. Farrell: No. I do not think it is fair. I am not familiar with the case. I think this is one of the reasons I support a local press council. God knows, we all make mistakes. I think the great thing about newspapers is that we make our mistakes in the open; most other people have the opportunity of putting them underneath the table.

Mr. Hull: We had the same experience in Windsor one Hallowe'en. We gave reasonable play to the story in our main local page. We did not line it as such. It was the first time we have had this experience. There was no indication that it was a hoax. There was nothing to contradict the story.

Personally, I am quite sure that I would have considered almost a bigger story the fact it was a hoax. Just to answer your question, I am sure that we would have given possibly bigger play because we appreciated the image of the City and we want to correct having done it in the first place.

The Chairman: Senator Everett.

Senator Everett: You have commented, Mr. Farrell, vigorously on what you feel is wrong with chain ownership, concentration, but you also have stated that the succession duties rules should be more liberal in order to permit the succession of a newspaper or anything else, I gather. With that I agree.

One of the answers to that would be to envisage independent newspapers that are publicly owned. Can you tell me if there is anything wrong with that, if that would interfere in any way with the so-called freedom of the press?

Mr. Farrell: I do not believe so. I have an old saying that there is only one thing worse than the private ownership of the press, and that is the public ownership of the press.

Senator Everett: Why is that?

Mr. Farrell: It is subject to political pressure. I think it is basic. I am, I think I should be, as independent as I can. Actually today, with the CBC and television and radio, there is a fair amount of government views in that sense of the word.

The Chairman: Senator Bourque, do you have a question?

Senator Bourque: No; no.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Hull, Senator Hays asked you about the effect of television on your advertising. I would like to ask you about whether the advent of television has affected written journalism at all.

Mr. Hull: Yes, to a degree. We realize that it is impossible to compete with radio and television when it comes to reporting spot news, as such.

Possibly, it is best explained that to my knowledge or my memory, I think the last extra, as such, we published would be the death of King George VI. That was quite awhile ago. This was when you called all your people back and put out a paper.

I can recall that when President Kennedy was assassinated, it happened at a perfect time for us. We were going to press anyway. We could put an extra on that.

We appreciate the fact that it is just tough competition when it comes to the presentation of spot news, but when it comes to the full story and the factual story, I do not think they can compete against us.

Mr. Fortier: We heard a view expressed that with the advent of television, written journalism had to become more exact. Could you comment on that?

Mr. Hull: Well, we have to be exact in our local news coverage because if we are not exact, neither are the radio stations for the simple reason—and they admit, all except one—that if we do not publish, they are not going to have a newscast. We catch them all the time.

For instance, we made an error regarding a local Board of Education deciding to build a $500,000 addition to the high school. For some reason or other, the reporter had the wrong high school. Four radio stations had the wrong high school for that day and for 24 hours later.

Accuracy, of course, always has been our main point. We strive for it.

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Hull: Fortunately, Senator Hays, we do not have many experiences having to run these corrections, very infrequently I am happy to say.

We have to supply more information possibly than we used to because we have to appreciate the fact that the general public already has the story. It is a spot news story.

Mr. Fortier: Which already has been seen.

Mr. Hull: Well, if you go to a sports event, you enjoy reading the story more after you have been there than if you had not been there.

Mr. Fortier: As a lawyer I was very interested to hear about this self-policing obligation which you have at the Windsor Star. Could you tell us what offences are included in this prohibition to publish names of the accused?

Mr. Hull: Well, as a lawyer, first of all you will be interested to know that in a period of three weeks, the 11 top editorial people had sessions with the three top members of the Department of Law at the University of Windsor. It almost was the start of the community press council because they wasted no words in telling us what they thought of some of our coverage.

As to criminal offences, I mentioned rape, indecent assault, cases of any kind involving exposure or infants, shoplifters.

Mr. Fortier: It goes beyond sexual offences?

Mr. Hull: Yes; indeed, yes. I had a session with the four provincial judges. In other words, they were the four judges who used to be in our magistrates court. We were covering them fairly fully and we wondered at the time whether it was proper or not.

The four of them agreed that the publication of names in almost anything served as a deterrent in a lot of cases. As they put it, we run drunk drivers and careless drivers. They said, "There are many men in Windsor who set out at night to go to a party who take cabs. They do not drive, not that they are afraid of a fine or of going to jail, but they are afraid of being in the Windsor Star." They said, "If you stop one man from driving his car and killing somebody, it is worthwhile."

They wanted us to publish everything.

If the publisher had not been so busy getting the brief together, we would have had the section doing a complete survey of police coverage.

Now, we do not print first offenders and shoplifters because, God knows what happens to people. We have some of our finest people lifting something worth 50 cents with $50 in their pocket. We do not publish those.

The Chairman: Senator Macdonald.

Senator Macdonald: Pardon me. Do you publish if someone goes in off the street and picks up a toothbrush?

Mr. Hull: Not if he has no record. If he is sent to jail, if he is a many offender, probably.

Mr. Fortier: There is a prohibition in the law regarding first offenders and young people.

Mr. Hull: These juveniles I am talking about, if they appear in Magistrates Court.

Mr. Fortier: If they have been referred.

Mr. Hull: Our policy was if someone showed sufficient interest in them to request that we not publish their names—the father, mother, or somebody phoned up and came and pleaded with us and showed enough interest—and they were first offenders, then we would leave them out.

I am sure that when we do a study on our police court coverage, there will be further eliminations on those.

Mr. Fortier: Would you suggest this be made a policy for all newspapers in Canada?

Mr. Hull: I would think so. When it comes to more serious crimes like rape and some of those, yes.

Mr. Fortier: As you know, in the so-called omnibus bill, which has become more famous for other facets thereof, a newspaper is not allowed now to publish accounts of preliminary inquiries. It is interesting to hear that you had preceded the spirit behind this amendment to the Criminal Code.

Mr. Hull: This comes in our definition of freedom of the press. I know other editors, publishers scream about restricting news of this kind. We do not. I did not get a bit excited about not being able to publish preliminary hearing news because I agreed that this is one way of affecting the man's trial.

Either way we do have the right to publish it after he has been convicted or found innocent, if we want. We feel we have sufficient.

Mr. Farrell: Also we do not publish what we consider to be invasion of privacy unless the individual is in the public eye. In cases in which John Smith gets a divorce from Mary Smith, we consider that to be their own private business.

Mr. Fortier: Is there a service through the newspaper by which you would accept a paid legal notice of that?

Mr. Farrell: Oh, certainly. I think advertising columns have to be free. In fact we have classified space for divorces. If anybody wants to announce their divorce, they can.

Mr. Fortier: Like a birth or death; would that be in the same section?

The Chairman: I think, Senators, that our next witnesses soon will be here. I do not want to terminate without giving the Senators one final opportunity to ask any additional questions they may have.

Senator Hays.

Senator Hays: May I just follow this up. I think that this is most interesting this afternoon to learn that you do have this code of ethics within your own organization. I think it would be well if we had it across Canada.

How would you go about saying "This should not be printed", regardless of what kind of paper it is—whether weekly or so on?

Mr. Farrell: I cannot think we can say we are right in those borderline areas. I think if other newspapers like the way we do it, they can copy us. If they do not, I am not saying we are right or they are wrong. It is just something we ourselves happen to believe.

Senator Hays: If you feel this way, is this the persecution of an individual if it is in another newspaper?

Mr. Farrell: In some cases I think it is; yes.

Senator Hays: Is this freedom to persecute?

Mr. Farrell: Yes. The press has the freedom to persecute. It is only public opinion that will keep us on the straight and narrow.

Senator Hays: Thank you.

The Chairman: Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: One short question. You made the statement newspapers are here to stay. In what form then, based on that?

I would like to go ahead. Do you conduct a measurement of any nature of your readers to determine whether your newspaper still is reaching the youth or the on-coming generation? In what proportion have you been reaching them compared to the past; is it diminishing or increasing?

Mr. Farrell: We only have just started this. We had a survey done in 1963, we are doing the same questions on the same basis for 1969. We intend to keep this up indefinitely. We intend to have an accurate sample of our audience, as accurate as we can. We are taking a sample of 7,500 in Windsor. The statisticians say this is a good sample of a community of our size if it is a strict random sample.

It is highly organized and we intend to keep it up, so long as I am there anyway.

Senator McElman: Are you reaching the younger generation?

Mr. Farrell: Not as well as we should; no. I hardly can talk of this as we only have the first wave and I only can make generalizations. We notice that the interest seems to go from a sort of high from about 20 to 25 years old, oddly enough.

It seems to go down in the age group 25 to 35; and then from 35 on, it seems to pick up again. Now, I emphasize "it seems". We will be happy to give you our report when we have the sample.

The Chairman: When will that be?

Mr. Farrell: We should be done by Spring. We are on the second wave now.

The Chairman: Well, we will be most interested; thank you.

Senator McElman: Would it be fair to suggest in the light of your measurement, if it is indicated that you are not reaching the new generation and you must look to the future and say, save your paper's circulation, that although the newspaper is here to stay, it could take a quite different form or format perhaps?

Mr. Farrell: Yes. It is changing slowly. We changed our front page the other day. Literally all hell broke loose. I never had such insulting language in my entire life because we changed the format of the paper. It was incredible. I would have not have believed it if it had not happened to me.

Mr. Hull: I just want to add that it was most encouraging that all of the comments were "What are you doing to our paper".

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Farrell, you have publicly objected in recent weeks to the sale of CKLW to Maclean-Hunter and the Toronto Telegram. I think it would be interesting and certainly of much benefit to the committee if we could hear your reasons for objecting to that sale in order that we might have it on the record.

Mr. Farrell: I can pull out the summary of the brief. I have it here if you will wait a second. I will just see if I can find it here.

Yes; here we are.

Mr. Fortier: I am sure you recall the punch words.

Mr. Farrell: I have switched off. Now, in this context, it must be realized that this station has a potential audience of 6,500,000 Americans, a third of the population of Canada, as we said in presenting our brief.

I said quite seriously it should be the Department of External Affairs that should be fighting this case and not us. Now, these are the contentions contained in our brief to the C.R.T.C.: (a) "It is in the national interest, both internally and externally, that this station be acquired by the CBC"; (b), that there be a prompt re-examination of the contention that the CBC cannot operate CKLW without suffering a large operating loss; (c), the Government of Canada in the national interest should insist that the CBC purchase Station CKLW and provide the necessary funds.

Failing this, it should be a prerequisite for the granting of this licence that the Toronto Telegram and Maclean-Hunter interests negotiate the precise terms upon which the CBC can take over the station at a later date.

An offer to do this has already been publicly made by one of the applicants.

Now, we stated in the hearing that if they granted a licence to the Maclean-Hunter Toronto Telegram interests, we would do everything in our power to help them providing they maintain a Canadian identity. If they did not do so, we would be as—things would be as awkward as possible. That is the proposition.

Mr. Fortier: Would you have made the same objection of principle if you had been operating, let us say, in Sudbury?

Mr. Farrell: No. Windsor is a very unique community.

Mr. Fortier: It is because of the uniqueness of the community that you made this opposition?

Mr. Farrell: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: I wonder if Mr. Farrell would care to file a copy of the opposition which was presented before the CRTC with the committee. I think it would be very useful to the operation of the committee.

The Chairman: Senator Beaubien.

Senator Beaubien: Mr. Farrell, did you say that CKLW could not be operated except at a very heavy loss?

Mr. Farrell: So the CBC claims.

Senator Beaubien: Well, the CBC certainly knows something about operating at a heavy loss. Why would you think that the CBC would not be right, especially if they bought it?

Mr. Farrell: Well, if a private operator is willing to pay $5 million for a station, as we say in our brief, it is an affront to conscience to say that it cannot be operated.

Senator Beaubien: At a profit?

Mr. Farrell: Well, somewhere near the break-even point, at least.

Senator Beaubien: If you look at the statement of the CBC, you will see they can operate a lot of stations at a great big loss.

The Chairman: Senator Hays.

Senator Hays: Mr. Farrell, I am sure the committee would be very interested in your code of ethics, if you have a written code of ethics.

Mr. Farrell: No; we have not. The ASNE has a very good code of ethics. We would be happy to edit that because there are a couple of spots in there that we do not entirely agree with, but it is a very good statement.

The Chairman: Would you edit it to your satisfaction and send it in to us?

Mr. Farrell: Certainly.

The Chairman: Well, Honourable Senators, on behalf of the committee, I want to thank Mr. Farrell and Mr. Hull. I think it has been a most worthwhile presentation and we are thoroughly grateful to you for being here.

We will adjourn for exactly ten minutes. We will meet in exactly ten minutes to receive the brief from the St. John's Evening Telegram.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, if I might call the hearing back into session, please.

The second brief from a daily newspaper is the one we are going to talk about now. It is from the St. John's Evening Telegram. Sitting on my immediate right is the President of the Company, Mr. Hubert C. Herder. On my immediate left is the Vice President and General Manager, Mr. Stephen P. Herder. On the extreme left is Michael Harrington, who has been the editor of the Telegram since 1959.

Gentlemen, we received your brief as we requested three weeks in advance. We are grateful; thank you. It has been circulated to the members of the committee. They have studied its contents so I think we can take the brief as read.

If you wish now to make any sort of preliminary statement, you may. You may summarize the brief, expand on it, explain it or, indeed, talk about anything else you may wish for as much as 15 minutes, following which we will have the question period.

If you want to proceed with questions right away, we will do that.

Mr. Hubert C. Herder: President, St. John's Evening Telegram, Newfoundland.

Mr. Herder: First of all, gentlemen, I would like to say if the brief is a little ragged, it is because it was done in rather a hurry. On top of receiving your invitation to submit one, we were in the midst of a leadership campaign at home. Believe me, it is a lonely feeling because nobody would talk to me until it was all over.

I was hooked because the letter had been addressed to me. We enjoyed doing it; it is the first time we ever have done it—and possibly the first time we ever have put on paper what we think we think of ourselves.

There are a few little errors in it. One I think I should draw attention to is that we were not trying to be colourful when we said "We h-u-e to a certain line." I am sorry a few of them got through.

However, I cannot say we are entirely happy to be here only because I personally am rather nervous. I thought I had passed that age, but it is not so.

We will be only too happy to answer any questions that we possibly can. Thank you.

The Chairman: Well, there certainly is no reason for you to be nervous and there is a reason for us to apologize. Someone had to be here early on, and I quite agree the people who will be coming in February, March, and later will be much more prepared as they will have more time to work on their briefs. I do not think you should apologize at all. We appreciate your being able to cooperate and do it quickly.

I think, Mr. Herder, our first questions are from Senator John Macdonald.

Senator Macdonald: First of all I, too, must express my disagreement right away with your remarks in that I do not think your brief is ragged at all. I think it is very complete. We were glad that you were able to give us such a fine brief on such short notice. Now that I have those preliminary remarks out of the way, we can get together.

I take it from your brief that you are publishing a provincial paper in Newfoundland, that your coverage is such that I think you mentioned 1,200 communities that you get into a part from the City of St. John's, so you do, I would think, speak for the Province of Newfoundland pretty well.

Now, I notice you mentioned something about the freedom of the press. Would you care to enlarge upon what you consider to be the freedom of the press, especially in Newfoundland?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Yes. Of course it is an expression that I do not think we use a great deal around the office. I suppose it is there and it is what we mean.

I would say we feel we are able to print what we want to within the bounds of good taste as we see them, and within the laws of the land. That is my own opinion. I do not know whether you care to try another editor, whether he will be more vocal than I.

The Chairman: Do you want to say anything on that, Mr. Harrington?

Mr. Michael Harrington: Editor, St. John's Evening Telegram.

Mr. Harrington: Well, I am substantially in agreement with that. As Mr. Herder says, we do not sit down every day when we go to the office to talk about the freedom of the press and just what we want to do about it today.

I think so far as we are concerned that we do the best we can to put out a reasonably good newspaper, as factual as possible, as truthful as possible, to cover events as they occur without trying to colour them or without undue bias. I think, on the whole, we do a reasonably good job in that area. More than that I cannot say.

Senator Macdonald: Are you satisfied there are no pressures from any source? I mean pressure from advertisers or pressure groups of any kind on you for what you should be publishing or not publishing?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Oh, yes; of course there have been and will be again, no doubt. There is surprisingly little from advertisers. We are a small community, reasonably small. We know most of them. I think they realize that it would be a waste of time.

Senator Macdonald: You mentioned something about publishing that which is in good taste. If I recall, there was some talk of a law in Newfoundland. I do not know if it ever went through. It was about publishing proceedings in divorce cases, for example. Did that ever go through?

Mr. Harrington: Not in connection with divorce cases. The legislation never was brought in. It was hinted at, but it died in the summer somewhere along the line.

The Chairman: Some of the people at the back are straining to hear you. They want to know what you are saying.

Senator Macdonald: I am sure they do.

The Chairman: Well, they indicate they do.

Senator Macdonald: Now, again you mention something about monopoly. Now there is another daily paper, as I understand it, and a weekly being published there.

Mr. Harrington: Morning papers.

Senator Macdonald: You are an afternoon paper?

Mr. Harrington: That is right.

Senator Macdonald: Would you consider yourselves as a monopoly with your great circulation?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Not a monopoly, but we are happy that the situation is as it is.

Senator Macdonald: You do not own any interests in radio or TV stations.

Mr. H. C. Herder: No.

Senator Macdonald: You mentioned the weekly owned an interest in some other station. What weekly is that, by the way?

Mr. Harrington: It is the Newfoundland Herald and part of the structure of Newfoundland Station CJON.

There was a time when you might have considered that the Telegram was a monopoly, long before the days of television and radio. We have two television stations in St. John's now and several radio stations. There is no monopoly insofar as the control on news or opinion or any of that.

Senator Macdonald: You people use the Canadian Press news service?

Mr. Harrington: Yes, with others.

Senator Macdonald: As I recall, when they were speaking to us they mentioned the fact that you give them news and get news back from them and this kind of stuff.

I was wondering about the accuracy; for example, you put news on the CP Wire from Newfoundland—say from Gander where somebody phoned it in or you have a local office. Now, do you check as to the accuracy of that news item before you send it on?

Mr. Stephen P. Herder: Vice President and General Manager, St. John's Evening Telegram.

Mr. S. Herder: Perhaps I can answer that.

The Canadian Press has a fully-staffed bureau in Newfoundland which works out of our news room and that man is responsible to his Atlantic Bureau—I guest that is the proper name—in Halifax. He reports directly, of course. Everything that we write is available to him, most of the time before we publish it.

Senator Bourque: He just picks out what he wants, that sort of thing?

Mr. S. Herder: Yes, unfortunately. Sometimes there are things on what is our area regional wire, as I mentioned, before we publish the same material ourselves. But this is part of the cooperative system and we have no quarrel with it.

Senator Macdonald: I was interested in one part of your brief, when they were asking about starting a newspaper or what is called the large newspapers absorbing the smaller ones.

You mention that you brought the concentration justified because it is the only way to keep the smaller papers from going under and thereby, maintains a second or even third voice in the community.

Do you care to elaborate on that?

Mr. S. Herder: I think, as a newspaper man, I would hate to see a newspaper "go under".

Senator Macdonald: I am quoting from your brief.

Mr. S. Herder: Yes. Did we say that; it got a little out of whack when we were putting it together.

The Chairman: Do you want to point out where it is?

Senator Macdonald: Yes.

Mr. H. C. Herder: I might point out that this brief was made up and composed of the thoughts of a number of people in our office and rather than edit and try and make one paragraph out of five submissions, we decided to lump and put them in there. As I say, the mere fact they are there means we must go along with them, but they are not necessarily our own views as individuals.

Senator Macdonald: Under the thing of ownership in Paragraph 5 ..

Mr. S. Herder: The reference only is intended to mean—and perhaps I am interpreting somebody else's comments because as Hubert says, three or four or five of us had a hand in it and there is some overlapping admittedly. We merely mean it is better for a newspaper to exist as part of a conglomerate, as it were, than not to exist at all.

That is all that we mean by it really. It is better to have three voices in a community than, perhaps, one.

Senator Macdonald: If they are all owned by the same person, would it make any difference?

Mr. S. Herder: It would depend entirely on what control was exercised by ownership on the content of the newspaper.

Senator Macdonald: In that same item about ownership, you mention the fact that you feel the advertising should be available to anyone. I was wondering if you have any views on advertising, for example, tobacco? Do you accept that?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Yes; we do. We have talked about it.

Senator Macdonald: Apart from pipe tobacco.

Mr. H. C. Herder: We have talked about it, but we feel that like liquor—I think you also could go to motor cars being bad for us, if you want to stretch a long bow. They are pretty dangerous on the highway.

We feel, if they are allowed to be sold, why not allow them to advertise? It is unfortunate, but we do not get a great deal of it.

Senator Macdonald: Do you have any standard by which you judge advertising, like misleading advertising? Do you look at it before you publish it?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Yes; not always with great success—according to the Better Business Bureau, but we try to delete anything that is misleading or not correct.

Senator Macdonald: I notice you mention something about the increase in postal rates affecting you. Formerly, a lot of your circulation was by mail. Would you care to elaborate on that?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Well, it still is. As you know, the percentage increase was a bit of a crack, but we will live with it. The postal service is not very good, and pretty slow. It is rather like fruit: If you leave it around too long, it rather spoils or becomes out-dated.

For instance, from St. John's to Cornerbrook: We publish on Fridays. It is in the Post Office the Friday afternoon. Cornerbrook is by rail 400 miles at the most. The paper is delivered to the people Monday afternoon, if we are lucky.

Senator Macdonald: Just as a matter of interest, since the train has stopped, how do they carry the mail?

Mr. H. C. Herder: The freight train still runs. We use a truck in some cases.

Senator Bourque: The freight train still runs?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Yes.

Senator Macdonald: I see you mention the figure of $65,000 more.

Mr. H. C. Herder: This is what we figured the mail we put into the Post Office in the time of the new rates; this is what it would cost us.

But let me finish. We put another nickel on our papers which just about evens out. So far we are getting away with it, if that is the word to use.

The Chairman: When did you do that?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Approximately two months ago.

The Chairman: You held your circulation?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Pretty well. We lost a bit. There are a lot of Newfoundlanders who wander from home and a fair amount of those in the United States and Canada, some of those have dropped because the rate has been going up. At the moment, we are running behind about 2,000 copies.

The Chairman: Which made it worthwhile.

Senator Macdonald: You put the whole increase on the subscribers; did you increase your advertising rates?

Mr. H. C. Herder: No. We were selling for 15 on the Friday edition and we put it to 20.

Senator Macdonald: Just on weekends?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Just the weekend; Monday through Thursday remains at ten cents.

Senator Macdonald: Mr. Herder, I am trying to see what item it would be again, to revert to your section on freedom of the press. It is Clause 10. It would seem to me if you look at that last paragraph, Section 10...

The Chairman: The last paragraph on the whole section?

Senator Macdonald: Trying to get my page; after you come to the ownership section, the pages are not numbered. It starts with "It is often claimed that the freedom of the press is no more than the freedom of the individual and that 'the right of the journalist to comment is no higher than the right of the man in the street'."

You go on from there. You seem to disagree with the point of view and to say the right of the journalist is higher than the right of the man on the street. It is "justified in claiming a wider latitude and more freedom than a less informed average citizen."

Do you find that part? Would you care to comment on that?

Mr. Harrington: Yes. I would think that a working journalist, whether he is a reporter or editor, is on top of things—at least he is supposed to be; he has to be.

He has to keep up with the events that are going on, in touch with people. He does have, I think, a little more knowledge and understanding of what goes on about him than the average person. To say that the right of the journalist to comment is a bit higher than the regular man on the street, well, I think that is the case truly.

Senator Macdonald: Would you make a distinction between journalists? Some reporters are better educated or have a wider background of knowledge. Do you give him more freedom than you would a reporter who is less informed? I do not want to embarrass you.

Mr. S. Herder: Yes; if the qualification were known to us.

Senator Macdonald: It is a new concept to me, of freedom of the press. I understood, if I may digress for a moment, that freedom of the press was the same for all average citizens, the freedom of speech. You are saying that the freedom of the press is higher than the freedom of the average individual. The reporter has a wider freedom because he is better informed than somebody else.

I am interested in how you justify that.

The Chairman: Mr. Herder.

Mr. S. Herder: That is a tough one to comment on really. The point that I was about to make is I think when a person has qualifications in a field, not necessarily making him an expert, but if he is well qualified in an area, he surely would be entitled to some latitude in his remarks.

He certainly would be in our newspaper, if we were convinced of his qualification. For example, I would certainly rather get somebody to write about any subject you would care to name who had qualifications to write on that subject than some one who did not. It is as simple as that.

Senator Macdonald: That is not the point.

Mr. S. Herder: I am not trying to evade the...

Senator Macdonald: Say the average citizen wants to make a statement on something you say. You say, "Our reporter is better informed so..."

Mr. S. Herder: Not at all. Any citizen has the right, as they do on all newspapers, I believe, to comment with complete latitude on any subject that appeals to them, within the normal bounds of libel.

Senator Macdonald: What about the ordinary citizen who writes a letter to your paper that is wholly disagreeing with something that your reporter had said?

Mr. S. Herder: We are inclined to give that more prominence than any other letters we may have for that day. I think most newspapers are over-sensitive on that.

Mr. Harrington: We give wide freedom to letters to the editor and the letters that dispute our own views are given that much more prominence.

Mr. H. C. Herder: We like it because when the paper is being read—and we do not think we are by any means the last port of call nor are we always right, unfortunately.

Senator Macdonald: It might be I am misunderstanding you, but as a matter of principle, I do not see how you justify and claim a wider latitude and more freedom for a reporter than for the less-informed person.

I agree with you that these open-line radio programs are faced with the problem of an anonymous person going in and, unless they cut him off pretty quickly, he can say some strange things.

Mr. S. Herder: It is difficult to get the right sort of comment. It is something I would rather think about.

The Chairman: We do not want to chew the thing to death. Should we press on to other things?

Senator Macdonald: I would let it go at that.

Mr. H. C. Herder: I do not think—that sounds like an awfully familiar phrase. I am sorry.

Mr. Fortier: It does not happen too often in the newspapers.

The Chairman: That usually is you who says things like that, Senator Macdonald.

Senator Macdonald: Is your paper a union paper? Is there a craft union or other types of unions?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Yes; one craft union, IPP, International Print and Pressmen.

Senator Macdonald: The American Guild is not in there?

Mr. H. C. Herder: No.

Senator Macdonald: Have they tried, to your knowledge?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Not to my knowledge.

Senator Macdonald: There is something one of the other people here today said. I was interested in the publishing of police court news. They use great discretion in publishing the names of any person apart from the legal obligation—they try not to publish that person's name, I assume unless it was a very serious case. Have you any guidelines in regard to that?

Mr. S. Herder: We were here before the Windsor Star's bulletin was offered this afternoon. We like very much what Mr. Hull and Mr. Farrell had to say on that. We do, indeed, do much the same thing ourselves.

In our case, this is a policy which is under rather constant revision. We do not publish first offenders, drunks and that sort of thing. On the shoplifting, we eventually came to a limit as to what was stolen. Now we are not using that.

In other words, if Mrs. Smith stole $50, her name did not get in the papers. Mrs. Jones, her neighbour stole $250, she did get in the paper.

Well, we went to our lawyer to try and find out what we were doing. We eventually stopped publishing shoplifting at all. We rather liked the description of ethics that is given by the Windsor Star, the one given earlier.

Senator Macdonald: Just one other matter. As I take it now, the Managing Editor is the one who actually gets these records in the paper; am I correct in that?

Mr. S. Herder: Yes; that is correct, and four news editors.

Senator Macdonald: Then it goes down the line that way?

Mr. S. Herder: That is right.

Senator Macdonald: Apart from what goes into the papers, who is responsible for the headlines and the little headlines, perhaps over a column?

Mr. S. Herder: Well, a variety of people on the news desk—we all call them different things, copy editors, some call them caption writers. We just refer to them as deskmen actually.

Senator Macdonald: What I am trying to get at is this: Now sometimes the headline tells practically an entirely different story from if you read the whole story or they pull just something, a few words which are dramatic. Then you read the story and perhaps you feel that you are let down. The story did not live up to your expectation.

I was wondering if there is anyone, any one person on the paper who is responsible, if it came down to it, for that headline—not to make it but to say what goes on that story.

Mr. S. Herder: Not on our newspaper, no.

Mr. Harrington: If that occurs, it is an error of judgment and it certainly does occur occasionally. You know, they seize anything to try and get something into your headlines to attract your reader to the story, to try to give an idea what it is all about. In many cases, the person who is doing that and putting the head on may be in a hurry, or it may be they do not read diligently enough and they just come up with something that strikes their eye. That goes on unfortunately. It misrepresents the story, presents the wrong picture, and could be faulty on that account.

Senator Macdonald: I was wondering if before the papers are published, do they come back to the Managing Editor or somebody who okays the whole thing before it goes to press?

Mr. Harrington: Yes, the heads are. If they are not related to the story, unfortunately, they often are read on a proof separately.

Senator Macdonald: I understood he would not read all the stories.

Mr. H. C. Herder: We have our share of faults, where the headline definitely is misleading—not by design.

Senator Macdonald: I am very grateful to these men, but perhaps somebody else would like to say something.

Mr. H. C. Herder: You are a Cape Bretoner; you are on our side.

Senator Macdonald: That is true.

The Chairman: Is that automatic, Senator?

Senator Macdonald: Yes.

The Chairman: Senator Hays.

Senator Hays: Mr. Herder, I understood that in Newfoundland only 33½ percent of the householders receive a daily newspaper. Is this increasing or decreasing? Was it caused by television or other communications?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Actually, Senator, our circulation has gone up in the 10-year period, particularly, so we are very hopeful, TV notwithstanding.

As you notice, our Monday through Thursday, our daily is about 25,000 and our weekend or Friday paper runs up to 50,000. The reason for this in many cases is again the length of time in getting the paper to the people. In other words, there are a lot of people that only get the weekend paper and not the daily.

Senator Hays: Are there a lot of people in the City of St. John's who are not receiving a daily newspaper, or would this be in rural areas mostly?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Mostly the rural areas. As far as St. John's itself, the city zone is 14,000 again Monday to Thursday, and in the evening, 18,000. Some of this, of course, is caused again by people coming in from nearby and picking up a paper in St. John's rather than outside the community.

I think we are—I am guessing and I should know—about 80 percent on our weekend or a little higher of St. John's coverage.

Senator Hays: Did you say eight percent that do not receive a daily paper?

Mr. H. C. Herder: No; I would say probably 20 percent, maybe higher.

Senator Hays: In St. John's that do not receive a daily paper?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Right, or apparently do not.

Senator Hays: That do not?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Right.

Senator Hays: What sort of people would these be?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Well, I am biased, of course. I think they are missing a great deal. I suppose a few people do not want it, cannot afford it—which may be one of the reasons.

Senator Hays: Would these people—this 20 percent group of householders—have television?

Mr. H. C. Herder: I would think so; more than likely.

Senator Macdonald: Are you taking into account that more than one person might be reading the paper?

Mr. H. C. Herder: No. This is what we would like to think. We do know of cases where the papers are passed on, but that is rather a weak one to go on because I have no figures. We do know that it does happen.

Senator Macdonald: I know it is a practice for people in a barbershop. There might be a dozen people who read the one paper if they go into that shop.

Mr. H. C. Herder: Yes.

The Chairman: That is Cape Breton.

Senator Macdonald: That is right.

Senator Hays: Do you believe there should be a national code of ethics for newspapers?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Well, I certainly have no objection to it. We have one proviso again, that they would not make us do something that we did not want to do.

Senator Hays: Would you enlarge on that a bit?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Well, I do not think we would want to print anything that we did not agree with. I cannot think of anything at the moment, quite frankly. We like to be frank, free and fearless, and we think we are. Whether we are or not, I do not know.

In other words, we like to kind of run our own newspaper to the best of our ability without outside interference within reason.

Senator Hays: I am thinking of a national code of ethics, not only for the news but for advertising, the acceptance of advertising and that sort of thing. It would say, "Well, this is just something that a newspaper just will not do."

Mr. H. C. Herder: Depending on where it came from, but I think we would be happy to cooperate. I do not think there would be an objection.

Senator Hays: You would not be opposed to a national code of ethics?

Mr. H. C. Herder: No.

Senator Hays: Who would establish the code of ethics? Should it be done within the framework of the newspaper people themselves, or locally?

Mr. H. C. Herder: I think it should be done by the newspaper themselves, maybe because we would be happier then. However, when it was done, maybe it would not be suitable to everybody else.

Senator Hays: Now, another question. It is not related. Do you feel that the news is important enough to be subsidized by Canadians insofar as the postage is concerned? Has that been done in the past?

Mr. H. C. Herder: I am not sure. I think I am missing something.

The Chairman: Explain your question, Senator, please.

Senator Hays: Well, part of the great deficit in the Post Office has been second and third class mails. You already referred to what your extra costs were, and you put an additional charge on the newspaper to take care of it—I think up to $65,000. Do you feel this was a mistake?

Mr. H. C. Herder: No. If the Post Office was not charging enough before, it was our good luck and their bad judgment. It does make us a little unhappy that they suddenly increased it by a rather heavy amount and certainly, the service is not any better.

Senator Hays: I do not know whether this is a privileged question.

The Chairman: You can ask the question and we can decide.

Senator Hays: What do you have to pay a reporter in your papers in St. John's?

The Chairman: I do not think that is a privileged question.

Mr. S. Herder: No. We do not mind answering. We are starting juniors, and I mean messengers or copy boys—newspaper people here will know what I mean by those—at $60 a week, depending on educational qualifications. I believe our starting for journalistic school graduates is $110 a week. They would not stay at that very long if they were good.

Senator Hays: What was that?

Mr. S. Herder: $110 a week; that is journalism school graduates.

I noticed a reference in a newspaper account this morning to journalism school graduates starting at $75. I do not think that is realistic, as I understand it from a lot of newspaper firms in the country. I just do not think it is very accurate. I think it is way low. It was a report.

The Chairman: Perhaps in the American Guild presentation.

Mr. S. Herder: That is the item that I am referring to, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Starting salary in Oshawa was at $75 as I recall. Senator Hays.

Senator Hays: Will the White Paper on the proposed taxation affect your company?

Mr. H. C. Herder: I would think so. Any taxation or any new taxation and, of course, we are very much a family business. So long as we can fool the bank, we are quite happy.

I think we would be rather unhappy. We mentioned in the brief, the best way we could explain it was if two of us went to an untimely death, succession duties might be a little embarrassing, to say the least.

Senator Hays: As a newspaper, would you oppose the White Paper?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Well, if anything would save us money, yes.

I might say, too—I hope you will forgive me—the Telegram to us is rather like a member of the family. It is a pretty personal thing. We are into the third generation; we have another one there. While we as a family often take a crack at each other, we do not like it if anybody take a poke at the paper, even if they are right. We hate to see it go.

The Chairman: Senator Petten.

Senator Petten: I would like to ask you, Steve, not mainly for my information, but everything. Do you have difficulty maintaining staff? Do you have any difficulty in holding competent staff?

Mr. S. Herder: We have had because we have had a rather local policy which gave us some difficulties. We just did not find young people coming out of school who were saying, "By George, I want to work for the newspaper." They do not want to go through the hard grind that goes with it. We have gone to schools of journalism, notably Carleton.

We have, I believe, five Carleton graduates on our staff now—or six. I am sure of five. These are very good, bright young people and we are delighted to have them.

Senator Petten: Do you have any training scheme of your own at the paper?

Mr. S. Herder: Yes, we do. It is not nearly enough. We are very busy trying to bring it forward and make it something worthwhile.

Mr. Harrington: We mentioned that we tried to institute a sort of seminar, much like our predecessors in these hearings. Unfortunately, we bogged down. That does not mean we are not going to keep trying.

We have our staff discuss legal matters, legal principles, etcetera, libel laws and what not. It is a forum that we hope to develop over the years. May I say we have made the first attempts and have been fairly successful.

I think we point out in the brief that about a year or two ago, Memorial University Extension Service started not exactly a school in journalism, but a serious series of lectures in journalism in which some of our people, including myself, lectured on various aspects of our paper and newspaper business generally.

They have not continued it, unfortunately. Maybe they will bring it up again. I do not now know.

The Chairman: Senator Beaubien.

Senator Beaubien: I want to ask Hubert a question. You said a newspaper—if I can go back to something you said some time ago—mailed Friday afternoon arrived at Cornerbrook Monday afternoon.

Mr. H. C. Herder: Right.

Senator Beaubien: Is that something new or is it historic? Did that always take that long?

Mr. H. C. Herder: I think we used to make it on Saturday before Saturday became a holiday to the postal officials.

Senator Beaubien: It used to arrive Saturday; is that correct?

Mr. H. C. Herder: I expect it still does, but it does not get out of the post office.

Senator Beaubien: You said circulation, 20 percent of the families didn't get the paper in St. John's. Would that account for people that would buy it on the street corner or do you take the number of papers sold in the city compared to the number of heads?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Right; number of homes.

Senator Beaubien: About 80 percent then of the population would get a paper?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Of St. John's; yes. I would like to check that figure, too.

Senator Hays: That is 80 percent of the householders, not the people.

Mr. H. C. Herder: Of the householders.

Senator Beaubien: Yes; that would make quite a big difference then; yes.

The Chairman: Mr. Herder, do you think that there are problems publishing in Newfoundland which way not pertain to the rest of the country?

Mr. H. C. Herder: I think some. For example, we get up an hour and a half ahead of the rest of Canada which makes the wire a bit fast, as against Montreal, for example.

Being a long way away, it is sometimes difficult to get parts. If I can illustrate, we had a chap from New York come down one year. He was an engineer. He looked at us and he said, "I want to see your mat man, and a metal man, engineering man, tomorrow morning at nine o'clock."

We said, "Well, we think you should have stayed in New York because they are there."

The Chairman: In the section of your brief dealing with freedom of the press, you make reference to the fact that in the 1950's, "We had to fight a hard battle with the Newfoundland government over the right of the press to have an independent voice, not directed and dictated by those holding political power."

You also say in that section earlier, referring to freedom of the press, that "a powerful government can easily suppress it."

Was freedom of the press suppressed in Newfoundland in the 1950's? Would you tell us what you mean?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Yes. It should have come out. We expressed our disapproval with what mainly was the economic development of Newfoundland. We disagreed with the way it was done. There was a lot of political disapproval put on us.

The Chairman: How did it manifest itself?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Libels; we had I think, at one point, three.

The Chairman: Issued by the government?

Mr. S. Herder: Two by Cabinet and one by an individual. I think we got up to the uncomfortable record of about a million and a half dollars in three separate suits. It was not altogether a happy time.

The Chairman: Those days are gone, are they?

Mr. H. C. Herder: They have subsided.

The Chairman: You have a flat sentence in this section of your brief. I quote: "Freedom of the press is not threatened in Canada." Presumably, that also means that freedom of the press is not threatened in Newfoundland. This is all a matter of academics; this is history and the situation does not pertain now. Is that right?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Again I think that might have come out of the four or five people who worked on the brief. I do not think we felt that strongly about it; certainly not now.

The Chairman: I hasten to say I am not trying to embarrass you.

Mr. H. C. Herder: No; no.

The Chairman: You also say in this section on freedom of the press, "The people in the news media are among the most self-critical in any sphere of business and professions." Would you agree with the statement that that self-criticism is mostly internal?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Yes, although at any meetings that we attend, the press itself seemed to gripe more on what has not been done and should be done, rather than patting themselves on the back.

The Chairman: I have no quarrel. I think, perhaps, that is right. I was just going to say, are not those analytical and self-critical meetings usually closed meetings? In other words, I am prepared to accept your statement that the news media are among the most self-critical. I am prepared to accept that statement.

I must be frank to say it is an opinion I did not have until we began the work of this committee. I think the fact I did not, reflects a public attitude.

Mr. Harrington: What we mean there, I think, is any time a publisher or an editor or—well, that will do, is asked to speak at a function on work that he is doing, he tends to be rather critical of the way in which the job is being done. I know this has happened to me when I have been asked to speak at a function on work that I am doing. I am generally rather critical of the way we do our job and I point out what our faults are, the pitfalls and how easy it is to get into them, and what we try to do to correct them.

I repeat, it is not only just in my case. Only last week, I believe, I saw in one of the papers that out west, one of the publishers that would be appearing here some time was speaking to, I forget which group it was—Rotary.

He was tearing into the press again on the same basis. I was not thinking of this purely in terms of the CDNPA meetings when they get behind doors and discuss.

I think whenever a publisher or editor gets an opportunity to talk about the business, they are very critical about the whole operation, I think much more so than in a lot of other professions.

The Chairman: I am prepared to accept it. I am interested in the way you had it worded. Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Herder, what is the relationship between the Cornerbrook Western Star and the St. John's Evening Telegram, if any?

Mr. H. C. Herder: None.

Mr. Fortier: Do members of your family own shares in the Cornerbrook Western Star?

Mr. H. C. Herder: I am Vice President of the Western Star by virtue of the fact that somebody is very fond of me and a large shareholder—namely my wife.

Mr. Fortier: Is your wife the majority shareholder?

Mr. H. C. Herder: No.

Mr. Fortier: Who is the majority shareholder in the Cornerbrook Western Star?

Mr. H. C. Herder: They are two women; one is an aunt and one is my wife. They own 49 percent.

Mr. Fortier: So the Herder family in Newfoundland also owns and controls the Cornerbrook Western Star?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Part of the Herder family. For example, we have Steve who has no shares in the Western Star. He is a director. He is a director, but not a shareholder.

Mr. Fortier: I notice somewhere in your brief that you refer to the exchange of news between the two newspapers. Is there any other overt exchange of cooperation between the two papers?

Mr. H. C. Herder: In every way possible.

Mr. Fortier: In order to what, minimize costs?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Right.

Mr. Fortier: Any other reason?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Well, for news, obviously, advice. Whichever has the best, we exchange and we run very side-by-side in that sense of cooperating.

Mr. Fortier: Would it be a fair statement to say there is no competition as to circulation between the two newspapers?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Yes. We would not spare their hide if we could get at them, but Cornerbrook is too far and that is not regular. As a matter of fact, we run to Grand Falls and Gander every day two trucks which come to meet each other for the simple reason that unless you get it there every day, your sales have no hope.

Mr. Fortier: Do you have figures on how many Evening Telegrams are circulated in Cornerbrook on any given day?

Mr. H. C. Herder: I could not say at the moment. Possibly not more than a dozen; possibly they just do not sell and that costs us money.

Mr. Fortier: I was interested to hear you refer to these lawsuits which were instituted in the 1950s. What happened to those lawsuits? How were they disposed of? Were they eventually settled or judgment?

Mr. H. C. Herder: We did not lose.

Mr. Fortier: May I ask for a reply to the question, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. H. C. Herder: They were settled out of court.

Mr. Fortier: It is with interest that I noted the Chairman stopped after that first sentence. You said "We won the fight and we have jealously guarded the right which the government still snipes at from time to time."

Could you give us instances of sniping by the Newfoundland Government in recent months or years?

Mr. H. C. Herder: How long do we have?

The Chairman: Well, I will give you five minutes. I think that is a valid question. Do you want to answer it?

Mr. S. Herder: I will take a stab at it, Senator, subject to comment from my colleagues.

When covering the House of Assembly, I have been called a knave and a jackass and that is fairly mild. Other members of our staff have received the same sort of name for either commentary or reporting in our paper. Such commentaries come from the Government side.

They could have come from anyone. I do not really remember who embarrassed the tears out of me in one uncomfortable situation. We suffer as a newspaper from time to time. That is what I mean by sniping, attempts to suppress information; that is the thing we feel strongest about, to suppress information to which the public is entitled.

Such agreements between the Government, including tax relief and that sort of thing to incoming industry, this sort of thing will draw retorts not so much on our own paper because sometimes our rapport with various members of the Government of Newfoundland is not altogether happy and we are inclined to hear on the radio stations, what is being said about us on any given day.

This again would come into the field of sniping. I do not feel so generous about it as to say it is always in good sport. We do not like being insulted.

Mr. Fortier: May I ask how you, as papers, deal with these things?

Mr. S. Herder: If this is in the area in which we are commenting at the time and commenting, not reporting, we will continue to comment on it until such time as we run out of commentary. If we just cannot find something else to say, or have no cause to say...

Mr. Fortier: Is the column or rather the section dealing with letters to the editor ever used for that purpose? I mean this would be a legitimate thing. Is it ever used by members of the Government?

Mr. Harrington: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: To get a snipe at the newspaper?

Mr. Harrington: No. To reply if we have a story that they disagree with or on some ground, whether it is factual or something else. They often come back and write a letter. In the same way, in the case of editorial comment or commentary of any other kind on the editorial page, they frequently come right back at us. We give them as much prominence as we can and usually try to feature the reply on the editorial page or smack on the editorial column.

It happened as recently as 10 days ago.

Mr. Fortier: May I ask if, to your knowledge, this sort of sniping occurs elsewhere on the newspaper, where other newspapers are concerned in Newfoundland?

Mr. S. Herder: Oh, yes.

Mr. H. C. Herder: I do not like the word "sniping". We hit them; they hit us; fair ball. What we object to if there were any laws to protect us and we were not always right; if we are not, of course, we get it in the neck.

Mr. S. Herder: Could I just interject one thing. I am sorry. I do not know why I am so stupid. This is the A.B.C. report—Occupied dwellings, 16,500. Our Monday to Thursday is 14,000 and our weekend is 18,500—so in the Monday to Thursday, we undersell and other days, we oversell on weekends. I am sorry.

Mr. Fortier: I would like to pursue that point, if I may. The A.B.C. figure show that over the last 10 years, circulation has increased by 23 percent. Do you know if your national advertising, without further advertising rates, has also increased during that period?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Definitely.

Mr. Fortier: Would there be any relationship between the increase of circulation and increase in advertising rates?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Some of this gives us justification, but really our advertising rates go, to put it simply, on how many apples are left in the barrel.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Farrell told us this afternoon—you may have been here—that the advertising rates were what the traffic would bear. Would you agree with that statement?

Mr. H. C. Herder: It does not sound right, but yes; yes, what the traffic has got to bear.

Mr. Fortier: I just wondered if it was an attitude of "If you can get it from them, take it".

Mr. H. C. Herder: We like to think that we take what we need to make it work.

Mr. Fortier: Which is your main area of competition insofar as the advertising dollar is concerned; is it radio or television?

Mr. H. C. Herder: I would say possibly TV, certainly in national advertising.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Harrington, has the advent of television meant a change in written journalism insofar as your newspaper is concerned?

Mr. Harrington: In what way?

Mr. Fortier: Well, I am referring to the statement which was made yesterday by one of the witnesses who appeared before the committee. It was to the effect that because of the advent of television, newspaper reporting had become more exact.

Would you comment on that?

Mr. Harrington: Well, I think newspaper reporting always had to be exact. I would say, you are suggesting that because people see an event take place that the reporter must be very precise.

Mr. H. C. Herder: Certainly, Senator, no doubt we lose some of the lead we previously had; if you are being goosed you run harder. It definitely has not done us a bit of harm; it has made us more careful; sure.

Mr. Fortier: You run "Herder".

Mr. Harrington: We have had changes in content, format and layout on the very basis.

Mr. S. Herder: Let me take it a little further than Mike. I would say that the packaging has been a more major change than the accuracy of reporting. The other major result that could be put on television's doorstep is all newspapers are doing more what we call depth or backgrounding of news—and it is a darned good thing, too.

I would like to feel we had done it all on our own as newspapers, but I am not sure this is so.

Mr. Fortier: For these in-depth studies, do you consider that you have enough reporters on the staff now to carry them out properly?

Mr. S. Herder: I was looking at some figures last week. I think we have too many. Most of my work on the newspaper has been on the editorial side. I still look for stronger editorial staff.

Quite frankly, I think we have enough. We probably are fairly large. By the standard of our size, we have 58, I think, full-time newspaper people, reporters, editors, photographers, and what-have-you.

Mr. Fortier: When you wake up an hour and a half before the rest of Canada, Mr. Herder...

Senator Macdonald: Before Montreal, not Canada.

Mr. Fortier: I interjected a personal thought. The question of news priority arises; do you look east or west?

Mr. S. Herder: I think...

The Chairman: Do you want that question explained?

Mr. S. Herder: I think I am getting past that one which is intended to be trite. We do make an honest effort to judge everything, from two-line fills up to today's main story. We really do. It does not always show in the paper, but we are trying. We do not look in either direction, as such.

The Chairman: I am sorry. Senator Everett wanted to ask some questions. Do you want to finish?

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Chairman, I have only a couple of more questions. In Item 16 of your brief, I notice that you cited the opinion of one of your editors, which I must assume as you incorporated it into your brief that you agree with. He speaks on the second page, third paragraph of Item 16, the last sentence. It says as follows: "Only when a question of taste or possible libel was concerned have I seen a story held up or killed by top management."

My question is a double-barrelled one. This question of taste appears many times in your brief. I would like to know whose taste you refer to and I also would like to know what stories in recent months may have been killed on account of taste.

Mr. H. C. Herder: The taste, I suppose, is our own, what we think is right or wrong.

Mr. Fortier: Meaning you, the publishers?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Yes, and with the other bodies around, they may narrow. If it is a case of libel or something, for example, we have another uncle who is Chairman of the Board. If he does not like something, he says, "No; that is bad taste," if we have not cut it off before.

Mr. Fortier: That would be, I emphasize, the taste of the Herder family?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Well, yes.

Mr. Fortier: Would you give us an instance of a story or stories which have not been published in recent months on account of offending the Herder taste?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Well, I do not know what light we are going to put ourselves in now because I cannot think of one. Maybe our taste is pretty loose, but—I am not trying to be facetious.

Mr. Fortier: I am referring to your brief.

Mr. Harrington: Frankly, I am in the same position. When it comes to the actual remembrance of a situation, it slips my mind. I cannot think of anything right at the moment. Maybe our tastes are very broad.

Mr. H. C. Herder: I know where it came from and he happens to be enthusiastic. He did work with us, and I hope I am not maligning one. It was rather difficult. He objected to being guided.

Mr. Fortier: I will quote: "We base our judgment of any material not fully in accord with our own views only on good taste."

Mr. S. Herder: At the outset it was mentioned there was some overlapping. Yes; this is a clear case. However, these things we just have to take my word. They were written independently; nobody saw anybody else's.

Mr. Fortier: You make that point very clear.

Mr. Harrington: I eventually put the thing together. I use the word "loosely". We did not change, just because it did overlap and it did overlap.

Mr. H. C. Herder: Our ideas of good taste may not agree with everybody else's.

The Chairman: Does this statement stand: "We base our judgment of any material not fully in accord with our own views only on good taste."? Does the statement stand or does it not?

Mr. H. C. Herder: I would think a lot of people disagree with our taste.

The Chairman: May I ask you, if Mr. Fortier will permit—I just want to ask you what you mean by good taste.

Mr. H. C. Herder: That is what I was afraid you were going to ask. The only thing I can say is that it is something we do not think should go in the paper because it is unfair; it is misleading; it was wrong, or if you like, too sexy could come under the quotation.

The Chairman: When you use the phrase "Good taste", does it relate primarily to questions of sex?

Mr. H. C. Herder: No; no.

Mr. Fortier: Sex can be in good taste.

Mr. S. Herder: Yes, sir.

The Chairman: So the statement stands.

Mr. S. Herder: Senator, as it says only in good taste, we must use the laws of the land basically, as well as our own judgment.

The Chairman: I think Senator Everett had some questions.

Senator Everett: Could you tell me what relation J. M. Herder is to you?

Mr. S. Herder: He is an uncle.

Senator Everett: Your uncle, and a substantial shareholder?

Mr. S. Herder: In the Telegram?

Senator Everett: Yes.

Mr. S. Herder: Right.

Senator Everett: Is he also a shareholder in the Western Star?

Mr. S. Herder: No.

Senator Everett: He is not?

Mr. S. Herder: No.

Senator Everett: Could you tell me what relation of his is a shareholder in the Western Star?

Mr. S. Herder: His wife.

Senator Everett: His wife. You say that his wife and your wife own 49 percent?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Each owns 49 percent. In other words, except for a couple of qualifying shares, the girls own all.

Senator Everett: You say on some page in the brief, just prior to Item 7: "As to inheritance taxes, for instance, in a closely held company such as our own the untimely passing of one or two members of the ownership family could be a very major problem indeed."

Could you tell me whether you have done an analysis of your estate tax situation under the present act and whether or not you would have to sell either of the newspapers in certain succession cases?

Mr. H. C. Herder: We have not done a survey. We rather suspect we would, and hope we would not have to. We do not know because there are a number of combinations if you play around with it, just to see how to come up. In other words, just could pay and who could not.

Senator Everett: But you think there is a grave possibility this would happen?

Mr. H. C. Herder: I think it could, sir.

The Chairman: Mr. Harrington, are there any underground newspapers in Newfoundland?

Mr. Harrington: I have not heard of any.

The Chairman: None in St. John's?

Senator Hays: I would just like to pursue one question. Mr. Farrell was here. I asked if he felt the press should have freedom to persecute and he said no. He did not think they should have. How do you feel there?

Mr. H. C. Herder: I feel it should not; no, definitely.

The Chairman: Would you care to expand on the ideal in Section 22 in connection with It is desirable, we agree, though not economically feasible for Canadians to have more direct representation...?"

Then you continue with "This question however causes us to comment on the frequently heard desire for a national newspaper for Canada. How would it be financed and who would run it? Might not this be a kind of challenge to the newspapers of the nation to try to create one on a co-operative basis..."

Was that a serious or capricious suggestion?

Mr. Harrington: That is not a suggestion. It is just a thought.

The Chairman: It is not a suggestion?

Mr. Harrington: Well, no.

The Chairman: Is there anything you want to say on it at all?

Mr. Harrington: No. It simply is thrown in as a thought for whatever discussion or consideration the committee or anybody else wants to make of it.

The Chairman: You refer to it as—I am quoting from the brief—"a kind of Senate of the Press." That is mind-boggling.

Are there any other questions that the Senators have?

Senator Macdonald: To go back for a moment to the recruiting of staff. You mentioned five or six Carleton graduates. Would they be girls or boys from Newfoundland who came to Carleton or would they be people from outside Newfoundland?

Mr. H. C. Herder: One of them is.

Senator Macdonald: One is from Newfoundland?

Mr. H. C. Herder: Not one of the Carleton ones, no; I am sorry.

Senator Macdonald: I was wondering if your geographic location made it difficult to get people from upper Canada to stay there.

Mr. H. C. Herder: More, but some come and like it and enjoy it.

Senator McElman: Are any scholarships provided in Newfoundland for students to attend schools for journalism in other parts of the country?

Mr. S. Herder: No. There is a move right now. I have forgotten from which direction it is coming. It is a move to do just that. I think it is something as small as a scholarship for a student to attend a school of journalism.

Mr. Fortier: I wonder if we could hear what Mr. Herder's views are on a press council.

Mr. H. C. Herder: No violent objection at all except the feeling maybe—and I am not too sure exactly how a press council works or would work. If it is another body that is going to have control over us—we have been free since 1497. Our last territorial demand was 1949.

This would be the only thing. If we had to get tangled together with meetings deciding on the day-to-day business, I think we would be unhappy. But again, I say, we basically have no violent objections. We have no objections, particularly if it were well set up.

We do not, by the way, object to criticism. Talk about me whatever you do; do not have a guilty silence.

Mr. Fortier: At the local, provincial, or national level?

Mr. H. C. Herder: I would rather have it at the national level because, up to now, they have been a nice, long way away.

The Chairman: Perhaps on that note, may I thank you Mr. Herder and Mr. Herder and Mr. Harrington. We are grateful you were able to be here. We appreciate your coming from Newfoundland to attend the hearing.

Honourable Senators, the next meeting of this Committee is this evening at eight o'clock in this room, when we will have as our guest, Mr. Claude Ryan.

I wonder if I might also ask the Senators who are on the steering committee, members of the staff, Senator Petten and Senator Everett to remain just for a brief meeting now for about five minutes.

Thank you.

The Committee adjourned.

(Upon resuming at 8:00 p.m.)

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, our guest this evening, as I am sure you are aware, is Mr. Claude Ryan, who is the publisher of "Le Devoir."

I should perhaps make clear at the outset, however, that he does not appear here this evening in his capacity as publisher of that newspaper but, rather, is the first in a series of nationally known commentators who the Steering Committee felt might have views of great interest and great value to the Committee.

Mr. Ryan has submitted a paper for the Committee's consideration which he has been kind enough to bring with him this evening. We have agreed that we might proceed this evening as follows: that he will take 15 or 20 minutes and summarize the highlights of his paper.

Following the summary Senators will then feel free, Mr. Ryan, to put questions to you certainly on your paper, but there may be other things as well which they will want to ask you about. And you have agreed that that will be possible.

I am going to ask you first of all if you would introduce the people who are with you.

Mr. Claude Ryan, Editor, "Le Devoir": I should like to introduce two colleagues from Le Devoir who have accompanied me this evening, although they are not necessarily bound by the opinions expressed in the paper which will be submitted to you. They are: Mr. Michel Roy, Political editor of Le Devoir, and Mr. Bernard Larocque, assistant treasurer of the newspapers publishing company, The Imprimerie Populaire Limitee. They may have interesting information or impressions to give you during the question period to follow the summary of the paper...

Then, Mr. Chairman, with your permission, I propose to summarize in French the paper which I just now handed to you. I am sorry I was not able to let you have copies earlier, but you will undoubtedly be told in the course of your hearings, we are used to working against a deadline in a daily newspaper, and so we do not feel the necessity to turn out copy until the very last minute. Indeed I shall be very happy, during the question period that follows, to discuss any point which an member of your Committee may care to raise, in the language used to frame his questions. I believe we shall be able to understand one another in either language.

I should like to make a correction in my text, or perhaps in the remarks made earlier by the Committee Chairman; he said that I was here in my personal capacity, whereas I started my text by saying: "I represent Le Devoir." I could simply change that to read: "I work for Le Devoir".

Mr. Fortier: Couldn't you wear two hats?

Mr. Ryan: In the first part of my paper, I have tried to give you an idea of what is represented by Le Devoir, where I have had the privilege of working for almost eight years now. Le Devoir is an institution with a very special character in Canada. It is a daily newspaper, published on a non-profit basis by a corporation, none of whose members receives any remuneration;—except permanent employees—it has always been committed to ideas, rather than to commercial values, yet it has managed, although still a relatively small newspaper, to stay alive for sixty years, retaining all the while a high degree of independence. Because the newspaper has this experience behind it, I was especially honoured by the invitation to address your Committee, because I believe that for sixty years our paper has exemplified the freedom of the press, not only through the values it has tried to defend, but also through the endless problems and difficulties which it has faced throughout its lifetime, which will reach sixty years next January.

Next, I wanted to say how very much I appreciate the fact that a Parliamentary Committee should concern itself with the problem of the freedom of the press, as well as the seriousness with which your Committee established its research program.

I was visited in my office by officers of a consulting firm assigned to carry out certain work on your behalf. I am glad to say I was impressed by the high quality of the documents with which we were asked to work. I would also like to compliment you on the quality of the guide to discussion given to witnesses called before your Committee. It constitutes an excellent summary of the problems confronting the daily press.

In the next few pages, I have tried to expand on the traditional notion of freedom of the press. As a rule, freedom of the press is presented as the right of the individual citizen to disclose information, disseminate opinions, make his point of view known; in addition to this dimension, which remains basic, I believe there is a social and collective dimension which today is just as important as the first, and that is the citizen's right to information. This means the public's right to receive information that is proper, honest and just as complete and diversified as possible. I also add, a bit further on, a third dimension, which I would call the right of a person holding a responsible position in society to be presented to the public in a true light, to have his activities, points of view and projects shown to the public at large in perspective and with such background as will reflect a faithful picture and not just a caricature or mis-shapen image. These are new aspects of which we are more aware today, because we have had occasion to weigh the tremendous influence wielded by the communication media.

I then go on to speak of the advent of television and of the challenge it represented for the press. Television, as you have undoubtedly been told before and will certainly hear in the weeks to come, has seriously cut into a source of revenue on which daily newspapers drew more abundantly before its inception. It is becoming more and more difficult for us to obtain our fair share of advertising on a national or even a regional basis, because television is providing us with very sharp competition. However, television notwithstanding, I am personally convinced that in many respects the daily newspaper is still a factor of great importance in forming public opinion.

I believe the written press has certain advantages, particularly the possibility of presenting the news in greater detail and of the possibility of viewing events with the perspective provided by several hours of elapsed time; the ability to hold its readers longer, and, above all, to afford the reader an opportunity of re-reading any article he has not fully understood.

The newspaper which I represent is rather privileged in that respect, because I think it may be the most frequently clipped paper in Canada, the one from which people take the largest number of clippings to set up files of all sorts on one question or another.

Many people subscribe to Le Devoir; they don't always read it every day because they find it hard to digest in the morning; they prefer another newspaper—which I shall not name—as their breakfast fare. But ours is a newspaper that people keep, and to which reference is continuously made; you will see it in scholarly works turned out by universities, and even by government task forces. If you consider the French press in particular, at least three of every four quotations and references will be taken from Le Devoir; because this is one of its characteristics, it will probably be able to get more easily through the present period.

I then went on to emphasize that newspaper owners are not as free and untrammelled as they used to be, because newsmen on many papers have organized into unions which have helped journalists a great deal, not only to improve their material and social working conditions, but also to obtain greater recognition of their rights and fundamental dignity. This in turn leads to problems when unionism becomes too strong in newspapers. It also gives rise to problems of a different type, a couple of which I mentioned in my brief. However, it is fair to say that, on the whole, the positive effects of unionism have so far outweighed the few problems that may have stemmed from it.

Next, I pointed up the very, very special working conditions which prevail in a daily newspaper. Personally, I worked for twenty years in other sectors, and during that period my office staff and equipment as well as my research facilities were much larger than those that are now available in the daily newspapers.

In a daily newspaper, as I pointed out here, a journalist may do a very important job, yet has to make his own telephone calls and, in most cases, handle his own correspondence. He has to organize his work and conduct his own research; he has nobody to do his "leg work" for him, and except for a few top-rated journalists, the newspaper cannot afford to provide these facilities.

Secondly, owing to the speed at which we must work and the tremendous amount of material to be handled, the chances of error are much greater than in any other profession that I know. It is often said that even the righteous are bound to err seven times a day. However, a journalist's errors are made public, affecting men and organizations that are very jealous of their prerogatives and reputations; more often than not, this brings down on his head undeserved charges of incompetence or dishonesty.

Today, you heard the spokesmen for the Canadian Press. In that respect, there is one point in particular I would like to make. You should know that French-language newspapers are seriously handicapped as compared with their English-speaking colleagues when it comes to services for supplying news.

I should like to read to you an excerpt from my brief, on page 15—I have reached page 15, Mr. Chairman, and I hope this is going fast enough for you.

In Canada, the Canadian Press agency—the co-operative property of the country's daily newspapers, which means we are also one of its owners—supplies at least twice as much material in English as in French; in fact I believe it is more like three times as much. I have been somewhat careful in the text, but I do believe that it is three times as much. For instance, Canadian Press has ten or more professional journalists covering the parliamentary scene every day and turning out copy in the English language, as compared to only three who write their copy in French. Similarly, the network of English-speaking correspondents for Canadian Press covers the whole country, whereas the agency maintains French-speaking correspondents only in a few main centres. This means that in our French-language newspapers we must make do every day with a synthetic diet, fed to us by CP and which often arrives—particularly where Le Devoir is concerned—at hours and under conditions which prevent us from using it as we should like to do.

Senator Beaubien: Mr. Ryan, does it arrive too late, or what?

Mr. Ryan: Yes.

Senator Beaubien: Do you have to translate?

Mr. Ryan: Yes, in many cases too late, because they have to work for the afternoon papers and morning papers at the same time, and since the service is still small, some newspapers receive poorer service than others. Our deadline is earlier than that of other morning newspapers published elsewhere. A good deal of copy arrives too late for us to use.

The Chairman: Excuse me, Mr. Ryan, I have received a note, which shall remain anonymous, asking if I might persuade you to slow down just a bit.

Mr. Ryan: I'm appreciative of this.

The Chairman: Well, its a . . .

Mr. Ryan: No, I expected I would get a notice to this effect.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Ryan, in view of the fact that we did not have the advantage of reading your text before eight o'clock, I believe it would be in your interest and ours for the Chairman to allow you more time to explain it to us.

Senator Beaubien: We will give you all the time you need.

The Chairman: Take as much time as you need, but the note indicated the person was anxious to study the things you were saying.

So would you go more slowly? I am sure you will.

Mr. Ryan: So I was at page 15. I won't go back. This remains open for questions, though.

But, starting from page 15, I have what I consider some very important things to say at the end of the brief concerning postal changes in the last few months and their consequence on a newspaper like ours. And these papers I think I must discuss fully, with your permission.

The Chairman: Of course.

Mr. Ryan: I just mentioned the quality of French service in the Canadian Press, and more generally ...

The Chairman: Speak French, if you prefer.

Mr. Ryan: Speaking in more general terms, the English daily papers have the benefit of much more abundant sources of immediate information than do the French newspapers. For instance, they have the many syndicated columnists from the United States. To give only one example, the column of Jos. Kraft, which replaced that of Walter Lippmann, reaches the English newspapers the same morning and can be published immediately as is. We at Le Devoir have subscribed to the Jos. Kraft column, which is interesting indeed. However, we have to translate it from English to French.

Senator Beaubien: And that takes time.

Mr. Ryan: It takes time and it costs money since the translation is not done by the publisher himself.

On the English-speaking side, fear has often been expressed concerning the possibility of invasion by French sources, French sources with a capital "F". There is no danger in this respect, or at least very little, because in nine cases out of ten, the material we receive from France has to be adapted to such an extent that we cannot transpose it literally. At Le Devoir we have a reproduction agreement with the Paris daily Le Monde, for example. Every day we reproduce perhaps one or two articles from Le Monde, that is all. We could carry much more but our readers would not accept it; besides too many of these items would have nothing of immediate interest to offer the reader with a Canadian outlook. Even so, we are glad to have this source.

I wish to add that for the past few years we have been able to supplement our news sources through the services of Agence France-Presse. Before that addition, the only international news we received in French was a brief digest from the French service of Reuters. All the rest came to us through Associated Press.

Now in our various newsrooms we have a good many French dailies from Agence France-Presse which are supplied to us at what I feel is a reasonable rate and which, on the whole, are very good. Some feel that because this news agency includes a certain form of government participation, it is biased and partial. Let me assure you that from this point of view, it compares well with the other large international agencies, each of which also has its little biases, whether conscious or unconscious.

I should now like to discuss concentration ownership in the newspaper business, a subject to which I have devoted considerable attention in my brief. I feel that it is important to deal with this question at some length because I believe it was one of the most pressing reasons for setting up your Committee.

Scarcely five or six years ago, Mr. Chairman, Quebec had some ten independent daily newspapers, including four English-language dailies. Today, the control of more than half these newspapers has been taken over by chains and at least one other paper is in very serious financial difficulty. And it is not Le Devoir. This means that in all Quebec there may soon be no more than two or three French daily papers completely free of any obligation or dependency other than that which they owe to their public and their journalists.

Concentration is newspaper ownership has undeniable advantages:

(a) The chain offers its members greater financial and technical resources than are available to the independent;

(b) The chain has recourse to more better qualified administrative and managerial talent;

(c) The Chain permits more extensive pooling of efforts and resources;

(d) The chain makes it possible to consider the development of markets for readers or advertisers on bases much broader than those of the immediate local market;

(e) Finally, the chain's greater resources enable a newspaper to make such changes and improvements as must be made if it is not to sink into mediocrity.

On the other hand, concentration of newspaper ownership presents serious disadvantages and dangers of which these are a few examples.

(a) The paper's identification with the community can readily become more artificial. The senior editorial and administrative staff may often be transplants with few roots in either the social environment or the profession.

(b) From the standpoint of professional quality, the chains we have seen at work in Quebec have a tendency to lower rather than raise standards. If they were not prodded by such local consciences as unions and the all too rare newspapers which are completely independent and concerned about quality, I am sure that the chains, of their own accord, would tend to standardize in an impersonal way the intellectual and professional aspect of newspaper production. For example, they would naturally be tempted to use the same parliamentary correspondent for all the members of their chain whereas independent papers would each insist on having their own correspondent. If ways are not found to stop this trend towards concentration, it may conceivably lead, in the long run, to a considerable decrease in the number of professional positions open in the field of journalism.

(c) From the standpoint of intellectual vitality, none of the existing chains appears to offer much in the way of stimulation. A number of papers which have become affiliated to large chains have succeeded in maintaining the vitality they already possessed. None admit to having received renewed vitality from their adherence to a chain. In a great many cases, the effect seems to have been exactly opposite. The owners and managers like to maintain that the director of each newspaper in the chain is completely free to determine the editorial policy of the paper. But this is obviously a guarded freedom exercised within confines whose limits, although not rigorously defined in writing, are none the less real.

(d) From the advertising angle, the danger with chains is that blocks will be formed which, on the pretext of making consolidated offers to advertisers, will eventually impose upon their competitors terms that are practically impossible to match. This danger has already begun to materialize in the case of one chain of which one member, published once a week, offers advertisers a package deal including advertisements in two daily papers in the same chain, published in other centres. This is a thinly disguised attempt to divert from French-language dailies in the immediate area income which would normally accrue to them.

Senator Everett: Excuse me; would you mind repeating that last point?

Mr. Ryan: There is a tendency on the part of some chains to offer to advertisers package deals. And one example which I quoted was that of a newspaper appearing once a week in one city in the Province of Quebec and which is now offering to prospective advertisers package contracts involving two dailies published in other centres and that weekly published in another city, which means they are trying to take away from the daily newspapers in that community advertising revenue which would normally accrue to them.

Senator Everett: Thank you.

Mr. Ryan: There is a marked tendency in the chains to subordinate the intellectual and social function of the newspapers to the economic aspect. As a rule, chain newspapers are more impersonal, less committed politically and socially, than the independents. There are, of course, exceptions to this rule on both sides but I feel that it generally holds true. I could mention one case where the purchase of a daily by a chain had immediate effects on the costs of our own newspaper. We had to absorb a 200 per cent increase in our contribution to services shared jointly, and the main reason given us was that the decision had been made at head office, located in another province.

The trend towards concentration also gives rise to the danger that an increasing number of Canadian centres will be served, in future, by a single newspaper and perhaps even, directly or indirectly, by a single information network. Such a development would be contrary to the very principle of freedom of the press which postulates a certain diversity in means of expression.

I should now like to put before you some of the consequences of Bill C-116, which was passed by the House of Commons at the end of 1968, and of other administrative measures subsequently taken by the present Postmaster General. Mr. Kierans had Parliament approve a completely unreasonable increase in the postal rates for newspapers, an increase out of all proportion with those put into effect in the United States in recent years. He also decided to eliminate Saturday mail delivery except in rural areas. Through a series of ill-advised decisions, he was also responsible for a marked deterioration in the general quality of the postal service.

On this subject, you might be interested in hearing a few facts and figures concerning the impact of these changes on the life of the newspaper I represent. Here they are: I shall go a little more slowly here because there are a lot of figures—you have them in the brief, in any case, but I believe that these are figures which should be of interest to you. At the beginning of 1969, we had 17,362 postal subscribers. At the beginning of December this year, we had 11,756, a drop of 5,606. In addition, at the beginning of 1969, we had 9,151 home-delivery subscribers; by the beginning of December, we had 12,727, a gain of 3,776. Now let us see what these figures mean in terms of money.

1. We suffered a net loss of at least 2,000 mail subscribers principally owing to the elimination of Saturday delivery, deterioration in postal delivery service and the increase in rates we were obliged to impose on our subscribers. At $25 per subscription, this means a loss of $50,000. By way of evidence, I submit a file containing dozens of cancellation notices in which the subscriber clearly attributes his decision not to renew to the deterioration of the postal service. You will note that these subscribers come from a great many centres in Quebec, which would indicate that the deterioration has been more or less general. Furthermore, these figures do not take into account the loss of interest doubtless experienced by numerous other subscribers who often do not receive their copies of Le Devoir for Friday and Saturday until the following Tuesday, and who, when their subscription runs out, may notify us of a decision similar to that contained in the notices of non-renewal which are now in the hands of your Chairman.

2. For the some 12,000 remaining postal subscribers, we have had to pay increased expenses of approximately $3.50 per subscription annually, as costs rose from an average of $3.00 to $6.50 annually. This comes to an additional $42,000. In this regard I wish to emphasize—and emphasize very deliberately—that because of the .02 cents per copy minimum stipulated in the Kierans legislation, we had to bear, as of April 1, 1969, contrary to the general impression which may have been created by departmental publicity, the full weight of an increase which was supposed to have been spread over three consecutive periods. In March 1969, a 16-page issue of Le Devoir with approximately 42 per cent of the space reserved for advertising cost us $157.67 for 15,000 copies. In April 1969, one month later, a 16-page edition with about the same amount of space reserved for advertising cost us $308.05 for 14,000 copies. Costs rose from $157. to $308. for 1,000 fewer copies.

3. Wherever it was physically and financially possible, to use a trite formula, we had to extend our carrier service for home delivery, which already existed in the Quebec City and Montreal metropolitan areas. In direct costs for transportation, supervision and payment to newsboys, this service costs us approximately .05 cents a copy, instead of the average .01 cents a copy formerly paid for postal delivery. Considering the fact that this service had to be provided for some 3,500 additional subscribers in points as far apart as Hull, Saint-Jérôme, Joliette, Saint-Jean, Valleyfield, Saint-Hyacinthe, Sorel, Sherbrooke, Lachute, Chicoutimi, Rimouski, Trois-Rivières, Granby, Victoriaville, and many more, this means additional expenditures of at least $42,000.

We then lost at least 1,200 subscribers who took only the Saturday edition of Le Devoir. The loss incurred under this item is estimated at approximately $10,000.

On the other hand, last October, that is in 1968, we increased the subscription rate in anticipation of higher postal rates. The increase brought in additional revenue of something like $55,000, about half of which, according to our estimates, would go to offset the increase in postal rates, which we were convinced would not exceed a possible maximum of 50 per cent. The remainder had been earmarked to cover increased production and salary costs resulting from regular collective agreements with our employees, who are practically all unionized, and from a radical change in the paper's production methods. If from the increased costs mentioned above, we deduct approximately $30,000 which in any case would have had to be allocated to the increase in postal rates, we are left with a clear and shocking total of $114,000 in losses and additional costs directly attributable to the change in postal regulations.

The measures taken by the federal government and the Post Office Department and approved by the Senate constituted for a newspaper such as ours a grave source of injustice:

(a) They express an excessive preference on the part of federal authorities for radio and television at the expense of the press, although fundamentally, the role performed by the two media is the same;

(b) They reflect a total inexcusable insensitivity to the implications of the concentration of ownership which is now taking place in the press sector;

(c) In the case of Le Devoir, they forced us to devote to extraneous purposes the fruits of an effort in administrative rationalization which, for the first time this year, would have held out the prospect of reasonable and regular surpluses and, consequently, of substantial improvements in the quality and competitive position of our product;

(d) If Le Devoir had not been so hard hit by this abrupt change of system, it would probably have been in a position, for the first time this year, to pay taxes to the federal government, the amount of which would probably have equalled what Ottawa is now extracting from us in the form of higher costs for volume of business, that is lower even for the Post Office Department.

In fact, any small surpluses we have been able to amass in the last few years have had to be used to redeem previous losses and to bring up to date a number of items on our books that had become dormant. This year, for the first time, we would have been in a position to pay regular taxes. If Mr. Benson is not happy, he will have to take the matter up with Mr. Kierans and with Parliament.

In the light of such facts as I have mentioned, it seems to me unrealistic and artificial to seek to argue as if informational and governmental activities still constituted two separate fields completely fenced off from one another. The state is already deeply involved in the information field; for proof, we need look no farther than that vast undertaking which is provided with infinitely greater resources than any agency in the private sector, and which is known as the CBC. Furthermore, the fiscal measures that the state adopts or refrains from adopting influence the quality of freedom in this sector. Not only that, but the public authorities have been appointed the ultimate guardians of the citizen's fundamental freedoms and wherever these are poorly served or threatened, it is their duty to step in.

In this respect, the first step is obviously an objective and impartial examination of the facts. The inquiry your Committee is conducting is the first of its kind to be made in a very long time. I am wondering whether the public authorities would not find it to their advantage to equip themselves with more permanent facilities for obtaining information on this subject

Once inquiries have been conducted, it will doubtless be necessary to plan positive action. I am not one of those who believe that the public authorities should close their eyes and sit back with their arms folded. Nor do I agree with those who believe the public authorities should permit the gradual decay and disappearance of the small newspapers that try to maintain some semblance of meaningful competition and diversity in the communications field. It seems to me that daily newspapers, utterly essential as they are to the development of our national life, should be regarded as a kind of "property in the public interest"—not in the sense that they should pass under state ownership and control, but in the sense that they should be granted special attention by the state, and that it should not be permissible to dispose of them without the authorities being duly informed of all the implications. The principle behind this suggestion has already been recognized in a federal act, passed a few years ago, that requires the ownership of daily newspapers to remain in the hands of Canadian citizens. But this measure would be quite meaningless were it not accompanied by provisions designed to ensure that Canadian ownership of newspapers will serve only to increase Canadians' real freedom in the field of information. If I had to choose between the availability of a single newspaper owned by a Canadian monopoly, and access to two newspapers, one Canadian-owned and one American-owned, I would not have the slightest hesitation in preferring a choice between two newspapers to one alone.

The public authorities should recognize—but I would prefer it to be between two Canadian-owned newspapers—the public authorities should recognize that in the supplying of certain community services, they have a special responsibility towards daily newspapers, especially towards modest non-profitmaking papers. By depriving dailies of Saturday mail deliveries, the federal government has dealt a severe blow not only to the freedom of the press, but also to the right of every sector of economic and professional activity to be served on a proportionally equal basis by the state in fields for which the state assumes immediate responsibility. I also feel that by making exorbitant increases in mail delivery rates, Parliament has dealt a hard blow to small papers which are forced to use this method of delivery more than the larger papers because they do not have the means to initiate a car delivery service, since this is very expensive and requires a much bigger circulation than they can command. The federal government should seek to correct at once the tremendous harm it has already done to numerous worthwhile—not to say essential—Canadian publications. The method of government that proceeds from the assumption that it is necessary to treat everyone, large and small, on a strictly equal footing, inevitably leads to domination of the small by the large and the gradual elimination of the former.

The state should require strict compliance by newspaper managements with the obligation to disclose details of their capital structure, the names of directors—the text reads “those directed”, but as you will have guessed, that is a typographical error—the individuals or groups who actually have control, the main particulars of transactions involving a change in control, subsidiaries, branches and parent companies, balance sheets and financial statements, etc. This obligation stems from the concept of “property in the public interest” mentioned above.

Finally, it might be appropriate to do in Canada what has recently been done in Sweden, and appoint one or more press ombudsmen. Such officials’ duties might be, first, to study any grievance brought to their attention by members of the public or the press relative to a presumed violation of the freedom of the press; second, to lay before the appropriate authorities and the public all relevant information concerning transactions that involve changes in the control of daily newspapers.

Earlier in this paper, I mentioned the question of a press council. We shall be able to discuss that shortly.

Lastly, I wonder whether the state will not be prompted in the future to give serious consideration to the possibility of helping to supply certain technical services that are required in the publication and distribution of newspapers.

I am going to present you with some facts, Mr. Chairman. Two and a half years ago, all the machinery used in turning out our newspaper needed replacing, but we didn’t have the funds to do it. We decided to hand over this part of the operation, in its entirety, to an independent firm that offered to perform the service on what we considered reasonable terms. So we went ahead with it, but at the end of the summer, this firm’s management informed us that circumstances were forcing them to sell control to another morning paper with which we are in competition. I should point out that in this field, you do not have fifteen possibilities to choose from in Montreal; you have two or three firms, at most, which can offer a service with the necessary speed and quality. This means that we could quite easily... supposing that Mr. Péladeau, who has been very kind so far, were to be less pleasant beginning next week, he could practically...

Senator Beaubien: He prints your newspaper?

Mr. Ryan: Yes, he is the one who acquired control of the printing works. He could put us in a difficult position overnight. We are eating in his hands in a certain way. We pay our bills regularly, therefore we have no cause for embarrassment in our relations with him. But suppose he decided to take a little less interest in the printing works, and to appoint a manager who was less efficient; there are fifty different ways in which a competitor can damage another man’s business.

This shows you how concentration occurs without there necessarily being any evil conspiracy; there is a kind of impetus, a very real economic force that brings it about.

Senator Beaubien: You do not have much choice. You cannot go to the Star or the Gazette.

Mr. Ryan: No, no, there are completely different production requirements that make it wellnigh impossible.

Finally, it is this that leads me to wonder whether the provision of such services could not possibly be handled by co-operatives with a certain amount of state assistance—for example, low-interest loans—co-operative production and delivery services, set up through the combined efforts of various newspapers in conjunction with the state.

It will doubtless be advisable to re-examine existing law regarding cartels and monopolies in order to see whether the time has come to redefine some of its concepts, having in mind the problems we have in the information field.

Mr. Chairman, I shall be very happy to supply you, within a few... within a week or two, with a list of problems that your Committee might examine, if you think it would be of interest.

Thank you very much, and excuse me for taking so much of your time.

The Chairman: Thank you very much.

The Chairman: Well, we are most interested. Thank you very much.

I understand that the questions from our Committee will be acceptable in either language because some of the Senators, I know, would find it easier to ask in English.

Mr. Ryan: Yes, that is fine.

The Chairman: Well, I think Senator Smith?

Senator Smith: I am very glad that you will accept a question from one who has to struggle pretty hard to make himself understood in the French language.

Senator Beaubien: Say it in French!

Senator Smith: Yes, I know quite a bit about Mr. Ryan, and I have been favoured by his spoken wisdom on a number of other occasions. And I am sure that the members and others who may be here tonight who have never been exposed to your spoken wisdom before appreciate your presence very much as we as members of the Committee do.

In fact this could be regarded as an attractive live presentation of one of your rather famous signed editorials.

I was making some enquiries about the newspaper that you publish and in which you write editorials. Someone referred to it as an institution with intellectual readership. I thought that was a very complimentary reference to a newspaper, and the more I learn about your operation from yourself I can understand just what they meant.

It has also been indicated to me that its disappearance in Quebec would be a very major blow to French Canada. And I think, as my colleague Senator Beaubien says, it is unthinkable. And I am sure we all hope very hard that it will never happen and you will have another 60 years of real success.

One of the subjects that I rather hoped that you would touch on you started out by mentioning almost in the beginning, when you referred to freedom of the press. We have been discussing freedom of the press in other hearings and it received a lot of attention yesterday when we had representations from the Canadian Daily Newspapers Publishers' Association. And there are many facets to it.

You spent a little time in indicating the economic pressure that results from the concentration of ownership in the press. And this is something, of course, that must worry everyone very much.

Is there another area, though, in which freedom of the press is being lost through the kind of operation that may exist in chains or some of these group ownerships and these combinations of dailies-plus-weeklies with respect to the freedom that is given to the editors of those individual newspapers to express opinions and so on? What is your observation on that? Could you help us?

Mr. Ryan: I should like to be complemented by my colleague Mr. Roy. He has something to say in this respect. He has been very active in the professional side of journalism activities in the Province of Quebec, and I am sure he can add very usefully to the observations that I may make myself.

I am thinking of one newspaper which appears on a weekly basis in the city in which I live. This paper is a great success financially. From a professional point of view it means very little. It operates on the basis of the services offered by "stringers." These are men who generally work with a daily newspaper and enjoy favourable conditions of work, pay and other benefits because they are unionized.

Then they go and work on Saturdays for this paper at conditions which are cheaper than the ones they insist upon getting when they deal with us in our capacity as regular employers.

Well, I think this is the kind of competition that is throat-cutting.

You have no regulations in this particular field. These journalists cannot be unionized a second time in their capacity as part-time workers.

Senator Beaubien: The union does not forbid it.

Mr. Ryan: No. I know the union has been discussing this matter, but they have not been able to arrive at any conclusions because these men are also members of the union, and some of them would certainly object to stringent measures being contemplated by the union.

Well, it is a difficult situation. I don't think that intellectually they add up to very much on the whole.

I am not speaking about a leading newspaper like "La Presse" in Montreal. I think "La Presse" has been striving not only to maintain but to improve its professional standards.

But you probably read—you must have read "Le Devoir" if you were to see this. But they are now talking about inciting their journalists aged fifty-five years to go into retirement at that early age. That apparently was negotiated by the union.

I am not informed of all the details of this matter, but I enquired when this was brought to my attention about whether these journalists would accept to go into retirement at more favourable conditions than they would have got at sixty-five, if they were going to be replaced. Because that was the crux of the matter.

They were not going to be replaced. And the union had settled for 15 or 20 jobs less than they had before. I wonder if it is a good deal.

But it is part of the predominance of the economic aspect of the operation. They must have felt they have got to get rid of so much per cent of their personnel at any cost, and they hit upon those who have the weakest defence, the fifty-five-year-old members of the staff.

I think this is absolutely unacceptable from a social point of view. But we would not do that in an organization like ours. You could not do it in the government, whatever the Prime Minister may say in this respect. It would be a far more difficult practice. And I think from a human point of view it is unacceptable.

Senator Beaubien: What would they get if they retired at fifty-five? Qu'est-ce qu'ils auraient comme pension? [What pension would they get?]

Mr. Ryan: I don't have all the details. It is bound to vary with the number of years of service that each one has at his credit.

Senator Smith: Mr. Ryan, could I enquire from you why it is that... I understand the newspapers in France and the newspapers (I know yours is one for sure) have signed editorials. Why is that done? Is that connected up to freedom of the press, that the editor has the right and the responsibility of taking whatever line he wants to take in expressing himself?

Mr. Ryan: I think there are two great schools of journalism, each one of which is perfectly valid and has its own advantages and inconveniences.

The English school relies upon unsigned editorials.

I would be a stupid person if I were going to maintain here that "The Economist" for instance is a cheap publication. It never carries a signed article. It happens about once every ten years when an editor retires. "The Economist" is a publication for which I have great respect, which I read with great profit week after week. It is not signed.

The two "Times" do not carry signed editorials. I think they are very good. "The Globe and Mail" is a paper for which I have great respect editorially speaking. Their editorials are not signed.

This policy offers the advantage of presenting to the public a point of view worked out by a team, not only by a single individual. It is the point of view of "The Globe and Mail" that goes into print. If that publisher has too much direct authority over the editorial content, it may be the point of view of the publisher and put into writing by two or three slaves at his immediate disposal.

But supposing normal circumstances I think you can have the point of view of a team presented in the form of unsigned editorials published under the responsibility of this or that newspaper.

I have great respect for this formula. I think it applies perhaps best to the English temperament.

Senator Smith: Yes.

Mr. Ryan: But it could apply with equal profit to some newspapers published in France and the Province of Quebec.

Some papers have adopted the practice of carrying signed editorials. If you are to have signed editorials you have got to have people who can afford to sign articles day after day during a respectable length of time. And this is awfully difficult. Awfully difficult.

And furthermore this practice tends to encourage individualism. It tends to carry individualism to certain extreme forms which may not be ideal. But, on the other hand, it offers some individuals a unique opportunity of presenting their point of view to the public day after day, week after week, year after year; of getting acquainted with their public; of giving their public a chance to know them also.

It establishes a live conversation, a continuing conversation between the public and the authors of those articles. It makes for a more genuine atmosphere of communication, conversation, exchange, than the other formula.

But I would not suggest that it can be generalized. I would suggest that the first condition is that you have people who can carry this role long enough.

I had not thought it was so difficult before I joined "Le Devoir." When Mr. Filion invited me to join "Le Devoir" back in 1961 I was assured that I would have the most comfortable life that I had ever had. I was assured that writing three or four pieces a week would be a very easy job for me and I could afford lots of time for radio, television, appearances, speeches in different parts of the country.

Of this I have had my share since I joined "Le Devoir." But I can assure you you have to work terrifically hard in order to keep pace with the expectations of the kind of intellectually developing public and politically more and more conscious public that we have in the Province of Quebec.

So the two methods are founded on a long and respectable tradition. Each has its advantages. Each has its limitations. And, if I were asked to opt between the two, I would be thankful to God for having had the chance to experience the first one; but I would not say no to a chance with the second one.

Senator Smith: Mr. Ryan, you made some interesting remarks about the French service provided by Canadian Press.

We have had Canadian Press here already. It was a very interesting discussion. I do take it that there is almost a two-solitudes situation in the Province of Quebec; in other words, a gap between the English availability of news in a form it can be published and the availability of that same news but in a French version.

Has this weakness developed because of a translation service only of English-written stories, in which case of course we would assume that there is no re-write by a thoroughly French-speaking person of the story concerned? What is the weakness there, would you say?

Mr. Ryan: Well, I think the basic weakness is one of personnel and resources.

Senator Smith: Resources.

Mr. Ryan: If they could apply to the job of presenting the French news in the spirit in which it occurs to the Canadian public in general—if they could apply to this job the same resources that they apply to covering the English-Canadian scene and presenting it to the English-Canadian public, I believe there would be no problem of major importance.

But as of now the resources that are available for the first job are much greater than those that are available for the second job.

We have a problem. We belong to C.P. for instance. We have belonged to C.P. since 1910, by the way. And I am at present a member of the Board of Directors of Canadian Press. I don't want to play the role of a traitor here tonight! These are problems we have discussed time and again at meetings of the Board of Directors.

We even had a Committee which studied this matter in depth for the second or third time about a couple of years ago. And the Committee arrived at the conclusion that we must have one more man in Quebec, one more man in Ottawa, and perhaps a part-time correspondent somewhere around Paris—part-time. I insist upon this.

That was no solution to the problem when C.P. has 12 or 13 men covering the parliamentary scene.

Even if you have three French-speaking correspondents instead of two, it does not change much. And what happens is that the limited number of French correspondents must be extremely selective in the material which they decide to write daily.

But then we look at the much more abundant material that comes to us on the English wires of C.P. and most of the time we have got to develop our own original piece out of this much more elaborate material which comes in as a rule earlier than the other.

Senator Smith: Yes.

Senator Beaubien: Mr. Ryan, there has been quite an improvement, though, has there not, really, in the last five or six years?

Mr. Ryan: There has been an improvement, but I would not like you to be led into complacency in this respect.

Senator Beaubien: No, no, but it has been though?

Senator Prowse: There is still room for more.

Senator Smith: I just have one final question—for now, anyway. I would be very interested in Mr. Ryan's views, because he probably reads a lot of other newspapers and a lot of English language newspapers.

What is your opinion of the kind of reporting of the Quebec news which we read in our English-speaking dailies? Do you think that Quebec events are reported as fairly as they should be, without exaggeration, in the kind of style that I know you yourself would approve?

Have you views on it you would like to express?

Mr. Ryan: There are two aspects to this problem which I must treat separately. You could also ask me about the Quebec coverage of the overall Canadian scene. I think this is a complementary question that goes with the first one.

Senator Smith: That is right. I agree.

Mr. Ryan: Regarding the first question, I think one must make a distinction between the Toronto daily newspapers and the other newspapers of the country. I think the Toronto papers have been doing on the whole an excellent job in the last few years. I think they have applied great resources to the study in dept of the situation in Quebec.

I do not claim that they have always arrived at the kind of understanding and approach that I would have liked to see in those papers, because it might have been a little too close to our own approach, you know. But from a professional point of view I must recognize that they did a very respectable job, and are still doing a very good job.

This was made possible because they had, both in Quebec and Montreal, men working on a full time basis with an insight into the problems of Quebec and being in a position to see from a very, very close angle the reactions of the people and the kind of things that were developing.

So they may have stressed this or that particular event too much and this or that particular occasion. I don't know of many newspapers which have not sinned time and again in this respect. This is the kind of thing for which we have to give pardon day after day. But on the whole I must say they did a fine job.

I do not think that many other papers of Canada have gone into the trouble of sending members of their staff on the spot. They have relied on articles written by staff members of the Canadian Press or on articles written by correspondents for this or that particular chain.

I am thinking of very well known correspondents who enjoy a national reputation. They never come to Quebec for serious journalistic work, you know. They speak on the national networks time and again. But their contact with the Quebec scene are extremely limited. They speak exclusively from the kind of vision they can get in Ottawa, which is not sufficient. Even reading "Le Devoir" from Ottawa is far from sufficient.

But I would make an exception of the three Toronto daily newspapers. And these three papers have been competing with one another in this respect in a remarkable way. And we have enjoyed a cordial and friendly relationship with each one of the three.

We have collaborated with them on several occasions. And there is a very frequent exchange of information and impressions between them and ourselves which is profitable to the two sides, I believe.

But the rest of the daily press of the country remains more cut off from the real scene.

The Chairman: Would the rest of the papers in the country—I am sure they would argue, but would there be any legitimacy in the argument that this is because of a cost factor, that it would cost them a great deal of money to cover Quebec?

Mr. Ryan: They would certainly invoke this argument.

The Chairman: Yes, of course. I am wondering, with legitimacy?

Mr. Ryan: But, you see, a newspaper which really wants to dig some stuff out of any place in the world can find all sorts of means to arrive at this objective.

We had two or three pieces interpreting the electoral result in British Columbia last summer, for instance. Two of them were written by academics from British Columbia who gave us a very interesting—two different interpretations of what had happened.

We had another piece by a leading historian of Toronto, who writes a regular column in our newspaper, at our invitation. And I think we presented a fair interpretation of what went on there.

We discussed, Mr. Roy and myself, the possibility of his going to B.C. at the time to cover the election. And we came within a hair of having our man there. It is because we had a lot of other things happening at the same time that we had to give up on this project. But we had made our decision to go.

So I would not accept this argument in whole, you know. I would accept it in part, but in whole I don't think...

The Chairman: It could be a benefit.

Senator Smith: Well, thank you very much for your very straight answers.

The Chairman: You were going to deal with the second part.

Mr. Ryan: There was a second question which I raised myself.

Senator Smith: Oh, yes, the other side. I would like to hear that too.

Mr. Ryan: I think the French press of Quebec has not been doing all that they could have done in order to interpret to their own public the developments and opinions of the other part of Canada.

On the whole I think French language daily newspapers in Quebec have covered some electoral campaigns—Trudeau, for instance, got a fair coverage all over the country from several dailies in the Province of Quebec last year from his electoral campaign. And so did Stanfield.

I think we started this in the previous campaign, you remember, when we began sending correspondents to Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Western Ontario, the Prairies, and even British Columbia.

We had decided that we would stop covering the campaign through the material that came in via the wires. We decided to send men—and a woman that we had at that time on the staff—on the spot. And they did an excellent job.

And I think the practice has now settled in French language dailies that they must have men on the spot when a national electoral campaign is on.

But if we except this particular occurrence I think, the coverage of the Canadian scene has left much to be desired.

Not a single French language paper has a full time representative in Toronto, for instance, except for advertising, revenue-raising purposes.

There they have the practical instinct that is required; but for news-gathering none has thought it might be advisable to have a full time correspondent in Toronto.

We have had all over the years academics, journalists, responsible people, who accepted to write pieces upon invitation from us. This has been going on all the time. And it has increased considerably in the last few years. But we just do not have the money to have a full time man west of Ottawa.

The Chairman: If my memory serves me correctly, you spoke in Toronto either in February or March at the National Newspaper Awards dinner and you made this very point. I am wondering if there has been any change. That is now eight or nine months. Has there been any change in the situation?

Mr. Ryan: No, not to my knowledge.

The Chairman: None at all?

Mr. Ryan: No.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Ryan, I wonder if you could explain the corporate structure of your newspaper to us in a little more detail? I heard you read the first page of your brief, and I still have some questions on my mind. Could you please endeavour to enlighten us on this point?

Mr. Ryan: Mr. Chairman, Mr. Fortier is going to force me to confess publicly a sin of omission for which I would never be forgiven where I come from.

Le Devoir was incorporated many years ago under the federal Companies Act, and even though our convictions would have prompted us to have the incorporation transferred to Quebec provincial authority, we have not found time in the last ten years or so to make the change—which shows that it is probably not our first priority.

Senator Beaubien: It has not yet been done?

Mr. Ryan: No. Having said that Le Devoir is incorporated, I shall leave some papers for you—I knew the legal adviser would ask that question—and I shall leave you the letters patent and the by-laws.

In any case, I am now going to explain the legal structure briefly.

We are incorporated under the federal Companies Act, not as a non-profit making concern, but as an ordinary business. There are also two trust deeds attached to the company charter that ensure the special structure and the non-profit character of the newspaper. These two trust deeds consisted of transfers of shares that had belonged, during the early days, to the founding editor of the paper, Henri Bourassa, and which were to be passed on to his successor, and to his successors.

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Ryan: Now, the deeds provide that a majority of the total shares outstanding and authorized, even if not issued, be controlled by a board of trustees consisting of three members, which is associated with the board of directors. We have approximately 800 ordinary shareholders—800 shareholders.

Mr. Fortier: Could we be told who the shareholders are?

Senator Beaubien: Are there still eight-hundred?

Mr. Ryan: Yes, 800—because they cannot buy each other out. Whenever there is a change of publisher, Mr. Chairman, there are a number who would like to sell their holdings, but as we cannot buy shares ourselves, we do not always find the necessary buyers easily because they are afraid the yield will not be satisfactory; in fact, we have paid dividends only twice in sixty years—this was under the present management, but the reasons were quite independent of the administrative abilities of the editor.

Mr. Fortier: What did it depend on?

Mr. Ryan: There had been a strike at one of our major competitors, which brought money flowing in to us like water and taught us something we did not know: that it is very easy, when there is no competition—as is the case with The Globe and Mail in Toronto—to just let the money roll in. When you have five papers cutting each other's throats all the year round—well, it is more difficult. There are five of us putting out morning papers in Montreal; this is a point to remember.

So, to return to the question—we have 800 shareholders who hold, let us say, 40 per cent of all outstanding shares. The other shares are in the hands of two groups of trustees, both composed of the same people; they hold at least 60 per cent of the shares at present. These three trustees join with the members of the board of directors to appoint a publisher; when the publisher is appointed, he is automatically authorized to vote his shares at any ordinary or special meeting of the shareholders, which means that he chooses his own board of directors. He makes the decisions himself at the general meeting, doing his best to leave the shareholders with the impression that it is they who make the decisions—and that is how the organization functions; he cannot be removed during his term of office.

In the case of the previous publishers—there have been three of them—they were appointed for life, that is, with no time limit. In the case of the present publisher, however, a 10-year time limit was set, since they did not want him to become an encumbrance for the paper when he had ceased to perform at his best and, secondly, they wanted to give him time enough to get through the terms of office of at least two political régimes.

Mr. Fortier: Were you expecting two political régimes?

Mr. Ryan: But throughout this period, of course, the publisher enjoys a very broad freedom. He does not have the right to use his shares for personal purposes; he does not have the right to pass them on to his heirs; he does not have the right to sell them personally if he resigns.

Mr. Fortier: Even if he was able to find a buyer?

Mr. Ryan: No; that is, they are held in trust by the board of trustees; thus, he does not hold them in a physical sense.

Mr. Fortier: No.

Mr. Ryan: Consequently, he cannot dispose of them through the market, even if he should wish to.

What I was about to add is that while he does have these powers, he cannot behave in an arbitrary manner in running a business that is still financially weak; he needs a very strong board of directors, capable of taking some responsibility should the financial position become more difficult, but which has absolutely nothing to do with the editorial side of the newspaper's activities. The written content of the paper is under the complete authority of the publisher who may share his authority with assistants—even with the union, if he thinks it necessary. There is a real sharing of responsibility in our organization; it is not as complete as everyone would like, but in any case, we are looking into that aspect. As for the board of directors, we have a fairly strong board made up of representatives of institutions whose outlook is much like that of Le Devoir. For example, the president of the Société des Artisans Canadiens Français; The president of Laurentian Life Insurance; the General Manager of the Fédération des Caisses populaires Desjardins; the General Manager of another French-Canadian general insurance group; these financial institutions have something of a community character, and if our position became difficult, they could come to our assistance; but we are not dependent on them in any way, even financially.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Ryan, mention has already been made of communications media, both written and electronic, that belong to the Establishment. After hearing you speak of the people who sit on your board of directors, I cannot help asking you whether this would be an appropriate question: are the people on Le Devoir's board of directors not members of the French-Canadian Establishment?

Mr. Ryan: That's a good question, indeed, and I have to reply in the affirmative, to some extent. If it is felt that the General Manager of the Fédération des Caisses populaires is a member of the French-Canadian Establishment, I am very proud to have him with us, since I consider that he contributes, both personally and through the activities of the movement to which he belongs, to the democratization of the economy; I am very happy to have him with us.

The president of the Société des Artisans heads an enterprise that is co-operative, rather than capitalist, in nature. As a result, he is obviously right at home with us. We also have an officer of an insurance company that is strictly capitalistic—we are not anti-capitalists, we believe there is room for private enterprise. We have one of the senior officers of the largest French-Canadian general life-insurance company—the Commerce group from St. Hyacinthe—and we are very glad to have him. We also have the treasurer of the Catholic Farmers' Union, another very important movement that covers the whole province. We had Mr. Jean Marchand for a few years, until he went into politics, and we were very pleased to have him, too.

I think this might truthfully be called an establishment, but the term would have a completely different meaning from the one it has when applied to the Bay or St. James Street establishments, or persons who have their offices on St. James Street; even if these people did, it would mean nothing.

I don't know whether that is where you have your own office, Mr. Fortier?

Senator Beaubien: It's bigger than that.

Mr. Ryan: Yes, it's bigger than that, I know.

Mr. Fortier: But are you faced with any particular problem today, where Le Devoir is concerned, as regards death duties payable in the event of the death of one of the beneficiaries you just mentioned?

Mr. Ryan: I can tell you that we have never looked into that question, because if one of the trustees, directors or officers dies or disappears, I think that what is left to those who remain is more likely to be a mortgage than anything else.

Mr. Fortier: You are speaking mainly of the beneficiaries, of course—the beneficiaries of these trusts?

Mr. Ryan: No; if there are any surpluses, they have to go to press or charitable undertakings.

Mr. Fortier: Oh.

Mr. Ryan: That is, non-profit press or charitable undertakings.

Mr. Fortier: Because there are a number of small ones, relatively speaking?

Mr. Ryan: The only people who can receive profits from Le Devoir are the shareholders of whom I just spoke—the ordinary shareholders, those in the 40-per-cent group. Frankly, where they are concerned, we are embarrassed at not having been able to pay them dividends more often; we are convinced that they should be given one. We have some loans on which we pay 6, 6½ or 6½ per cent—that is, we were able to borrow at low rates—the loans were made by companies friendly to us, among those I mentioned just now, and we are therefore at an advantage; I say to myself: if we could pay 6 per cent interest on the money we borrow from Les Artisans, I do not see why the same rate should not be paid on the money invested by an ordinary citizen with much smaller resources. But apart from that, the entire portion that is under the control of the trustees, if dividends or profits arise...

Senator Beaubien: The 60-per-cent group?

Mr. Ryan: Yes. If profits or dividends arise, they have to go to charitable or press undertakings.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Ryan, do these 800 shareholders represent a cross-section of the population of Quebec or rather, I should say, of Montreal?

Mr. Ryan: Not of the entire population of Quebec to be frank with you, I made a study of the composition of the shareholder groups about two or three years ago, and there have not been many changes since. In the main, they represent what I would call the French-Canadian middle class: a lot of civil servants, teachers and professional people; a good many clergymen, too. In the beginning, in the early years of Le Devoir's existence, the first 25 years, the newspaper received wholehearted support from the clergy: many bought shares during those years and have kept them, and some have died and passed them on to other priests, who still hold them. Many are minor, anonymous nationalists, members of various societies—a small co-operative, a caisse populaire—who heard about Le Devoir at some time or other and bought one, two or three shares; the average number of shares held by each shareholder was about two.

Mr. Fortier: Does the St. Jean Baptiste Society hold any?

Mr. Ryan: You know, I think they have one or two. Mr. Kierans bought ten—in his good years.

Mr. Fortier: Did he keep them?

Mr. Ryan: He didn't dare ask to have them redeemed—I think he would let them go, too; as for us, we did not dare ask him to let us have them back.

Senator Beaubien: Is there a market for them, Mr. Ryan?

Mr. Ryan: No, there is no market for them. We want to create one, because there are people who took shares in a moment of enthusiasm, but this has not happened for the last few years; Mr. Kierans took some, but not because he was carried away; he could afford to—it did not present any risk for him.

But once there were people who bought 10 or 15 shares because they wanted to encourage the development of nationalism and patriotism, of Christian or trade-union values, or what have you. After that, they get to the point where they wish to marry, or buy a house, and then they would like to get back the price of the shares; they think this can be done as easily as drawing money out of the bank. However, it is often necessary to wait, and on occasion we have been responsible for delayed marriages. But the stories about our shares have become a part of folklore, Mr. Senator, nothing else. Consequently, there is no real market; that is the only kind of money that comes after our shares.

Mr. Fortier: Is Le Devoir financed partly out of subscriptions and partly out of advertising revenue?

Mr. Ryan: I believe that I have brought statements for the last financial year—I will leave a copy with you.

Mr. Fortier: You may table it.

Mr. Ryan: Very well, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Fortier: Could you summarize it for us briefly?

Mr. Ryan: Yes, I'll give you a brief resumé, of course don't worry, I am not going to read to you all the financial statements.

During the 1968 fiscal year, our newspaper's revenues amounted to approximately 2 million; sales of the paper contributed $919,000, or about 45 or 46 per cent. Sales of advertising brought in $1,115,000, or roughly 54 or 55 per cent, and various other items such as microfilms, copies of an index we are selling of all the articles that have appeared in Le Devoir, earned income of $12,000. That was the entire revenue for last financial year.

The ratios would be much the same for the current year. For the current year—last year—if you are interested, we declared a loss of $22,490.

Senator Beaubien: Was there much depreciation?

Mr. Ryan: No, depreciation was an item not included when we spoke of operating losses. We did have a sizable loss under the heading of depreciation the year before, but that was because we closed our workshop; the loss there was $150,000. However, last year's operating loss of $22,000 was primarily attributable to the fact that we completely changed our production method: the paper was completely printed and shipped by an outside firm. It was a period of adjustment—we had to pay fairly high termination allowances to employees whom we had to lay off as a result of the administrative re-organization of which I spoke. Consequently, it was a year in which we lost money. This year, we don't know yet how we fared.

Senator Beaubien: Was that in 1969 or in 1968?

Mr. Ryan: In 1968; what I just gave you was 1968. In 1969, Mr. Chairman, we had completely re-organized and rid ourselves of a bunch of problems; I believe we would have had a considerable surplus, meaning on the order of, say, 4 per cent of the turnover; however, all that will be eaten up this year by the losses which I mentioned earlier, so we are right back where we started. But that may be one of the characteristics of this paper: providence never intended it to become rich or well off; when it took steps to do so, the government saw that it was brought back to the familiar paths of austerity.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you, Mr. Ryan; we shall be able to examine them in detail.

A moment ago, you spoke of the competition you have met in Montreal from other morning papers. Could I ask you this: who is your top competitor? Is it another paper, or is it radio, or is it television?

Mr. Ryan: No, I believe that our immediate competitors are the other morning papers. Where advertising is concerned, we find radio and television to be tough competitors that take away revenue in which we would normally share, but this is not the major problem. We have in Montreal—I mentioned earlier that we have five daily newspapers, but I should have said four: one English-language paper and three French. The Gazette has many French-Canadian readers, some of whom also read Le Devoir; some people read two morning papers, not just one; some prefer The Gazette to Le Devoir because they find better financial information, among other things. That is one of the main reasons why many French-Canadians stick to The Gazette. We also publish financial news in Le Devoir but it is rather limited because we have only one man to cover that section, whereas the Gazette can assign, I am not sure of the number, but perhaps as many as three.

The other two French-language dailies give us tough competition as well but they do not reach exactly the same public; however, the fight goes on for the public that lies between the two; they want to expand their readership by winning over part of Le Devoir's, and we try to do the same by attracting some of their readers. We are at a disadvantage there, because both these papers have ample funds to spend on television and radio advertising. Both are engaged in very costly publicity campaigns, whereas we have no money for this purpose: we did not make a single broadcast, or even a spot announcement during 1969, because we simply could not afford it. Consequently, ours is a paper without marketing power, because its only selling job is done by the "whispering power" of those who read it and are satisfied.

Mr. Fortier: During the last 10 years, has your circulation increased considerably, or has it remained stable?

Mr. Ryan: Some ten years ago, it was about 36 or 37,000. At present, it is just a bit above 40,000; at one time it went up to 42 or 43,000, but it has fallen off now, particularly owing to the factors of which I spoke earlier.

Mr. Fortier: In order to remain, or rather, in order to become economically healthy, what circulation would you like to have?

Mr. Ryan: Well, among ourselves we say that we should have at least 60,000.

Senator Beaubien: 60,000?

Mr. Ryan: Yes, 60,000. Now then, I do not claim that we would be perfectly healthy at 60,000; we would have to put out a much more complete paper than we do today, and costs would be higher, but I believe that we would be better situated from all points of view: advertising revenue would be higher, as would income from circulation; we would have a greater variety of resources; I believe that would make a big difference.

Mr. Fortier: If your paper were to receive an anonymous gift tomorrow of, say, $1 million, what would you do to improve your paper?

Mr. Ryan: I would not make the decision alone whether to accept that gift, Mr. Fortier, because I have had a theory ever since I came to Le Devoir: it is that the money which makes us happy is that which comes from our work, provided our work is not hindered in any inhuman manner, or abused by the public authorities or by competitors.

Mr. Fortier: Or, supposing you earned a million?

Mr. Ryan: Well, I believe that I would invest a large part of it; I am going to be frank with you: at our paper, we have only two editors for the sports pages; if you take into account leaves, absences for vacations, and so on, that means we have only one editor for close to half the year, whereas it would take at least three or four to do a reasonably decent job.

We have had only one man in the financial section in more than 20 years; we should have at least two.

In the general news section, we have some ten full-time journalists at present, but we ought to have at least fifteen. Whereas we have always had just one correspondent in Quebec, we now have two: we decided to add a second, this fall, because it was absolutely impossible for one person to keep up. We have always kept one man in Ottawa; for the last couple of months we have had none, but we will have one again, soon; we are unable to put two men here, although the needs would justify assigning two correspondents for Le Devoir to Ottawa.

Therefore, we would begin by improving that situation, because the thing which has kept Le Devoir going until now, and which should be developed in the future, is the quality of its services. But at the same time, the number of pages would have to be increased. Each page which we publish every day costs somewhere between $125. and $150 in direct costs. And so, using that money, I would go ahead and add another two pages to the space we now fill in an attempt to improve the business; we would need to try a bit of advertising as well because two years ago, when we had a month-long but very modest publicity campaign on radio and television, we noticed that it brought us several hundred new subscribers who telephoned directly to the paper—these were people who had heard our advertisement the previous night giving them the telephone number that they could call; they phoned the paper and our incoming lines were very busy in the weeks during and after that publicity campaign.

Mr. Fortier: Would you also send correspondents to other parts of the world?

Mr. Ryan: Yes, I would. Let me tell you what happens: we have a lady correspondent in Paris who is quite a remarkable person, but we have made inhuman demands on her during the last few weeks; she wrote me just yesterday and said, "I notice that working for you does not pay too well". She went to report on events in Ireland, and her accounts were the best published in the entire Canadian press. She also covered the conventions of both British political parties—Labour and Conservative—and turned in excellent reports.

Mr. Fortier: Does she speak both languages?

Mr. Ryan: Oh yes; then, she wanted to go to Lebanon during the crisis there, but we had a first-rate man who gave us a series of articles—again, the best published in Canada on Lebanon. I told him: "This time, you must cover the Israel side—you will give me much information from the Arab world, but it is time we reviewed the situation in Israel, which we have not looked into for years". He wrote back and expressed enthusiasm, but said that he would require a budget of between $1,000 and $1,500 in order to carry out the project. If I had the money, we would hire this man on a permanent basis to cover Western Europe or, when needed, the Mediterranean area; he is a tremendous fellow.

It would also be a great advantage, as I mentioned earlier, to have someone permanently west of Ottawa. I would not tie him down exclusively in Toronto, but I would have a correspondent west of Ottawa with a certain amount of freedom to move about. There should also be more frequent trips into the Maritimes. These are all things in which we are immensely interested, and for which we do not always have the necessary funds.

There is one thing that I should add with respect to the gift; the idea intrigued me, but I am going to describe the policy I have followed for some years. If often happens that readers write me as a result of an article, a position taken by the paper, or something they have heard, and later they may send us a cheque for perhaps $100, $200, or $500, to be used for the purposes of Le Devoir. For at least five years, I have returned all such gifts to the donors. I point out that there are still a few shares available if they would like to buy an interest in Le Devoir, and that this would entitle them to receive financial statements and attend general meetings. But there are donors, as you may know, who give you $100 and imagine that they have acquired every conceivable right; from then on, they will send you all sorts of texts for publication in the paper, and rake you over the coals at public meetings, claiming that they have supported Le Devoir for 25 years—a hundred dollars doesn't pay for that.

Senator Beaubien: His cheque will not be accepted?

Mr. Ryan: No.

The Chairman: Could I turn for a moment or two to some of the comments you made concentration in the course of your remarks? There is one thing I was interested in, something that I don't think you said. You may have and I may have missed it in the translation. And I want to ask you something more specifically about something you certainly did say.

First of all, you listed some reasons for concentration and then you listed some of the negatives.

One of the reasons sometimes advanced for concentration, particularly in Quebec—and, if you did list it, then I missed it and, if you didn't list it, the question then becomes "Is it important?"—the argument is sometimes advanced that only through a concentration of press is there a guarantee of a continuation or a guarantee of a French culture in Quebec.

Have you heard that reason advanced?

Mr. Ryan: Oh, yes.

The Chairman: Is it valid?

Mr. Ryan: There is a problem of continuity. I think one of the members of your Committee was for a long time owner of an important network of information services in one area of the Province of Quebec.

The Chairman: Senator Desruisseaux. He is not a member of the Committee.

Mr. Ryan: Oh, he is not?

The Chairman: No.

Mr. Ryan: I thought I had seen his name on the letterhead.

The Chairman: He was a member of the Committee but he is not a member of the Committee now.

Mr. Ryan: I see. He is a good friend of mine. I would expect him to be here tonight.

The Chairman: He is a good friend of us all.

Mr. Ryan: When he decided he no longer had the energy to continue as publisher of "La Tribune" he began to look around, and found nobody to take over. So he had to look for someone who would buy the assets of his company.

In this case he had no successor in his family; and he had none that he was willing to give the responsibility to in the Sherbrooke area. So he sold out to—I think it was the Power Corporation.

What would have happened if Power had not been there?

Well, there are a lot of suppositions that one can make here. Perhaps there would have been some people in the Sherbrooke area who would have been interested in buying this enterprise if it could have been available at a somewhat smaller price than was offered by Power Corporation with its vast resources.

Senator Beaubien: It was seven million.

Mr. Ryan: I know—considerable.

But I think no complete explorations were made of the possibility of putting to use the resources of the community. Explorations must certainly have been made by the Senator individually, but I am sure that not many elements were invited to join him in the search for a community-based solution.

I think this is the first approach that should be explored. I think the newspaper as a property of public interest—I don't say "governmental property" but "property of public interest"—should first be rooted in the community which it claims to serve. And to all the extent it is possible, the community should be given the opportunity of sharing in the ownership and leadership of the organization.

I do not go along with this argument that, if Power Corporation had not been around the French-Canadian culture insofar as daily newspapers are concerned would have been doomed. If this is the question which you put to me, my answer is a blunt "No."

If you ask me whether the fact that Power Corporation became involved might not be a positive factor in developing the newspaper, in contributing to its prosperity and greater influence, here I am brought back to the pros and cons which were suggested in my presentation.

I think there are some pros and cons. The pros are important. They must be weighed very seriously. But I think to the extent that a solution can be found in the community itself it is highly preferable.

The Chairman: Then may I ask you about one of your cons, which was the second part of my question?

You said the proprietors of the newspaper chain sometimes advance the argument that there is editorial freedom within the chain. And you described it, and I wrote it down as "a certain guarded freedom."

What exactly do you mean by "a certain guarded freedom"? Was that the correct translation?

Mr. Ryan: Oh, yes.

The Chairman: What does "a certain guarded freedom" mean? What do you mean by that, Mr. Ryan?

Mr. Ryan: The French expression which I used to describe this was "un enclos." I don't know how I would put this in English.

Senator Beaubien: "Enclave"?

Mr. Ryan: Not exactly, Senator, not exactly.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Limitation?

Senator Smith: "Restricted"—"enclosed"?

Mr. Fortier: A strait jacket.

The Chairman: "A certain guarded freedom."

Mr. Ryan: That is it. That is the interpretation for a while.

Now, let us place ourselves in the position of my good friend Paul Desmarais. He wants to appoint a man as publisher and editor of "La Presse". Is he foolish enough to appoint a man who holds views which are fundamentally opposed to his own views? Can you think a man like Mr. Desmarais would not be more intelligent than that?

He would naturally look for a man with whom he has a certain affinity.

Senator Everett: Would that not be true of any publisher, though?

Senator Beaubien: Oh, yes; he means that.

Mr. Ryan: Of course. But I say, if you have a greater diversity in the ownership of newspapers the chances are greater that different points of view and the different ways of seeing reality would be presented to the public.

And I say ultimately in a chain like the one at the top of which Mr. Desmarais sits the probability is that in this, that and the other particular newspaper belonging to the chain there is going to be a certain streamlined pattern emerging with time. And the publisher is not stupid enough to come out and contradict the head of the corporation every week.

I was told about a fact that occurred not later than a couple of weeks ago in that particular empire. A person whom I know had been invited to substitute for a man in a key position in one of those newspapers. And she wrote articles in an entirely different vein than the man she was substituting for. And letters began to pour in approving that person for the vigorous stuff which he or she (I will not specify) was injecting into the columns of the newspaper.

Well, he, or she, got a strong invitation not to continue publishing these letters because it might create a hell of a problem when the old man returned to his desk.

So this is the kind of situation that is bound to develop inevitably sooner or later even with the best of intentions.

I am not hinting for one moment that either Mr. Desmarais or Mr. Péladeau has wicked intentions regarding the suppression of one ounce of liberty that may be given to the publisher of this or that particular newspaper. But I am familiar enough with human reality to know that the phenomenon of permeation, intellectual permeation, is a very strong factor when it comes to determining the climate of this or that organization.

And it may be necessary that we move in this direction to a certain extent. And I am willing to accept it to a certain extent. But I am wondering where the limit is going to be, if we are not going to fall under the intellectual leadership of this or that individual, for whom I may have a great admiration, but not on intellectual grounds.

The Chairman: To your knowledge, have the big chains in English Canada, the Thomson papers, Southam and so on, ever owned papers in Quebec; that is, French papers in Quebec?

Mr. Ryan: No, not to my knowledge. Thomson Newspapers own one or two English language dailies published in the Province of Quebec. I think they bought "The Record" and perhaps "The Chronicle." I am not sure.

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Ryan: They did?

No, I don't think there ever was any serious negotiation concerning the transfer of control of French language papers into that organization.

Southam Newspapers once discussed the possibility of buying control of a specialized business newspaper published on a weekly basis. This never came through. But they never showed an active interest in a daily newspaper.

The Chairman: I think Senator Everett wanted to ask some questions, Mr. Fortier.

Senator Everett: Mr. Ryan, you, I think, said that in the case of the Sherbrooke interests the community should have had an opportunity to participate in the purchase of those interests before the sale was made to Power Corporation.

It has been indicated to us by the owners of individual newspapers that in almost every case the chain—that is, Thomson-Southam-Power-Desmarais—can pay considerably more, or will pay considerably more than an individual purchaser would choose to pay, or would be able to pay.

I would be interested to know how you feel this community participation could take place under those circumstances.

Mr. Ryan: Here you raise a problem which is extremely vexing and to which I have no solution—and for which I do not envy the position in which you place yourselves for accepting to become members of this Committee.

There would have to be—I will come to your question right after this—this is true; the big corporations, the chains, are far better placed to offer better prices than individuals or community-based organizations in any area of Canada except the large metropolitan centres.

Here the two recourses that may be thought of are: first, the possibility of obliging the owner of a newspaper based in one particular area to first explore the prospects of transferring control of the newspaper to community-based interests provided he gets a reasonable price for the investment that he made over the years, and that this might override proposals coming from other sources.

Two, there might have to be a more stringent interpretation of the law of monopolies forbidding a given corporation to control more than so many newspapers in so many areas or cities.

I don't know. There would have to be limitations on either side. Otherwise the phenomena which you evoke would continue to grow to the point that no competition will become possible except between the big three or four that we will have in Canada that will preserve a semblance of competition—which it will not be in fact.

How should community participation in ownership of papers be possible?

I think this should start long before there is a question of selling the control of a newspaper to outside interests. I think it should be a natural inclination on the part of those who own or control newspapers in today's society to share the responsibility for ownership and management a little more than they have been inclined to do in the past.

I think if we started there, if we began to interest, to involve local people and organizations in the life of a newspaper or a broadcasting station, it would be far easier to find prospective buyers whenever the time came for a transfer of control, or a possibility.

I don't think this can be improvised overnight. But I know we have some people of great influence serving on our Board of Directors. I am sure that most of them, if they had been invited to sit on boards of directors of other papers, would have been equally interested, because they are not narrow-minded to the point that they would have an interest only in the least remunerative of the newspapers that are being published, you know. They would be interested in participating in the life of other papers too.

Senator Everett: That is, directors?

Mr. Ryan: Such a thing as directors—shareholders.

Senator Beaubien: Would they put up money, do you think? Would they invest?

Mr. Ryan: Some could, you know. Some could. Because some of these papers have been very prosperous ventures for a long while.

But this was part of the French-Canadian tradition. They did not want—And I can say to a great extent the English-Canadian tradition—this particular field which we are discussing. The family, or the individual that owned the newspaper or the broadcasting station would have nothing to do with outsiders who were alien because, you know, he wanted to keep all these things to himself, with the result that, when he became incapacitated for one reason or another, the whole direction was bound to be changed, with greater embarrassment and detriment being caused to the community in several cases.

Senator Everett: Mr. Ryan, in talking about (if I understood you correctly) the postal rate problem that you face, and in the public loans for (I think you said) co-operative printing. . . Was that correct?

Mr. Ryan: Yes.

Senator Everett: It seems to me that you are talking about some form of government subsidy.

Mr. Ryan: Of course.

Senator Everett: To help the continuing operation of a newspaper?

Mr. Ryan: I know. I know.

If the public is to be involved in saving newspapers from going under, is there then an upper limit as to the amount of money that a newspaper is entitled to make? Does it follow in your mind?

Well, that is a matter to be settled by Mr. Benson, I think. There is something of direct interest to the Minister of Finance here. I think in true fiscal measures the government can determine a lot of things in this respect.

But coming back to loans and possible investments originating with public authorities in this public field, I know that this is raising a matter which appears horrendous to a lot of Canadians and a lot of my colleagues in the publishing field. But we have got to be realistic in this respect.

I know that in Sweden. . . It has become a fashion to cite Sweden whenever discussing an embarrassing question—anybody likes to have an example to bring from Sweden. It has become a fashion of Manitoba, the Province of Quebec, France, everywhere. Even Mr. Trudeau does not appear to dislike Sweden. In Sweden recently Parliament approved a program of loans to small press organizations under which newspapers can be entitled to get loans at no interest for a period of a limited number of years and at a rather low interest for the ensuing five years, let us say; and the duration of such loans can extend up to about 20 years. They have appropriated the maximum amount of twenty-five million dollars for that purpose over a five-year period, which is not exaggerated.

But I know that in a lot of cases it should be helpful.

In European countries following the war, you know that the government had to appropriate physical installations that had been run by so-called collaborators during occupation years, or that were under threat of being seized by communist organizations in countries that were then threatened with communist domination.

So the government took over control of these physical installations and decided to distribute the use of such installations among the leading ideological forces that existed in the country for purposes of publication of daily newspapers.

In France the French Government contributed to the formation of the great agency of newspaper delivery that served the whole of France. That is called Hachette.

Hachette is a very powerful organization. It would not have reached its present level of importance had it not been for the rather active involvement in indirect ways of the French Government.

And I don't think it can be claimed that newspapers are more dominated by the government in France than they are in Canada or in the United States. Under DeGaulle many newspapers strenuously opposed the old man. They did not have to oppose him. Hachette prevented the distribution of newspapers from falling under the control of an organization with limited, strictly commercial or individualistic purposes.

There are ways to be explored. There are avenues to be examined. I do not claim this could apply to Canada, but it appears to me that we have reached a stage, at least in the Province of Quebec, where we must thoroughly look at these matters in a very open-minded spirit.

Senator Langlois: Mr. Ryan, when you suggest these forms of government assistance, do you have any preference between sources, say federal and provincial, for example, given the context of Quebec?

Mr. Ryan: You know, I am going to be forced to read you part of my brief which I had to skip at the beginning: I think it is important that I return to it and I thank you very much for giving me the opportunity; it is not that I am afraid of being condemned by anyone—it is a matter of conviction. Accordingly, I shall quote page 5 of my brief where I state that, on more than one score, the various problems appear to me to fall primarily under provincial rather than federal authority. The professional aspects of the operation of the press, questions having to do with the establishment of the Press Council, questions relative to the ownership and administration of press enterprises, seem to me more likely to be resolved on the provincial than on the federal level. This would not prevent me from answering as many questions as you care to ask me on matters of interest to the Committee, for I consider that freedom of information extends even to Senate Committees.

So I thank you for having raised the question, but I feel it is one which is worthy of investigation. You have the means to do it and a good working method, and I feel that you can make good headway on it and if you make any interesting suggestions, I am sure that serious people will consider them. We reserve the right to judge them according to our own lights if necessary, when the time comes.

Senator Langlois: Thank you.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Ryan, I should like your opinion on the following point. There is a phenomenon which is peculiar to Quebec, the fact that there are approximately 150 weekly papers published in Quebec and eleven, or ten, daily papers. How do you explain the fact that there are so many weekly newspapers in Quebec and that they are so popular?

Mr. Ryan: I am not very well versed in the economics of weekly newspapers but I believe

I understand this much. A weekly newspaper is an enterprise which can survive with a very small staff and which generally has its own small printing-press, a section of which is devoted to commercial printing. Because the weekly newspaper is aimed at the local population, it receives advertising revenue from the commercial and industrial firms and social organizations in the area, and this assures it the minimal income it needs to carry on. I think this explains why we have at least—you mentioned 110 weeklies; let us say that there are at least some forty which are truly worthwhile from the point of view of content and size. But there is a market for them at the present time. I believe that this is the explanation as regards both readers and advertisers.

Mr. Fortier: To what extent does a paper like Le Soleil publish pages, for example, for Lake St. John, Gaspé, or the North Shore? To what extent can Le Soleil serve the population of these various centres daily?

Mr. Ryan: Obviously, the citizens of these regions are in a better position than I to answer these questions. However, I believe that in the case of the Saguenay-Lake St. John area, Le Soleil has formed an editorial which would be almost large enough to produce a small, complete regional newspaper every day. They have twelve or fifteen full-time journalists. I was greatly impressed by the very elaborate organization they have there, and every day they turn out a minimum of—I am not sure how many pages.

Mr. Fortier: I believe it is six pages.

Mr. Ryan: In any event, an undetermined number of pages every day devoted entirely to matters of regional interest for the people in Saguenay-Lake St. John. I must say I take my hat off to the organization from Le Soleil which succeeded in this venture, although I would have preferred, in principle, to have seen it done by an organization with its roots more firmly imbedded in the area. All the same, Le Soleil took the trouble to recruit journalists who come from the area they serve; they are very, very close to the reality there.

Senator Langlois: Nevertheless, in the Lower St. Lawrence region in particular, the weekly papers are still quite popular?

Mr. Ryan: That is correct. And in Chicoutimi there is one weekly in particular which is very, very successful at the present time and which is doing very well.

The Chairman: I was going to ask an unrelated question.

Mr. Fortier: Mine is a related one.

The Chairman: Yours is?

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

The Chairman: Please go ahead.

Mr. Fortier: You said you would like to have seen a newspaper in the Saguenay area owned by the local people, is that not correct? Is it your opinion that ideally in Canada an individual should not own more than one newspaper?

Mr. Ryan: Let me say that I am much less concerned with the individual in that respect, but ideally, I feel that every region having its own personality should be able to count on its daily newspaper.

Mr. Fortier: Then you are against chains of all kinds?

Mr. Ryan: No, no, I did not say that; I refer you to the text of my brief, Mr. Chairman, which is much more subtle than that.

Mr. Fortier: I was trying to make you sum up your thinking.

Mr. Ryan: No; I feel it would not be impossible for regional newspapers to exist; I mention a relationship with a chain, but which would also involve responsible participation by regional interests, say on a 50-50 basis. This could be an excellent arrangement. No one could argue that the chain was dictating to the regional newspaper. On the other hand, the people in the area whose resources, especially good technical and administrative talent, might not be sufficient to support a quality newspaper, could count on support from the other side. I feel that in a solution based on participation such as this we can find a more satisfactory balance we have today.

Senator Langlois: Mr. Ryan, what is your opinion of the weeklies which are not only printed, but also edited outside the region they cover? Are there several of these in the province?

Mr. Ryan: If I were a member of parliament for one of these regions—or indeed a senator—I would be very sorry to see it because I would consider that this represented so many jobs which normally should be located in the region, whose activities are the raw material used in the social product we call a newspaper.

Now, I would not go so far as to restrict the possibility for a newspaper editor to have his paper printed elsewhere because today, the majority of the weekly newspapers are adopting the offset process. However, not all regions have offset facilities of sufficient quality to produce a newspaper subject to the requirements of speed, good presentation, good physical and aesthetic appearance, and apparently certain printing firms are now attracting a great many customers. I think I know of some of the firms you have in mind; I feel that they have become established because of some remarkable qualities which, by the way, I admire.

The Chairman: Senator McElman, I just want to ask one question.

Does Le Devoir belong to the Canadian Daily Newspaper Association?

Mr. Ryan: Yes.

The Chairman: What do you think of the organization? Do you have a high regard for it?

Mr. Ryan: I will tell you; I wondered this afternoon if such a question would be put to me this evening, and I concluded that I must regret that my advertising manager could not be with me tonight, because he was operated on last week and has not returned to the office yet. That is why I don't have a paragraph on the advertising side of our operation, which is a very important side.

But our advertising manager represents us on this particular organization. I have never been able myself to attend one of its meetings; and I don't read most of the literature emanating from the organization. I immediately transfer it to Mr. Payette. So I am afraid I cannot give you an honest answer to your question.

The Chairman: Well, you have given me an honest answer.

Mr. Ryan: But we belong to the organization, and we have not seriously considered the possibility of withdrawing.

Senator McElman: Perhaps to follow through first on your question: would you give an opinion on the Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers' Association?

The Chairman: That was the question I asked.

Senator McElman: No; you said the Canadian Daily Newspaper Association, which is different.

Mr. Ryan: No, it is the same organization—CDNPA; Canadian Daily Newspaper Association.

Senator McElman: There is another one.

The Chairman: I mean the same one.

Mr. Ryan: I know you have here another organization, the Canadian Association of Managing Editors.

The Chairman: Yes.

Senator McElman: Yes.

Mr. Ryan: I don't think there is an organization different from the CDNPA for publishers exclusively. If such an organization exists, I don't belong to that club. I am not too much interested. But publishers, mind you, meeting regularly under two leading auspices—the Canadian Press for news purposes and the CDNPA for advertising purposes—these are the two leading national bodies which bring publishers together.

Senator McElman: The second of which you regard still largely as a financial...

Mr. Ryan: CDNPA?

Senator McElman: Yes.

Mr. Ryan: I said "advertising"; not "financial." CDNPA gives us no help at all in connection with our financial problems. It brings us together for the purpose of fostering our interest in the advertising field. That is the leading purpose of that organization.

Senator McElman: Right.

The principal questions I wish to put to Mr. Ryan concern New Brunswick. And I am from New Brunswick.

Mr. Ryan: You want to put the question to me about "L'Evangeline"?

Senator McElman: That is part of it, sir.

The French-speaking population of New Brunswick, although very small in terms relative to the Province of Quebec (only some 240,000-odd) is very large relative to the population of New Brunswick. As you are no doubt aware, we have six dailies in the provin-ince, one of which, "L'Evangeline," is French language. The others, the other five, are part of one chain origin. I say "part" because it also deals with television and radio.

Now, "L'Evangeline," I think it is in better shape than it has been. It is historically in financial trouble. Its circulation is not all-emcompassing of the French-speaking population of New Brunswick by any means. And quite a very large segment of that population then relies on the English language newspapers.

Now, that is the long way around to ask: do the leading newspapers of the Province of Quebec feel a responsibility both to the French-speaking people of New Brunswick to provide some measure of service to them by way of cultural and other information; and do they feel a responsibility perhaps in providing to the people of Quebec information about the problems which are similar but different, as I am sure you will agree, with the Acadian population, than they are for French-speaking people within the Province of Quebec?

Is there a responsibility?

Mr. Ryan: That is a very interesting question. It raises a lot of problems.

A few years ago when "L'Evangeline" began having serious difficulties it made an appeal to a couple of leading publishers of French-speaking newspapers in the Province of Quebec to go and examine their situation and to offer advice as to how they might best relieve their problems. The then publisher of "Le Devoir," Mr. Filion, was one of those who was invited to go and to examine the situation of "L'Evangeline."

And when he and one colleague returned they recommended to Le Conseil de la Vie Française—that is an organization dedicated to the development of the French language in the whole of North America but in particular in Canada—they recommended to Le Conseil de la Vie Française that they should organize a drive, a fund-raising drive, in order to help "L'Evangeline."

And then Le Conseil, in conjunction with the Government of the Province of Quebec, decided to provide financial assistance for "L'Evangeline" for a period of three or five years. My recollection is not too sure in this respect. We will say between three and five years.

This assistance was forwarded to "L'Evangeline."

They were supposed to also provide professional assistance, of which there was bound to be very little afterwards.

"L'Evangeline" continued with its problems. I don't think they advanced much during that period. And when the period expired during which they were going to receive assistance from Le Conseil and the Quebec Government, they were again confronted with a very awkward situation.

Then they appealed to the leading Acadian organizations, in particular La Société de l'Assomption. They formed a new corporation which is now responsible for "L'Evangeline" and which had to call upon both General DeGaulle and the Ottawa Government for assistance in order to resolve their problems.

We met and talked with the leaders of the organization in the last few months. We have always welcomed them to our office at "Le Devoir." We have discussed their situation with them at length, even recently.

The problem is one of editorial leadership to start with. You see, I insisted that they must find resources in the Acadian community to lead that paper intellectually. It is not healthy to import a man from Montreal.

Senator McElman: Or France.

Mr. Ryan: Or France, if you wish—and invest him with the task of leading the newspaper and giving intellectual, social and political leadership to the Acadian people.

But to this they answer, "We can't solicit this kind of leadership in the community. We have not yet arrived at a situation where we can provide such resource."

What is the solution in such case? I don't know what the solution is. It must be an extremely difficult problem. I think, if they cannot appreciate the kind of leadership that is expected from this sort of newspaper, whose fundamental aims are pretty akin to those of a paper like ours, if this cannot be sustained with the kind of intellectual leadership that goes with it, I think the purpose is destroyed, even if the organization is maintained physically.

They must come to a crossroads sooner or later. And then they must examine seriously whether they have the resources to maintain a daily newspaper; and, if not, whether it might not be preferable to think of keeping a solid weekly newspaper.

But this is a question which I put out loud, you know. I don't suggest any answers to the question. But my impression is that the question must be looked at very honestly.

To complete my answer to your question, I would reply without any hesitation that we in Quebec have a certain responsibility to our Acadian friends and brothers which we have not discharged to all the extent that would have been desirable in the last few years. Because we were absorbed in our own internal problems. We had extreme difficulties to resolve at home. And we cannot give to these problems the kind of attention that we would have given them before and that I hope we will give them again in the future.

I am sure there must be solidarity between these people and ourselves, otherwise the whole ideal of Francophone solidarity at the international level becomes completely meaningless.

Senator McElman: Thank you very much.

The Chairman: Are there any other questions that the senators have? It is getting late. I don't want to terminate the discussion.

Then I think I must ask Mr. Fortier if he has a question. He always have.

Mr. Fortier: Excuse me, Mr. Chairman, but I have to bow to your superior position.

Mr. Ryan, has the press in Quebec faithfully rendered for its readers the atmosphere which is emerging, let us say, or which has emerged in Quebec over the past few years?

Mr. Ryan: I would say that at certain times it has done so in a somewhat chaotic manner, at times unduly emphasizing developments which were not always as important as the press may have believed, and ignoring others which were often of greater importance. However, these reservations aside, I feel that generally speaking, performance varied greatly from one newspaper to the next.

I do not think I could allow myself to give you an answer which would lump all newspapers in the same category. I feel that a detailed study—and this might even be a subject for study by your Committee—should be made of the output of daily newspapers with regard to one or two selected topics over a one-week period in a certain year, say, and then during another week in a different year. Personally, I would learn many things about the behaviour of Le Devoir as a result of an investigation such as this. But frankly I would not care to make sweeping judgment. However, if you ask for my assessment with regard to our newspaper, I shall give it willingly. But I would not dare pass out compliments or bestow a general blessing upon all those with whom we are in competition.

No, I am not the sort of person to come here with the corporate and jurist approach to defend the body of newspapers as a whole and so forth; I feel that is just putting on a performance and that it is the same as defending the universities or colleges. It means nothing. Some are good and some are not so good, and I feel that the same holds true here.

Mr. Fortier: I asked you this question as you are an inveterate journalist who has worked in Quebec for many years. You are wearing two hats here today. I have often asked myself the question, have—too name them—the Montreal Star and The Gazette, from the standpoint of editorials and news content, informed their readers over the past ten years as they should have done? I wonder.

As far as recruitment is concerned...

Mr. Ryan: If you can dispose of one more hour, I am willing to submit myself to this kind of gruelling question, but...

Mr. Fortier: I should like to hear your opinion, but if you do not wish...

Mr. Ryan: If you can dispose of one more hour I am willing to submit myself to this kind of gruelling question. But I would not like to venture a one-minute answer to this very intricate interrogation.

Mr. Fortier: I consider this a most important matter and, if the Chairman would allow you to answer the question, and take all the time that you require, I think we would benefit from it.

The Chairman: I think we would be interested in your answer. Do you wish to take a few minutes, or do you prefer not to?

Mr. Ryan: No. I prefer even to come back at a later stage, if you are interested in a thorough answer to this question. I can come up with notes to support that particular judgment or impression I might wish to communicate. But I am afraid I would not have the freedom of mind that would be required because, to be frank with you, I know you have your commitments on your side, but I must appear before another parliamentary committee tomorrow morning and I have some homework to do in this connection, because I am less familiar with the other matter than with the one you graciously invite me to discuss with you.

The Chairman: May I say in terminating the discussion that you have certainly demonstrated to the members of our Committee tonight—not that the demonstration was necessary, but you have demonstrated again tonight why you are held in such universal high regard in the journalistic community, and indeed in the community broadly stated.

So we are terribly grateful. We know how busy you are, and we are terribly grateful. We may want to call on you again later on.

The Committee adjourned.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Thursday, December 11, 1969

The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 10 a.m.

Senator Keith Davey (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, if I may call this session to order. In the course of our studies and deliberations to date and doubtless in the course of our subsequent studies and deliberations we will hear a great deal about the parliamentary press gallery.

For that reason, I am particularly pleased this morning to welcome five members from the gallery.

I should make one thing perfectly clear at the outset. You must understand that they are not here as a group representing the press gallery. Rather they are here as individuals; as individual members of the gallery. I think it is important that Members of the Committee realize and understand the fact that these people are here as individuals.

Perhaps one exception is the gentleman on my immediate right. Mr. Robert Hull, who as well as being here as an individual is in fact the president of the press gallery.

Now, the procedure we intend to follow this morning, if it is agreeable to our guests, is this: I thought that we would ask each one to speak for five or ten minutes as he or she may wish. There is certainly no need to speak but if you have any kind of preliminary statement which you might like to make and which might be interesting and useful you may do so. You are certainly not compelled to speak.

Following that or following these introductory statements we will open the forum up for questions from senators.

Again, I hope my colleagues on the committee will appreciate that this is not a presentation on behalf of the gallery but rather these people are here as individuals and you should be mindful of that fact in your questioning.

I suppose the only official statement, if I can call it that, is the opening statement from Mr. Robert Hull who is the president of the parliamentary press gallery.

Mr. Hull?

Mr. Robert Hull, President of the Parliamentary Press Gallery: Thank you very much, Senator. This statement was approved by a general meeting of the press gallery.

The organization known as the Canadian Parliamentary Press Gallery presently consists of 133 members.

The purpose of having a Press Gallery Association is to administer space and facilities provided in the Centre Block, which are under the control of the Speakers of the Senate and the House of Commons.

It is felt that the Press Gallery has a traditional right to access to proceedings in the Senate and House of Commons chambers. This is supplemented by certain privileges.

The make-up of the Gallery can be broken into six categories. There are 49 representatives from Canadian daily newspapers. There are 29 reporters from three wire and news services. There are 22 reporters from radio stations. There are 10 representatives from television stations. There are 12 representatives of periodicals and weekly publications. There are 12 persons who represent foreign publications or broadcasting agencies.

The Gallery executive deals with membership applications, allocations of space, and establishes general guidelines for the use of privileges such as access to the lobbies. It is in no way concerned with the daily operations of individual members, except in cases where mutual interest is involved.

There is no collective view in the Parliamentary Press Gallery. It is incorrect to ever state that "The Press Gallery says" with respect to any subject.

The president of the Gallery, or in his absence, the vice-president or one of the other officers, is the spokesman for the Gallery dealing with persons or organizations having business to transact with members of the Gallery. This involves organizing press conferences, briefings and facilitating whenever and wherever possible the gathering of news.

The Press Gallery is best described as a physical location in the centre block where 133 men and women with extremely divergent views and terms of reference for the type of work they do, cover the proceedings of the House of Commons, the Senate, and the Government.

That concludes my brief, Mr. Chairman. I will try to answer any questions you may have about other activities of the Press Gallery.

I cannot speak for the Gallery as a whole regarding many of the questions I am sure are on your mind but I am prepared to answer any questions you may have about my personal attitude towards the job I do in the Gallery for the Windsor Star.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Hull. I think the next person I should call on is Mr. O'Neill who is the secretary of the Gallery. However, I understand he would prefer to make his presentation in French and our translator will be available shortly. So with your permission I will go on to one of the others.

Perhaps then I could call on Miss Joyce Fairbairn of F.P. Publications. Miss Fairbairn, do you want to say anything at this point?

Miss Joyce Fairbairn: No, Mr. Chairman, I don't really think so. The only thing I was prepared to say was a brief biographical statement but I believe all the Senators have that information.

The Chairman: You will be available for our question period?

Miss Fairbairn: Oh yes.

The Chairman: Next, I think I will call on Mr. Charles Lynch of the Southam News Services.

Mr. Lynch?

Mr. Charles Lynch (Chief of the Southam News Services): Thank you very much, Senator. I am sorry Miss Fairbairn didn't go because I would have liked to have heard what she had to say. As you know she is one of our principal competitors as well as our principal ornament in the Press Gallery. I wanted to say by way of opening that the way Miss Fairbairn haunts my dreams is not in the way you think, but out of the fear that we will get a query from one of our competing papers, for which she works, that Fairbairn has a hot story today about this or that. That is the way she figures in my life and the lives of many of the other members of the Gallery and this is why I am glad you were so careful to make the point that we are not here as spokesmen for the Gallery because the Gallery is a competitive jungle. It is not a boy's club or a cozy place as I am afraid may have been inferred in the report of the Government task force on information.

It is very much a competitive milieu and the Gallery as such, as Mr. Hull has said, has no existence except as a place where we meet from time to time, do our work individually and to compete with one another.

I am also glad that you pointed out that we are here not en bloc to speak for the Gallery but as individuals and I would have preferred indeed to ask the Committee that we be called as we were invited by letter as individuals and be heard individually and questioned individually. The reason I am worried about that is that I think when we get into the questioning of ourselves as a group inevitably some commonality of views will be implied. However, that can't be avoided and the committee did prefer to have us come to this hearing and here we are.

I hope that now that we are here the committee will deal with the professional aspects of news gathering as against the proprietary aspects which I think was the principal and original reason for this committee being formed and an area of very special interest in which of course none of us who have worked as news people have any involvement. None of us are proprietors and none of us have anything to say about the ownership of the newspapers, although some of us, myself included, have some managerial duties in addition to our journalistic ones.

I will just touch on those briefly in a moment.

been marked and I count myself very lucky to come along into it at a time when so many improvements were being made; working conditions both at the individual newspaper levels and certainly here in parliament. If any of you knew the Press Gallery five or six or seven years ago it was referred to as the "slum on the third floor at the back of this building." Well, at least it is a sanitary slum. It used to be a unsanitary one and it used to be a place where all of us lived as well as worked during our working day. That was where we had our desks and that was where we hung our hats. This is no longer the case. The move to the National Press Building where most of us now have offices and where the head office of Southam News Services exists, has completely changed the working environment.

I remember being on a panel once with Frank Underhill who has had many well deserved stories written about him recently in connection with his eightieth birthday, and he was being critical of the work of the Press Gallery and I got up and pleaded that the working conditions were so bad it was impossible to function clearly there and I estimated that 50 per cent of my professional capacity was lost just because of the environment and the chaos, and he turned to me on the panel and he said, "Mr. Lynch, the reason that your work is so mediocre has nothing to do with the environment in which you work, it's the fact that you yourself are mediocre. You are doing the best you can with what you have. So don't blame it on the conditions."

The conditions have improved and if any of the committee have not seen the National Press Building I think you should do so. You certainly would be welcome to come and visit our offices down there and see the conditions under which we work. I would say that I and my colleagues in Southam News Services do, I think, 95 per cent of our writing not in the Press Gallery but in our own offices in the National Press Building.

This is, in our view, a very efficient and remarkable facility which has greatly improved the working conditions.

The Chairman: May I say, Mr. Lynch, that we would like to accept that offer.

Mr. Lynch: Good. We would be very pleased to receive the committee. There is not an awful lot to see because we don't have a great deal of apparatus. We in the News Services, and I think every bureau that is here, haven't much going for us except the people who work for us and of course the calibre of work depends on the calibre of those people.

I think, myself, it has never been higher. There was a time when the press gallery was accused of living in an Ottawa cocoon and cut off from the rest of the country. This is an accusation which has sometimes been brought against parliament itself. If that ever was true, and it may have been true—oddly enough in the days when we had access to free travel along the railroads, and all sorts of things of that sort which dated back to the days of confederation and now no longer exist, we did travel very little. We now travel a great deal and I myself travel 100,000 miles a year. I travelled this 100,000 miles a year within the country and abroad and I think all of the members of our staff do so.

I think all the members of the press gallery travel across the country a great deal of the time and I think that is good. The financial attractions of working as a professional in the news field of course are greater than they have ever been. The day when we lost people to public relations or other organizations, or even to radio and television, from the newspapers although not over are pretty much over.

Again, I count it my good fortune to have come along at a time when Canadian publishers suddenly came to realize that news was something you had to pay for, and they do pay for it.

I will mention the size of the budget that I administer in a moment to indicate the sort of thing that has been happening in all news gathering organizations in the country. I want my remarks if possible to be addressed to the writing side of the profession, rather than not only the proprietorship side about which you will be hearing at great length from other witnesses, but also rather than the editing side.

You will find that the writers tend to range themselves against two other elements in the business. One is the desk through which our copy passes and we of course regard everybody there as the enemy because of the things they sometimes do by way of improving our grammar and spelling and the very presentation they give to our material which is entirely in hands other than our own. I hope you will be hearing from the editing side of the news business too as your hearings go along because it is very important.

The editors and the desk men think that it is the most important and that the writers are incidental. We tend to view it the other way around and I hope you will hear both sides of that question.

I think the time when merely adequate or mediocre reporting and writing in the newspaper field was acceptable is gone. Frank Underhill sometimes refers to the good old days—the brave old days of newspapering in this country when the quality of writing and reporting was higher. I disagree with that. I think there is more of a premium than ever now on writers with a special ability to collect and to convey information and to write it; there is a higher premium now on what you might call talent, flair or style, and I don't mean gimmickry. I mean clear writing that will grab and hold the reader because of the enormous competition that now exists for the reader's time.

There are a lot of intangibles that mark a good reporter from an adequate or mediocre one. The one that I have always put the most premium on is an insatiable sense of curiosity. If it can be sustained throughout a man's career it would indicate to me, and I have always preached this, that he should make his whole career in the writing and reporting side and not aspire to promotion into the editorial or into the managerial side of newspapering.

Coupled with that of course is a sense of responsibility which has caused so much anguish and on which there is no definition. How does a reporter exercise his sense of responsibility particularly in the coverage of political events, which is what we engage in where the truth is so often difficult to find? People say that there is a great premium on objectivity and truth, and politics by its very nature—I haven't ever seen a political question on which there were fewer than three versions of the truth according to the man's political doctrine or the party to which he belongs.

Our problem is to exercise our sense of responsibility and fairness in writing, reporting, and also in my own case and others, appraising and commenting and still come out with meaningful copy but fair and responsible copy.

Now Southam News Services. I will just say a word about that. I was not called as the chief of Southam News Services but I happen to be that and I will just say a word which you might find interesting on that aspect of our organization.

The Press Gallery plays, as I said earlier, a very minor role in the life of Southam News Services. We are the only national news gathering organization, national or international, that has its headquarters here. This is our headquarters bureau in Ottawa. It's from here that we normally post our men to our other bureaus and we have bureaus administered from Ottawa in Quebec City and in Toronto, New York, in Washington, in London and in Paris. The overall responsibility for that operation falls to me, assisted in very large measure by Mr. Patrick O'Callaghan who is in this room and who is the executive editor of the News Services.

When I joined the News Services in 1958, the annual budget for news-gathering for the Southam Newspapers was under $100,000 a year. It is now close to half a million. It has jumped that much in the period just over 10 years. It reflects, going back to my statement that the publishers now do appear to realize that news is something that you have to pay for. That involves a very minimum payment for apparatus and the only apparatus we have is the transmission apparatus. We use telex to communicate our news to our papers and receive queries from them.

We have contractual relations with Reuters, the British news agency, for transmission of our overseas copy and we have transmission arrangements with a leased wire from Canadian Press here in Canada for the carriage of our overnight file of news to our 11 newspapers.

As I say, the administration of Southam News Services—that is to say the appointment of our correspondents, the day to day editing and guidance of their copy, the decision about assignments and who should go where and what we should cover and what we should leave to the national news agencies, the Canadian Press—the decisions are all made in Ottawa with consultation with the editors of our newspapers and eventually my line of responsibility flows through a committee of the publishers with which Mr. O'Callaghan and I meet three or four times a year. The Chairman is Mr. Ross Munro, the publisher of the Edmonton Journal.

Seriously enough, in a country where Toronto and Montreal tend to dominate communications we have a case where our head office and our operating base is in Ottawa and really our ownership base is in Edmonton. We burn up the telephone lines in consultation on important matters such as the budget and things of that kind with Edmonton.

The Edmonton Journal is one of the largest of our papers, if not the largest, and in terms of circulation is a major contributor to our budget. Our budget as I mentioned is roughly half a million dollars a year portioned among all the Southam papers on a formula based on circulation.

Edmonton is really about the biggest place in our lives from an overall organization point of view, the summit, more than any other place in the country. I was just going to close that by pointing out that within the writing side of our profession and particularly as we find it here in Ottawa there are two divisions. There is the reporting aspect of parliament and then there is the comment aspect.

Each of them has a long tradition...

Mr. Ron Collister: Which are you in?

Mr. Lynch: I often tell the people who work for us not to do as I do but if everybody wrote a signed personal column of political commentary then obviously the situation would be distorted. There is a mix within our organization—within the national press corps as I prefer to call it rather than the press gallery, of reporters and political commentators and, senator, that is all I have to say. Thank you.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. I think perhaps I will call next Mr. Ron Collister—from the C.B.C.

Mr. Collister: I would just like to direct myself briefly to three points. One is the quality of the press gallery which I assume you will be discussing and another is the flow of information and the third is what Mr. Lynch referred to as the drying up of people who really make a career out of reporting and particularly political reporting.

Before I came here today, in the press gallery I looked at a picture on the wall which showed our membership in 1967 which was just two years ago. There were 132 people there, we counted them, and 52 have gone so there is a 40 per cent turnover in two years.

In short, many people are not staying around long enough to really understand the business of government and to show a real interest in it. The tendency seems to be in many cases to make a few headlines and get out of Ottawa as an assignment as quickly as possible.

This shows that there is a problem for the employee and the employer and maybe it's a worse problem for the employer, who often thinks that a two year stint in Ottawa is enough; the reporter has to switch jobs if he wants to stay in Ottawa and make a career out of political reporting.

The other point I would like to make is that I think there isn't enough awareness of the change in the demands on a reporter. The idea that a reporter chases fire engines—and this is the traditional view—of course is just so ridiculous. Let's look at the constitutional conference and what a reporter is required to be to do a half decent job of reporting and interpreting this to the people.

He has to invest a large number of years and has to be prepared to be a political reporter right into the future to follow this conference, to put himself in a position where he is able to understand and tell people what it is about.

Now, that is the difference in the type of assignments a reporter in a lifetime has to cope with: the fire engine beat and the Constitutional Conference and the creation of a new constitution for Canada.

Now, we were talking about the inadequacies in the Task Force Report on the flow of information. I would suggest that there is some hypocrisy here because of the structure itself. It is very difficult to get information because most of the information that we get seems to come from political sources which is often suspect to start off with. You can almost hear the mind ticking over and saying "Now, is this good or is this bad, should we let it out?" There is no sort of acceptance that we as reporters have a right to know and we should be given this information as a right—straight information without political consideration applied.

This hypocrisy I was talking about also lies in the attitude of the government towards the electronic media. It seems to me that the role of electronic media has not been fully recognized. There are no television cameras in this room and of course we are not making much progress in our request for television cameras in the Commons. If we are going to say that information is not getting out to the people, we also have to say or always have to ask "Are the media getting the co-operation to do the job that it should be doing?"

At this stage I must conclude that they really aren't. I don't think that this aspect of it is dealt with sufficiently in the Task Force Report on information which makes a good point about the press gallery and its function.

Well, that is all I have to say and I will be happy to answer any questions which you may have.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. I have received a note from Mr. O'Neill saying that he will forgo his statement and will simply field questions from the floor. I hope that has had nothing to do with the translation?

Mr. O'Neill: I might want to expand or comment on some of the things that Ron has been saying.

The Chairman: Would you like to do it now?

Mr. O'Neill: Yes. Just about what Mr. Collister calls the right to know and the lack of co-operation that we get. Personally I challenge this concept of our right to know. I do think that surely the people have a right to know but I am not sure that we as press reporters have the same right.

I think as members of the press gallery we have privileges and I don't think that we can claim to have the right, because after all we work for employers who profit out of this operation and therefore I take objection to that concept of our right to know.

I think that the people have a right to know and I think we have only privileges.

About the co-operation that we get here. I take another view of that as well. I think we have the means to do our job and I don't think that the set-up as far as information goes in government is quite satisfactory but Mr. Collister mentioned that the policy of secrecy stops us from doing a good job. I don't quite agree with that. I think we have all the chance that we need to gather all the information we want to get.

Mr. Collister: May I just make one comment on that. The policy of secrecy. I would just like to refer you again to this constitutional process which is going on and which has been going on for two years and for two or three times a year we have been given briefings. Why don't we have a continual flow of information from those committees which are meeting all the time? We are not expecting a great deal for us to be in touch all the time.

Mr. O'Neill: Well, I think we can get a large amount of that information. We get it bit by bit but I do think it is possible to get it and I also do think that it is useful to the government and to the people that part of this discussion be kept a secret.

Senator Hays: Mr. Chairman, we are going to interview the press this morning and I don't think we should listen to a dialogue. I would hope that we would have an opportunity, and knowing newspaper people as I do, with all the great respect I have for them, they will take all the time.

The Chairman: Notwithstanding Senator Hays' observations I will allow Mr. Lynch to comment on Mr. O'Neill's statement if he wishes to do so.

Mr. Lynch: Not for the first time I am devastated by Senator Hays' intervention. I just wanted to take objection to what I gather was his implication that we function by privileges rather than rights; that our rights may be somehow less than the general public because we work for profit making concerns. I wouldn't want to leave that without objecting to it and I hope it would be explored in a way that we can all have a word or two on it.

The Chairman: I would like to get on to the Senators but before I do I think that even Senator Hays won't object if I ask Miss Fairbairn if she wishes to say anything now?

Miss Fairbairn: No, I am quite happy.

The Chairman: Well, Senator Prowse, I think we will allow Senator McElman to ask the first question.

Senator Prowse: Well, I was going to deal with that.

The Chairman: All right, go ahead.

Senator Prowse: Well, Mr. Chairman, in the matter of investigating things here it seems to me that we would get a better picture of what the press gallery thought if we suspended our right of considering them as individual witnesses and if they get some conversation going back and forth we might learn more from that than we would otherwise.

The Chairman: Well, perhaps you and Senator Hays might discuss that at luncheon. Before I turn to Senator McElman I was going to, and with great respect to Senator Prowse, underline rather the opposite point of view. I will again repeat that in reference to Mr. Lynch and some of the others that they are here, I can't stress this enough, as individuals. Not unnaturally however, with respect to Senator Hays, there probably will be a cross dialogue. You may wish to comment on answers which some of you may give to various questions and we would welcome that dialogue.

At the same time we will try, Mr. Lynch, to be completely mindful of the point that you are appearing here as individuals. We appreciate you co-operating with us in the way that you have.

Senator McElman: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I might say initially that I have always envied the members of the press gallery when they appear on panels, particularly on television, and are able to grill the politicians and I have always wanted to be in such a seat when they ask those proverbial questions such as "Are you still beating your wife." So today the hot seat is up there and it is an interesting situation.

I would like to direct my first question to Mr. Hull.

What is the basis for admission to the press gallery?

Mr. Hull: I will quote directly from the Canadian Parliamentary Press Gallery Constitution and I apologize for not having copies of this but we recently amended our Constitution and it is in the process of being printed and that is why I can't provide you with copies.

The Chairman: Could you provide us with copies?

Mr. Hull: When they do arrive, certainly. I will quote the section pertaining to membership.

Active membership in the Canadian Parliamentary Press Gallery shall be open only to journalists whose principal occupation is reporting, interpreting, or editing parliamentary or federal government news and who are assigned to Ottawa on a continuing basis by one or more daily newspapers, radio or television broadcasting stations or systems, recognized news services or periodicals of national or international standing and who require the use of gallery facilities to fulfill their functions.

Senator McElman: Does the press gallery have a written or unwritten code of ethics for its membership?

Mr. Hull: There is no written code of ethics per se in the Constitution. There is a reference—in cases where someone considers that there may have been a breach of a code of ethics and if it is brought to the executives' attention we will look into it; such as a breach of a release time on a document or something to this degree. We will look into it and try to ascertain whether it was done and why it was done.

Senator McElman: And this would be the full extent of any written code?

Mr. Hull: Yes, I think so. There are a number of unwritten aspects to some of the privileges we have. Take the lobbies. We have access to the lobbies but we have posted a notice reminding our members that we don't feel that they should go in and eavesdrop in the lobbies. We feel that if there is a private conversation going on in the lobby it is pretty well an unwritten agreement that we don't go and try to hear what is being said. We stay discreetly at one end.

Senator McElman: You stay at the end and point the microphone.

Mr. Hull: Well, there are no microphones allowed in the lobbies.

Senator McElman: Well, in the event of a breach of the unwritten code, what provisions do you have for punitive measures against a member of the gallery who so breaches?

Mr. Hull: Well, this is usually decided upon by the executive after hearing all the facts. Usually in cases of breaching of releases, we try to get the people who have been involved to send letters apologizing to whoever happens to be hurt by this breach.

Senator McElman: Well, aside from an early news break before a deadline, do you have other examples of what might happen, without naming them of course, and what action might be taken?

Mr. Hull: No.

Senator McElman: There have been no breaches then?

Mr. Hull: Well...

Senator Prowse: There have been no problems?

Mr. Hull: I have had no problems this year.

Senator McElman: In this history of the gallery has anyone actually been suspended from it or removed from it?

The Chairman: That question was directed to Mr. Hull, was it?

Senator McElman: Believe me, I wasn't pointing at Mr. Lynch. He is a fellow New Brunswicker.

Mr. Hull: Yes.

The Chairman: Would you like to be more specific?

Mr. Hull: No.

Senator McElman: Is there any discussion currently as to perhaps a strengthening of such a code and action that might be taken?

Mr. Hull: No.

Senator McElman: You feel that you have sufficient self-policing currently?

The Chairman: Does someone want to speak on that?

Mr. Collister: Well, in the revised constitution there is a section dealing with that kind of unethical practice like using facilities that are paid for by the government for other purposes, for public relations work and things like that. This is what it says:

Where a member of the gallery uses his membership or the facilities of the gallery to obtain a benefit other than for journalism, he shall be liable for a reprimand, suspension from membership, expulsion from general membership of the gallery on the recommendation of the executive.

This was put in to meet any future situation that might arise because of a different kind of person applying for a membership who may be operating in several fields as a newsman and doing other work such as public relations work.

Senator McElman: Would this apply in the case of a representative of the print media moonlighting on the C.B.C.?

Mr. Collister: No.

Senator McElman: I mean if they did their work in the gallery?

Mr. Collister: No. I think the use of the facilities for either purpose would be completely defensible.

Senator McElman: Mr. Chairman, if I could be permitted to take a little bit of time to read something here.

To set the ground for it—we have in recent weeks the report of the Federal Task Force on information in Canada and also the famous or infamous, depending upon your viewpoint, speech of Mr. Spiro Agnew and the controversy that it has created. It seems odd that in Canada the bulk of the writing and commentary thus far has been directed to what has happened in the United States rather than the report of the Task Force in Canada. The comment of Mr. Spiro Agnew and largely of the Task Force suggest that there are a relatively few think-alikes in the media field who are controlling the political public affairs news in both countries.

On November the 23rd, on the weekend Sunday Show, a free lance commentator who I suspect is known to all of you, Doug Collins, was speaking and if I could I would like to read part of what he had to say. I believe it might start some lively discussion. He said, "I have been waiting in vain for the papers to tell us what the report says about the Ottawa Press Gallery. One thing it says is that the gallery has a near monopoly in the collection of federal news."

In other words, a closed shop, and this is detrimental to the spread of information. The gallery is also "unrepresentative of the country standing as it does for a fairly small group of men in the institution.

"Further, there is an increasingly influential power block there. That situation should be corrected by letting more people into the club. Present control and construction of the press gallery is outmoded and inhibiting. Far too many agencies and responsible individuals are denied access to regular information by the exclusiveness of that control.

"The report goes on to mention that the anthropologists took a look at the gallery some three years ago and found that 38 per cent of the members used their own colleagues as sources.

"Now, you know what is meant when stories are attributed to some back bencher and informed sources. Interviewing each other also leads to what June Callwood once called "identical inspiration." Meaning of course the simultaneous appearance in some 30 papers of essentially the same stuff all based on what the newspaper man's buddy had to say.

"It goes on to say..."

The Chairman: Are you still quoting, Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: I am reading from a transcript of the taped show.

The Chairman: Fine.

Senator McElman: "It goes on to say that the ethical standards of the gallery are undefined but the rights and perquisites of the gallery are very clear. It is strange that all this and more hasn't been written up.

"All I have been able to find has been the two paragraph treatment in news stories and passing reference, very passing, in the writing of Mr. Charles Lynch.

"How now, Sir Charles, and how now, Douglas Fisher and the other knights? The report describes the press gallery as strategic gate keepers of the federal news. Why don't its members open the gates? After all, if the C.B.C. had rated so much attention it would have been worth 20 front page identical inspiration stories complete with pictures and pointing fingers."

There are other comments which I shan't go into but could we have some comments on the points raised in this.

The Chairman: Would it be fair Senator McElman to allow everyone up here to comment on that?

Senator McElman: This is what I had hoped, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Hull: I am not going to attempt to answer everything but there are some obvious erroneous assumptions made by Mr. Collins. The gates are not closed in the press gallery. I don't know where he gets the idea that they are. I don't know where anyone gets this idea. I don't know where anyone gets the idea that there is limited access in the press gallery because there is not. Anyone who wants to apply can apply and my recollection is that in this year there has been nobody turned down who applied under our new constitution.

Where this power bloc is is beyond me. This business of using your colleagues as sources—well I can say frankly that I don't necessarily trust my colleagues as sources. I prefer to get my own news and if I get my own news I keep it to myself.

As far as Collins' suggestion that he hasn't read enough about this particular chapter—the strategic gate keepers of the federal news—I frankly don't think the people really give a darn about our personal little bickerings and whatnot that go on in the press gallery.

They are not interested in that or how we wash our dirty linen and things like that. I think possibly one of his problems is he thinks that we don't sit down and write about ourselves. That is not what we are up here to do because we are not up here to argue with each other. We are up here, as far as I am concerned, to cover government and parliament.

Identical inspiration—well, I have yet to find two press gallery people that thought the same thing about anything and that includes a children's Christmas party. How you suddenly get identical inspiration on major news stories is again beyond me. If similar stories appear in 30 papers, I would assume that it may be that we were all covering the same event. It's as simple as that. That is briefly all I have to say on that.

Mr. Collister: Well, I will just say briefly that I think that statement is riddled with wild exaggerations. That kind of criticism has been around here for a long time and it may have been valid some time before I was here but I don't think it is valid now.

I believe there are more independent streams of information coming out of the press gallery than at any time since I came here and this label of the club is another old label. I don't feel I am a member of a club. I use the gallery in a very minimum way for some physical services, desk, typewriter and phones, and that is all the gallery means to me.

We have to organize that space and we have to ration it on the basis of need and this is the only limitation on membership and it is not a serious limitation. Any reporter from anywhere in this country can come to Ottawa for two weeks or a week on assignment and ask for a temporary card and get it from Mr. Hull immediately and receive all the same facilities that I have. It just doesn't stand up under this kind of examination.

It also says that 38 per cent of the sources were from other reporters. I don't go to other reporters for my information. We have a minimal exchange and like Mr. Hull I want to keep it to myself until 11 o'clock at night. The problem is rationing the space and in the revised constitution that we have, we have inserted another line to say membership would also be linked to need and in the future a committee within the gallery would look at how this would be applied—you know, who needs a front seat in the press gallery and this type of thing.

All the people who get into the gallery will have the same basic services. They will have services just like I have, telephones, stationery services, releases and that kind of thing. Just to wrap it up I think I will just repeat that it may have been true before my time but it is not true now.

The Chairman: Miss Fairbairn, would you wish to comment on that?

Miss Fairbairn: Yes. First of all, I will say that I find it very difficult to recognize the gallery from the statement of Mr. Collins. On one point, the clubbiness that he refers to in the gallery—referring to a statement that Mr. Collister made earlier—in two years there has been approximately a 40 per cent turnover in the membership of the gallery.

It seems to me it is very difficult to start forming clubs at that kind of a turnover and I just don't believe that they exist any more. I concur with Mr. Collister and with Mr. Hull in saying that I can't think of anybody who spends their time running around the gallery to their colleagues for their sources of information.

I challenge that very strongly.

On the closed shop business, I think Mr. Hull brought this point up, that to a degree the membership in the gallery is restricted by physical means. There are just so many seats you can get in a room and there are just so many seats that we have available in the House of Commons or in the Senate...

Senator Prowse: Well, there is a lot of room in the Senate.

Miss Fairbairn: This business about the rights of the press gallery—these kinds of things are considered part of our right and you can't have, for instance, 500 reporters marching into a lobby after a question period. You would have to open up the public galleries to event seat them.

As I say I just think Mr. Collins' statement on the press gallery is outdated and beyond my comprehension.

Mr. O'Neill: I would agree with everybody here and say that part of this information report in my opinion is just as impressionistic as some of our own coverage. I would add to this that in my opinion the press gallery is closed in this sense—not in the sense that anyone is barred from becoming a member, but the press gallery is a small world. Mr. Lynch travels quite a bit across the country—not all of us do. We are trapped here in a very small world and we don't always get the feel of what is going on beyond Parliament Hill, so because of that I would say that there is a degree of osmosis in the press gallery.

There is a lot of exchange of information. For instance, in my case, I consult my colleagues from the Vancouver Sun or from the West to get a better feeling of what some M.P.'s think their problems are on some of the problems of Western Canada, and they do the same. They come to me sometimes when they are writing about Quebec—so I would say that there is a degree of osmosis and I would also say that in that way the gallery is a small world and a closed world. Not because the people cannot come in but because we all live there and we don't go out in the field as often perhaps as we should.

In that sense, perhaps there is some accuracy in the kind of statement that you find in the information report.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Mr. Lynch: I would just like to comment here that this is something of a danger you run by calling people like us. You can buy these views for 10 cents. I wrote three columns on the Task Force on Information which was a 432 page document or something of that sort—roughly four pages of which were devoted to the press gallery. The rest was a major and quite stinging indictment of government information services so I dealt, in the columns that I wrote, largely with the burden of that report, mentioning, as Doug Collins said in his broadcast, in passing, that they had been very harsh with the likes of me and with the press gallery but not dwelling on that, not making that the main point. We had covered that point in our coverage of the Task Force Report very copiously. We put out an enormous file on that report and we did cover the section on the press gallery but we didn't make it the major section.

As to your question as to why it hasn't got the attention in this country that the Agnew speech got, both in the United States and in this country and indeed around the world, I would attribute it to the credentials of the people making the charges and the way in which they were made.

The Task Force charges that are most outspoken about the gallery are largely attributed to anonymous sources. Some of them are attributed to our own editors who have as I said in my opening statement a notoriously suspicious view of their minions in the press gallery, and it's mutual. We have a notoriously suspicious view of them.

In the House stuff, I think the Task Force in its terms of reference and in the way it presented its section on the press gallery, or the fact that it is merely a recommendation or a series of recommendations on government and there wasn't a very pointed recommendation on the press gallery aspect, didn't rate with the vice-president of the United States speaking with the endorsement of the president in naming names and pointing fingers. That was dramatic and that was pointed and that was very worrisome or encouraging, depending on which side of the fence you sit on.

I similarly distinguish between that anonymity and the loose organization and impressionistic nature of the Task Force Report and this hearing here. I have made that clear. This Senate Committee with the guidelines that were outlined by Senator Davey, many of which I find quite worrisome and bothersome, but it's more specific and more pointed than anything in that Task Force Report.

I certainly took the guidelines, about which I wrote also, much more seriously as a probe into my profession, into my field, much more seriously than I did the Task Force. I would defend that judgment.

Senator McElman: You feel then that the Canadian public should be more interested in an analysis of this Task Force Report than they should be in what Mr. Spiro Agnew had to say?

Mr. Charles Lynch: Well, all things being equal, as I put it; if the Prime Minister had said what's in the Task Force Report, or his righthand man—if he had one, if he has he might let me know—it would obviously get the attention.

Look what happened when he called us crumbs in London. There was no shortage of comment or distribution of that view and we all argued with him until we discovered that according to one poll 87 per cent of the public agreed with him and we stopped arguing as formidably as we had been.

Senator McElman: I was going to ask a question on that a little later, Mr. Lynch. Apparently a large segment of the public regard reporters, particularly when interviewing public figures, as a bunch of slobs who are invading the privacy of the individual.

Of course, the Prime Minister expressed a similar view but you covered that.

During the celebrated pipeline debate, I think the press people generally admit that they abandoned any pretense of impartiality and they did quite a job on the government of the day. The reason I mention this is that it seemed to bring in a new style of reporting plus interpreting of the news from Parliament Hill, which has been described as the broad-axe style replacing the straight reporting style.

Out of this there has also come comment on occasion that today and in recent years the real party in opposition is always the press gallery. Do you have any comments on that view?

The Chairman: Who are you asking that?

Senator McElman: In general.

Mr. Lynch: On the point about the press, again I would like to stop talking about the press gallery and talk about the press corps here. The people who write about politics, on the aspect of them adopting a natural posture of criticism of the government of the day, I have pondered this at great length and have failed to come up with any rule of thumb or series of things that might explain it in a natural way.

I haven't found or done much better than to point out that the government of the day is the proposer of measures. It is the government of the days' performance that is up for comment and for reporting. It's the omissions of the government of the day that may be reported upon as against their commissions. Whereas, the opposition party are free of that. It's very seldom that it would occur to one to comment on some omission of failure of an opposition party to bring forward a policy.

There is a great deal more interest attached to the government of the day regardless of what party it is. This leads to much more reporting about the proposals of the government of the day than of the other parties. This leads them into the field of being subjected to comment and criticism from the opposition parties and from those of us who indulge in political commentary.

Over the years—you have heard all the descriptions about the honeymoon, when the new government comes in, and then its relations with the press allegedly go sour. At least two prime ministers of my experience, and possibly three, have left their jobs convinced that they were done in by the press, that they had a bad press, that their message didn't get through and that they would be prime minister today and would be remembered much more warmly in short term history and long term history had the press been less critical, or as they would put it, more fair in their reporting of them.

I don't agree. I don't think it is within the power of the press corps to make a good government look bad. I think the material on which we work in our reporting and in the commenting that most of us do is provided by the government of the day. We write much less about the opposition than we do about the government. It just isn't in the cards because the government is the government.

Inevitably, this mood of estrangement comes in as between the government and the press corps. I think it is a good thing. I don't lament it any more than I lament what you said earlier—that we are not loved by the public. It is not part of our job to be loved by the public any more than it is to be loved by government. It doesn't dismay me that my relations with any given cabinet within my recollection, and I have been in this business for 33 years and I first came to the press gallery in 1947—it doesn't worry me that my relations with the party in power happen to be sour. They almost always are. I say if I can keep them sullen but not openly contemptuous, that is about as good as I can do.

It is not a good explanation, Senator, but I don't think there is an answer to your question. I don't think there is an answer to your question as it relates to the press in any country or any capital, be it provincial or federal or international. No matter how warm the relationship might be—and the relationships between the men of the press corps and John Diefenbaker before he became Prime Minister, and Lester Pearson before he became Prime Minister, was a very warm and comradely relationship. They were that kind of guy, and in neither case did it last into their prime ministership and I think in neither case was it desirable that it last or could it have lasted. There is some law at work here that I haven't been able to isolate. Your question is well taken.

Senator McElman: Yes, you raise the point of the two prime ministers feeling that they had been done in.

Mr. Lynch: I was doubtful about Mr. St. Laurent but I will include him as well. He felt he was done in, I am sure.

The Chairman: That is every prime minister.

Mr. Lynch: Well, everyone that I have known. Well, except for Mr. Mackenzie King who had such a reserved attitude towards the press that I don't think we ever knew what he thought.

The Chairman: Is there anyone else from the gallery who would like to comment on that?

Senator McElman: Well, Mr. Chairman, just on that point raised by Mr. Lynch. There was, I think, in Canada a rather substantial body of opinion that at least a group of the gallery and senior reporters generally who covered that election in which Mr. Diefenbaker lost office, and the Liberal leadership convention in which Mr. Trudeau won the leadership, and the most recent federal election in which he was re-elected Prime Minister, that a group consciously went out to knock out Diefenbaker, make Trudeau party leader and then re-elect him to office.

You of course were singled out as one of the ringleaders of that group, Mr. Lynch, according to public opinion. Do you feel you have already covered this sufficiently or would you like to comment further?

Mr. Lynch: Well, I don't want to monopolize this hearing. If anyone else wishes to speak—I do have something I want to say to that point.

Senator McElman: I thought you would.

Mr. Lynch: Well, again, there is an elusive law at work here of cause and effect or which came first, the press coverage or the events that undid the Diefenbaker Government. I would submit of course that the Diefenbaker Government was undone from within in quite a public way. There was no mystery about the forces that were at work by that government leading to its collapse, its defeat in the House.

There was no mystery about the nuclear weapons question which was acting very heavily against the government as Mr. Diefenbaker says, and he will expound on this in his book I think; he alleges that with help from the President of the United States it's quite a story. We reported it and in reporting it we may have aided and abetted the event just as in the Trudeau thing. If we had tried to build up Mr. Stanfield and set off a wave of Stanfieldmania across the country for the swinging Mr. Stanfield, it just wouldn't have suited the personality of that gentleman. You can't do it nor can you stage a build-up if such build-ups could be incubated every entertainment figure and every stunt man in the world would be built up to that kind of figure. There is a whole science of build-up in public relations and ballyhoo trying to make the very sort of thing that happens with Mr. Trudeau, not by his particular design.

I think his people were surprised by it as everybody else was. We started to report the odd and curious aspects of his candidacy and of his personality. By reporting them I would not deny that we contributed to the wave of emotion that was built up which became Trudeaumania but I certainly deny that we hatched it and incubated it and artificially forced it. He had to provide the material. He had to provide the antics, the actions, the words, the appearance and the kisses, and the sex, all of these things that went into that package.

We reported it and it did take off and we stand suspected by a lot of people of having built him up. But I deny it.

Mr. Collister: We should also look at it a little more deeply. There is no doubt that in the '62 - '63 period most of the newsmen were taking strong positions individually; whether they admit it or not, there was a lot of anti-Diefenbaker feeling just as in '68 the same situation arose in the other way. There was a lot of pro-Trudeau feeling on a very individual basis.

What I am saying is there was no plot and we didn't gather to arrange events. Nevertheless, this kind of personal acceptance surely must mean something to shape events.

Senator McElman: Mr. Chairman, I would like to put one more question and then I will pass on. This question would be directed to Mr. Collister.

First of all, I will refer to one of his comments that news reporting is no longer chasing fire engines. There are those in parliament and political circles I am sure who believe that you switched your practice to setting the fires. There has been a good bit of comment to the committee that the C.B.C. has great selectivity in choosing panelists for discussion of public affairs, political events and interviews with the public figures of all parties and that these come to a great extent from the press gallery and it is a parade of the same faces. Is there any such thing?

The Chairman: I wonder, Senator McElman, if you wouldn't agree that that question would be more properly put to the C.B.C. people when they come here?

Senator McElman: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I think that is fair.

Senator Hays: I should like to ask Miss Fairbairn to define freedom of the press?

Senator Macdonald: I wonder if I might ask Mr. Lynch one question before we go on?

The Chairman: Does it tie in with what we are discussing?

Senator Macdonald: Yes. Mr. Lynch mentioned the difficulties that a political commentator has. I was wondering, do you have any difficulty in being objective in regard to people whom in fact you are friendly with or admire or respect or something like that?

Mr. Lynch: Yes, of course. This is a basic dilemma of political commentary and is one reason why there have been some things written about this, about the desirability of the political commentator or anybody who writes about politics not becoming close to the people that he writes about. I had some misgivings about coming before this committee simply because I write about the Senate and I write about people in this room and I worry that my approach to them—I might become overly inhibited by the fact that I am here and all this enters into it.

I have deliberately refrained—this sounds a bit pompous, I think, because there is nothing to indicate that any of the leading politicians would want to be close to me—but I have deliberately refrained from making that possible and getting on too close a basis, and on one or two cases—I happen to have a weak spot in that I do admire certain people and I do form these kind of attachments. I think we all do. I have found this distorting in my approach to writing about them and I am worried about it. I cannot claim to have eliminated it entirely. I can only claim to have tried to stay at arm's length from the situation.

Senator Macdonald: I recall one time some years ago when Mr. Pearson was Prime Minister that you were somewhat critical of him. You mention in your column that you had such a liking—this is not quoting but it is close—that you had such a liking and respect for the man that you found it very difficult to criticize him in any way.

Mr. Lynch: Yes, Mr. Pearson had a name for people like that or pieces like that. Many of us used to write and say "more in sorrow than in anger" and he used to say, "Well, would you get angry? Instead of my old buddies hitting me over the head and saying how much they hate doing it."

Senator Davey will remember that situation. That was a problem and I have never tried to conceal my admiration for the man and that was born of the fact that before I came here to stay I was at the United Nations covering it for the C.B.C. as their correspondent and I was covering the Suez crisis and I actually saw at first hand Mr. Pearson winning the Nobel Prize. It was a very exciting and very stirring thing to me and meant a great deal to me then and has meant a great deal to me since.

It has, if you like, clouded my political faculty about one aspect of Mr. Pearson's character when he became Prime Minister.

Senator Macdonald: Does it not hold true, Mr. Lynch, that perhaps your not liking some other person would also cloud your view?

Mr. Lynch: It's possible. It certainly is possible. I couldn't give you an example there but I would if I could.

Senator Macdonald: I recall another time you wrote an article where you mentioned the nuclear power issue. Some considerable time after that election, it was brought out that the news men met—I believe it was with the American Ambassador in his playroom in his basement and he claimed he was just giving background information. Don't you think the public were entitled to know what was the source of that information?

Mr. Lynch: This was a very controversial issue, Senator, and you could make up your own mind. Mr. Diefenbaker made his up and accused me on television of being an agent for the American Government against my own Government and he did it with only three minutes to go in the program and the clock ran out.

It was fair game, and what happened in that incident I think is referred to in Mr. Peter Newman's book. It wasn't the American Ambassador's basement, it was the basement of Chuck Kiselyak, the second secretary of the American Embassy.

When the nuclear crisis was building up he invited a number of the members of the press corps to a party and it happened that the American Ambassador was there and it happened that the nuclear crisis question came up in the conversation.

Senator Macdonald: Just a coincidence?

Mr. Lynch: It was certainly no coincidence, Senator. The import of it, I would perhaps argue, was not apparent at the time and didn't become apparent until some time later when Mr. Diefenbaker openly charged that the American Government was conspiring to overthrow his Government. It hadn't reached that stage at that time.

I subsequently disclosed this much later, as Mr. Diefenbaker said, and he brought the charge that had you said that at the time things might have worked out differently.

Now, I wouldn't attempt to appraise that situation but I would simply agree that these were the circumstances and whether we acted badly in not disclosing, not rushing out and shouting "We are being corrupted by the Americans against our own Government" the ambassador's briefing didn't take that form. It wasn't a briefing about the evils of the Canadian policy. It was a briefing about the merits of the American policy of that time. This was on the question of stationing of Bomarc missiles and the controversial point as to whether or not the Canadian Government had agreed to do so.

I wouldn't want to go beyond that but your opinion on what the right or wrong thing to have done would be as good as Mr. Diefenbaker's or anybody else's.

The Chairman: Senator Hays?

Senator Hays: I was wondering if Miss Fairbairn would define freedom of the press. I should perhaps enlarge on this, the press has always been free, but in these hearings so far we have heard a great deal about freedom of the press.

Some of the briefs have mentioned it as many as six or seven times. I would just like to know how the panel defines freedom of the press. How far do you go and that sort of thing?

Miss Fairbairn: Well, I have been scratching down some things. Right off I should say freedom from censorship of any sort. To me this is extremely important and happily doesn't really come to the fore in Canada. Another would be freedom of movement in your attempt to get information. In our job on the Hill, we have a great deal of freedom of movement, including lobbies and this kind of thing and ministerial offices.

I think also this implies that the press itself must use their own discretion in not abusing this particular freedom. I believe a reporter must have freedom to use one's own judgment in writing a story and not have it imposed upon him by anyone else.

Freedom of access to a politician, to the policy makers, and sometimes I think in Ottawa that we have a little less freedom of access than we should have perhaps. I believe we should have more.

Basically, the freedom to publish of course and freedom to respect the confidentiality of your sources, and particularly in the case of someone like Mr. Lynch, freedom to express your own opinion.

Another thing I would put as a freedom of the press and which is becoming increasingly important and maybe really hasn't been included in the past definition is the freedom to get the fullest possible background information and this is a very important part of our job on Parliament Hill.

I have been here seven and a half years now and it has become increasingly so because things are becoming increasingly complex and very often we have very involved briefs thrown at us and we are supposed to dash it off and hit a deadline with it, often without officials standing by to answer our questions and things like this. I think this was brought out in the Task Force Report as well, that a great deal more should be done along this line.

I mean, we are not Einsteins, we are not PhD's of any sort so we definitely do need help in getting background to information. I believe this should be done to a much greater degree.

Finally, and I couldn't leave this out as a female, freedom from discrimination. This is fairly basic and this is a very, very happy place to work in that respect.

Senator Hays: I would ask Mr. Collister how he defines freedom of the press?

Mr. Collister: Well, a little more briefly. I have just scribbled a few notes down—access to all reasonable information and the right to use that information responsibly and without censorship for the benefit of the public.

Senator Hays: Well, in this context responsibility-wise, do you feel that it would be of benefit to the press to have a national code of ethics that many professions have, for instance like the Bar Society, the medical profession and all this sort of thing?

Mr. Collister: I think ethics in our business—mainly—have to be self-imposed. I think it is something that you feel and you really have to impose on yourself. I think something along the lines of a press council might have a role in this area. This operates in Britain and gives an opinion on lapses which is very effective with a moral authority on the whole media group. Something like that I think might work quite well but just to repeat the other point it is basically a question of your own conduct, your own attitude. You can get and find all kinds of ways to be unethical if you are that kind of a person. It is something that has to be self-imposed.

Senator Hays: Well, would you enlarge on that? I think that the National Press Council of Britain at the moment are censuring...

Mr. Collister: Well, there is a case but I am not aware of any recent cases. But if there is a questionable story in the newspapers that really gives offense to a lot of people, it can be referred to the Press Council which is set up in cooperation with the newspapers themselves and they give their opinion after hearing all the pertinent evidence on whether there has been an ethical lapse.

I am not exactly sure of the details of how it is set up but I believe that is the situation.

Senator Hays: But you would be in favour of a National Press Council?

Mr. Collister: Well, we could consider something like that. I don't really know. If you are thinking in terms of some outside body to look at the question of ethics, I think something like that set up with the cooperation of the media people who police themselves would be the best approach.

Senator Hays: Do you feel it is necessary?

Mr. Collister: I don't really think it is necessary. If the public thinks it is necessary I think one then has to consider that kind of thing. I don't think it is necessary. I think we have been talking in our own area of ethical conduct and Mr. Hull has found great difficulty in finding any cases and I was having the same difficulty.

I am not saying we are pure because there must be a lot of unethical conduct going on but it's not that size of a problem as far as I see it.

Senator Hays: How do you feel about it, Mr. Lynch?

Mr. Lynch: I wouldn't want a codified code of ethics for the profession or the craft or whatever you choose to call it. We do all our work in public, perhaps as much or even more than politicians do, and everything we write and everything we do is available and happens out in the public and can be judged.

I think if one operated as a scoundrel in that milieu he would be immediately judged as one by the public. It is the consumer's right. I think the question of being called to account is an important one and an increasingly important one. I was called to account before the Press Gallery Membership for what was regarded by a majority as a breach of ethics. I didn't mind being called to account because the act I had taken was a deliberate act and the machinery that came into play was machinery that existed. I did doubt though that the body that was judging my ethical conduct was the right one since it was composed so largely of my competitors and people with whom I had no standing on the basis of even professional admiration because we admire one another even less than the doctors and lawyers do, Senator, or even possibly senators do.

I felt then, and this was the basis for the feeling that I have come to, that a press council would have a place in Canada. There are certain difficulties about it because of the geography and I have become convinced that a national press council sitting in a central place would not be feasible in this country because it would be rather grotesque for that council to be considering a case in Vancouver that happened in St. John's, Newfoundland; so I have come to think that if the press council idea has any merit, as I believe it has, it must be on a regional basis. It must be on a regional basis rather than a national one as it is in Britain.

If I say it is becoming more and more important because there are forces at work inside the business or profession or craft. I go back at what Mr. Pierre O'Neill said at the outset, and I thought he went much further than I would care to do, about being reserved about our rights because we work for people that make money. He was implying that the mere fact of having enough money to own a newspaper doesn't give a man a God given right to set the tone of that newspaper and to control the medium of information and opinion of that potency.

There are a lot of things and if you call enough newspaper men before you you will become aware of some of these things that are going on at the working level, in which a number of reporters and the people who write the news are expressing some misgivings about the treatment accorded to the stuff that they write; their copy as it goes into the newspaper. It has even reached the stage in some of the negotiations with the American Newspaper Guild that if a man's story is altered in any way that his name must come off it and that it must not be published under his byline.

As I talk to a lot of the younger people coming into this business, and I think the standard of recruitment is increasing all the time, this feeling I judge is something that is going to increase and the practitioners are going to take more and more of an interest and demand more and more of a say in how their stuff is presented to the public. This, if you like, is partly the influence of television and one of the beauties of television for the reporter or the commentator is that once you are up there and they turn the camera on there is nobody between you and the public. There is no editor, there is no proprietor, there is nothing. You are in business. You are in touch with the people on whatever you came to report or say.

The younger element in newspapers, some of them—I don't say this is a mass thing—are beginning to think somewhat the same way. If there is a responsibility, I believe the responsibility has to rest somewhere. If it is going to be spread around somewhere inside the newspaper apparatus, there will be somebody looking on because young reporters can be even more misguided and desperately wrong in their judgment about what is right or wrong than editors or publishers can be.

I think, as this trend continues inside the business of news reporting and the business of some papers—this is particularly true I think in Quebec where there are signed editorials on the editorial page in which the management disassociates itself from the views expressed. It is done in the signed editorial on the editorial page.

It can be argued that the public interest demands of course some sort of a quasi-judicial apparatus that would judge in extreme cases of misjudgment or malpractice.

Senator Hays: Do you feel that editorials should be signed?

Mr. Lynch: No, I don't. I am old-fashioned enough to think that the editorials should be the views of the newspaper. I think Pierre O'Neill may correct me on the situation in Quebec but the idea of signed editorials has been current there for quite awhile.

The Chairman: Well, we had quite a useful discussion of that last night by Claude Ryan.

Mr. Lynch: There is another thing that has come up, this personal journalism of which I am a practitioner and which is an ancient part of newspapering as well in other countries. It has been less so here. The idea of the political column was not very fashionable in this country till 10 years ago. It has always been a basic part of the business in the United States, in Britain and in Europe but it has a fairly recent history here.

Now, that is another element usually on another page than the editorial page; but I rather like the idea that the paper says it and here is what it says in the editorial.

Senator Hays: Do you feel then that in your particular case, what you say should also be put on the editorial page?

Mr. Lynch: Oh no. I think it probably should not. A page has been created in many newspapers just for this sort of thing, opposite the editorial page, where features and background material and columns appear.

I think that is the proper place. The mood of the page is different. I can say things, I can do things in print that the paper can't really do. If you read the thing you will see what I mean. I can resort to humour and anecdote and all sorts of things in a personal vein that just don't lend themselves for treatment when the paper is speaking.

Sometimes the paper will have an editorial writer who writes in a lighter vein and his things usually very quickly become recognizable and he usually winds up becoming a columnist opposite the editorial page but I would certainly think that a column such as mine is better on the other page which has come to be known—there is nothing sacred about this—as that kind of a page where you get reflective stuff of a more personal kind than you should expect from the editorial columns.

Senator Hays: Mr. O'Neill, in this same context, a man has been charged with rape and later is found innocent, but he was named in the newspaper and it is in this context that I mean a code of ethics—for someone who is charged with a crime and that sort of thing.

Do you think there should be a national code of ethics to just prevent this sort of thing? Once he is tabbed, he is probably guilty. So many people say that "Where there is smoke there is fire". So he is already guilty insofar as the public is concerned.

Mr. O'Neill: Well, I would agree that a national press council of some sort would be very useful. As Mr. Lynch has said it would be very useful and sometimes necessary. My reservations are the same ones.

I think that it may not be practical if it is on a national basis for all the reasons that he mentioned. I understand that Mr. Ryan yesterday dealt with this as well. Any press council really to be efficient should be regionally based but certainly I would have no objection to a press council to deal with the sort of faults that you mentioned.

Senator Hays: Mr. Hull, on the structural makeup of the Parliamentary Press Gallery what are your views on that?

Mr. Hull: Whether we should have a code of ethics in the press gallery?

Senator Hays: Yes.

Mr. Hull: No. We couldn't ever possibly agree on one.

Senator Hays: Well, let us take an example. When Parliament adjourns and news dries up and you decide to make the cabinet over and it never happens?

Mr. Hull: Maybe we could convince the Prime Minister he shouldn't do it.

Mr. Collister: That doesn't mean that the story wasn't valid when it was written.

Mr. Hull: Yes, they often change their minds. I wouldn't classify that as a breach of ethics just because somebody writes a speculative story and it doesn't come true. If that was the case, we would be spending all of our time appearing before the press council.

Senator Hays: You mean in the making of the news?

Mr. Hull: No, I am saying this hypothetically. Somebody could always accuse us of writing a speculative story if they didn't like it.

Senator Hays: Do you believe that outside of the press gallery there should be a press council?

Mr. Hull: I support entirely the view expressed by the Windsor Star yesterday where Mr. Farrell supported the three levels of a press council.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: Mr. Lynch mentioned in the early stages that there were some areas of concern or some areas that were worrisome, I believe he said, in the guidelines from the committee. Would you like to elaborate on that?

Mr. Lynch: Yes. It is not very profound, Senator. I mentioned this earlier this morning. I worry about the very fact of the people that we write about calling us to account, in effect, as is done in the guidelines, and probing beyond the question of ownership about which I spoke earlier as well; we must all give accounts, proprietors and workers alike.

I worry about the players calling the critics before them. I worry about the usefulness and I worry about its inhibiting effect upon the critics. And the guidelines—it seems to me that when they go into the area that we are into now—I am enjoying myself enormously—but I still have a feeling of unease. That is, it is the Senate that is doing this and that I may want to go out of here this afternoon and for good and valid reasons have something to say about the Senate on some other matter—this might be an intrusion into the question of my absolute freedom to approach a question without prejudice.

I had that misgiving when I read the guidelines and I pointed it out in a piece I wrote and then I swallowed that misgiving and said "Well, darn it, if we are going to insist upon the kind of freedom that I insist upon then we are callable to account."

I think that the whole of the newspaper business and the media in general reacted in the same way. It could have reacted in another way. There was a bitchy way to react to the guidelines as well and it was interesting I think that I don't think anybody did. Everybody, I am sure, had the same twinge that I had, of misgiving, when a public body like the Senate, and particularly the Senate because I don't think there is any body that I have written about so consistently in a critical vein as the Senate, suddenly saying "Okay, you come on. We are going to ask you some questions." And possibly—I think some of the witnesses who appeared earlier expressed some misgivings about what you may do. You may come in with recommendations about the framework within which people like myself operate or you may take the initiative, and I think it would be commendable if it was the Senate that took the steps to establish a press council.

I would hope that maybe somebody else would beat you to the gun on that one so at least it would not have this quasi-official origin of coming from a public body. If it doesn't work out that way and if you do have the initiative, nobody else will bell the cat, then it is there and obviously you gentlemen will make what you like of it. That is what I meant by misgivings.

I thought that once they went beyond proprietorship, which I agree is an legitimate subject of public concern—and I work as you know for one of the largest groups of newspapers and I argue that they have enriched the papers rather than impoverished the papers that they buy—but that's another matter.

I thought that as an extension of the Combines Investigation Act of the law of the land, that was a faultless area, but once you came into the area of freedom of the press and my professional attitude and qualifications and that sort of thing, I spoke a little bit about it.

Here we are and we are doing it and that is what I meant by misgivings.

Senator Sparrow: In your remarks on concentration of ownership—would you like to elaborate on that a little further? Are you suggesting that there are areas where we should have in-depth studies and that type of thing?

Mr. Lynch: Well, I am quite sure you are going to do that. The guidelines are very specific on that and you will be calling all the witnesses that will speak to that question. I wouldn't want to discuss it in any way except possibly in response to questions about how I might think it affected the news content of the paper and there I could talk only about our own—about the Southam Newspapers. I could make the case from my own conviction that by spending half a million dollars a year on the operation in which I am involved, which is only a small part of the Southam News operation, that any given paper is a richer paper in terms of news content from our own Canadian sources, national and international. It is a richer paper than it could have been otherwise.

I would argue for the enriching aspect of the pooled budget of a half million dollar operation operating for 11 papers rather than each paper trying to sustain its own bureaus in Ottawa and around the world which, in many cases, would be impossible.

I have a vested interest in that and I think you would be more interested if I was indicting the company and saying that I think it has been a poisonous influence in the news business of the country.

The Chairman: Well, the Southam Company is coming after Christmas as you know.

Mr. Lynch: Yes, I realize that.

Senator Sparrow: To branch out a little further. The group here today represents news gathering on a national basis, particularly as it affects the Federal Government, and it appears to me in our hearings that we are not going to be getting down to the grass roots reporter particularly as it affects the weekly magazines. What influence economics and perhaps politics plays in the news gathering, in the reporting and editing and headlining of news in all papers but in particular, say, weekly magazines.

Some of you have come up through the ranks I think of weeklies, and small dailies and so on. Do you feel from your experience economics and politics play a part in these areas of gathering and publishing, et cetera?

The Chairman: Are you talking specifically about news magazines?

Senator Sparrow: Weekly newspapers more than anything else.

The Chairman: To whom did you put the question, Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: To anyone who might care to answer it.

Mr. Collister: Well, I have no experience of weeklies or magazines. I think it is fair to say that economics and politics do have an influence on the policies of newspapers and the ways stories are played. There is always the strong advertiser influence—a good advertiser seems to get better results than others—and it takes a certain political position as a matter of course. And a man of that political coloration might get a better deal.

That is the kind of political and economic influence I would say.

Senator Hays: In that context you do believe that there are pressures then?

Mr. Collister: Well, they are not spelled out. They are there. Most newspapers have a political label and they may try to hide it but it is there. It would seem to me having a little experience here, it might be easier for a Conservative candidate to get a play in a Conservative paper than a Liberal candidate.

Senator Hays: Are you saying three pages of advertising might influence the newspaper?

Mr. Collister: I am not saying that.

Senator Hays: For the politician for instance?

Mr. Collister: No, not for the politician, for the advertiser. I can't spell out cases but obviously a good advertiser gets a better hearing than somebody else.

Mr. Hull: I disagree. I think that's nonsense. I have never known a case in my life where I could care less what an advertiser wants, and I don't think our paper ever cared less what an advertiser says.

Mr. Collister: Well, I think you are being just a little bit idealistic.

Mr. Hull: No, I am not.

Mr. Lynch: Well, if you won't spell out cases—I believe you should. I can spell out a case in reverse. Lawrence Freiman, who is a distinguished citizen of this City and a major advertiser in the papers and a friend of mine, has often come to me and pleaded with me and said, "Can you get the Citizen to at least treat me like any ordinary citizen"—that is the Ottawa Citizen—and they have written critically about him in connection with—I think the latest example has to do with the Art Centre, but he has had several cases in which he was written about in the paper and in every case he was frantic saying "Somebody over there isn't treating me properly. Just because I buy 18 pages of advertising, do I have to get kicked around this way".

There is a case of the reverse influence.

Mr. Collister: Well, would you agree with my original statement?

Mr. Lynch: No, not in my own experience. This is a very broad and deeply based suspicion about the newspapers and all I could say is that I have not seen it operate since my days in the St. John's Citizen, Senator McElman.

The Chairman: Did you see it operate then?

Mr. Lynch: Yes, I did. You have forced me now to go on. This was a small struggling newspaper which wound up being owned by Mr. K. C. Irving and sold by him to the other paper which he subsequently acquired.

I think I would have to say that our treatment at that time of the Irving interests in that small struggling paper, certainly perhaps before the present proprietor happened to bring him in and get his bankroll working in the hopes that that paper could go—it didn't—it lasted only three years, were similar to—I think you mentioned the pressures and the question was asked in connection with weekly newspapers. It used to be a dream in my business—every newspaper man wanted to grow up and own a weekly. That was thought to be the place where you achieved freedom beyond your wildest dreams.

You will be talking to weeklies here but I gather from talking to my colleagues who become proprietors in the weeklies that the economics of that business are so treacherous and so difficult that they become obsessed with it, and without being told to be nice to anybody they are just nice to people who are going to bring something into the till.

This is of course, unless they want to commit suicide. Now, that is not true of all weeklies. There are some very prosperous ones but the small weekly. I think is terribly sensitive to community pressures of all kinds.

This is not true of the dailies. Certainly, when you get into a further broadening of the base—I work for 11 papers of varied political views—you become completely free of it.

One of the beauties of what is sometimes called the chain operation—we prefer to call it a group operation—is that whatever the prejudices of one or the other of those news papers, they don't reach me in a meaningful way. As long as I can get and keep them all fighting among one another politically and every other way I am free to an abnormal extent to report the news as I see it.

Senator Hays: As a reporter have you ever been asked to just lay off this in your lifetime?

Mr. Lynch: No. Not since Saint John.

The Chairman: Mr. Collister, would you like to add anything to this?

Mr. Collister: No.

Senator Sparrow: Just one further comment. You mentioned that weekly newspapers were coming but it's just the weekly publishers themselves not the news gathering people.

The Chairman: Well, in the weeklies it's often the same people and I would say, Senator Sparrow, that we have some working press people coming here from the dailies, from the radio and television stations and in the case of the weeklies we are having an open forum to which we have asked every weekly publisher in the country and we have been heartened by the response. And as Mr. Lynch points out quite properly, very often with the weeklies the publisher is the working press man as well.

Senator Prowse: I am a little concerned about this question of the idea that advertisers can kick newspapers around. Would it be fair for us to assume that this is one of the myths that come out from the day when you had many small papers locally set up and the publisher of the paper and the advertiser were probably good friends—back in that era like your Saint John episode?

In other words, this is a carry-over where the sins of fathers are being now felt by the present generation. Would that be a fair statement?

Mr. Lynch: I would hope it is. It is fair in my experience. I would suggest that you are asking the wrong people here and that you will have witnesses who are more qualified than us. If you wanted to ask about political bias I think that would be fair.

The actual operation of a newspaper and the pressures that exist on the getting out of a paper are not pressures that come anywhere near me or anybody else on this panel.

The Chairman: Senator Everett?

Senator Everett: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question on the concentration of ownership because these people have powers in the editorial world. I would like to hear their comments but it may be off the subject as far as you concerned.

The Chairman: What specifically did you want to ask? Are you concerned about the concentration?

Senator Everett: Well, Mr. Chairman, I would like to address my question specifically to Mr. O'Neill. When Mr. Ryan was here last night he made the case against chain ownership. He said that it tended to create mediocrity and that the chain owners restricted the use of features and services by generally employing one service and distributing it to all their papers.

He also mentioned that the chain owners were concerned really with the dollar and not with the editorial quality, that the publisher and editor of a chain-owned newspaper quite often suffered from a subtle form of intimidation; that the staff of chain-owned newspapers had a minimal community interest and very often were from outside the community and had little knowledge of the community.

Now, I am not sure that I am reporting him exactly because he spoke in French and I don't understand French and the translation didn't come over quite as fast as I think it might have so I apologize if I am not quoting him correctly. I think, that that is what I got out of it from what he said.

He went on to say that while he was opposed to chain-ownership, when we asked him what he thought should be done, he said that he didn't think it should be done away with but perhaps there should be a community participation up to say 50 per cent of the value of the newspaper involved.

Now, the chain-owners of course will tell you that they have saved many newspapers from going under; that they have made newspapers that were hobbling along with minimal profits or even losing money, into very profitable operations. As a result of that they have been able to commit more funds to increasing their editorial quality, that they themselves because they had interest only in the dollars and minimal interest in the editorial quality are prepared to allow those editorial persons to determine the quality of their papers and that they are really through chain-ownership giving the public a service and improving the quality of our newspapers.

Now, I apologize for the preamble but I have two questions.

The Chairman: Well may I say, Senator Everett, before you put the questions which I think you should put I think I will say to the people who are here that they should feel free not to answer the question. I think that is the kind of question which given the nature of their presence here today—you shouldn't feel compelled to answer it.

At the same time if any of you wish to comment on it, that is also quite clear.

Senator Everett: Well, my question would be this. Does in your judgment editorial quality suffer through chain-ownership and whether it does or does not would it be wise, would be in the best interest of the public if the chains were required to permit a percentage of community participation—that's not public participation, that's community participation as Mr. Ryan defined it? I direct that question to you, Mr. O'Neill, if you wish to answer it.

Mr. O'Neill: Well, in answering, I will be very brief. In answer to the first question, I can only speak about my experience of reading for instance, Quebec newspapers. The concentration there is very recent. I wouldn't agree with Mr. Ryan that since we have this concentration the quality has deteriorated very much. I disagree with this. I am not saying that the quality has been better but I don't agree that the quality of newspapers who are in this concentration now has deteriorated since a year or two.

On the second question, I think I would agree with him that community participation would be essential if we wanted to avoid uniformity, and especially important in Quebec. If columns are going to come from English Canada or from the United States and if they were the only ones that we would be able to read in French Canadian newspapers, I think that is a great danger and therefore I would agree with him that community participation would lessen that danger and correct partly the problem of concentration and uniformity.

The Chairman: Is there anyone else who would like to comment on that?

Mr. Lynch: Well, I have said quite a bit about this from the news side; you will be hearing from the witnesses on the proprietorship side but I would simply want to say something that bothers me.

There was an article written by—I think by Mr. Ken Lefolli of Saturday Night addressed to you I believe, Senator...

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Lynch: Before this hearing started and he made a reference to canned news and I found that objectionable. I got the same tone in one part of your question, Senator, that somehow the kind of news that is inflicted on group newspapers in a group way is negative and cheapens the paper.

Senator Everett: That was the impression I received.

Mr. Lynch: I would want to make the counter argument and say that the kind of news and I think you have to consider your groups, as I am sure you will, your chains individually, because they are not like one another at all. Ours is the only one, the Southam, that does maintain a news service in a formal and recognizable way and with a formal and very recognizable and very sizable budget.

I would argue that far from impoverishing that paper or changing its character for the worse, the opposite was true. By spending these sizable amounts on completely Canadian coverage, that is Canadians competing with news agencies around the world and sustaining as many bureaus as we do, that this is an enriching factor.

Senator Everett: Do you have a view on community participation?

Mr. Lynch: I would prefer to leave that. I think this would be a basic question that you will be asking the proprietors and I would leave that up to them. I would have some ideas of what the answer should be in our case but again, its not my area. I find that our papers are very much involved in the communities in which they exist and some of them of course are very old papers.

Under the present proprietorship, the Southam newspaper group is unusual in that sense.

Senator Everett: One of the things that worries me in the course you are taking—I just want to mention this and then drop it...

The Chairman: Is this a question?

Senator Everett: No, this is a comment. One of the things that worries me is that we have heard this from the editorialists before, that that is the problem of the publisher or the proprietor or the chain owner, and it seems to me that we are going to get generally one view from them. They have roughly the same interests. Mr. Farrell yesterday demonstrated that there can be disagreements but generally we are probably going to get the same view from them. I wonder if it is not a mistake for you to take that attitude and whether or not it would be better for you to weigh in and to put your views on the record.

Mr. Lynch: Well, my job with the proprietor is simply to extract as much money from them as I can for the reporters that work for the news services.

I have been sufficiently successful at that but some of them think that I am some kind of a maniac and I love that and I make no apologies for it.

Certainly, if I can double the budget again in the next 10 years or more I will certainly try to do it. The point is that prior to this decade we have just finished, it would have been impossible because there existed among Canadian publishers the thesis that news was something that came up with the rations, that you didn't have to pay for it, particularly world news. They have got over that now and they don't think that way. Something took over—either sanity prevailed or they have all gone nuts or something.

They are spending money on news and it is my job to egg them on. I simply say that we have had a measure of success.

Mr. Collister: It is not really related to the main question but my observation of the chain system in action, it does produce, I think, fewer informed reporters. What happens is that for economic reasons they decide, say, to cover a national story in the Yukon with a Yukon reporter instead of sending someone from Ottawa who knows his field because this makes sense in dollars and cents.

I am not sure whether the public in cases like that gets as good service as they did before.

The Chairman: May I put a question to Mr. Hull. Presumably, and I think you have already stated, there is some type of a bylaw in your constitution—that is the constitution of the press gallery—which disallows a member of the gallery, or the national press corps as Mr. Lynch prefers, from having some other activity which you regard as a conflict of interest.

Presumably if a member of the gallery was on a retaining fee from let's say some national association who are lobbying a particular position that would be a conflict of interest, would it not?

Mr. Hull: Well, I don't know. I think we have to be very careful...

The Chairman: Well, let's take a hypothetical question. I don't really want to say it's a hypothetical question but supposing drug manufacturers or the drug industry were to retain a member of the gallery for public relations purposes. Would that be a conflict of interest?

Mr. Hull: I would think so. Defining public relations and making sure that we don't infringe on what a man does in his own private life outside the gallery.

The Chairman: Well, the interpretation you gave us earlier was—if I understood it—if it is journalistic activity it is fair game.

Mr. Collister: The cut-off point, Senator, is when government-paid-for facilities are used to promote some other lobbying or public relations interest. What a man does in his own time at his own expense even if he is a member of the press gallery surely would be in a different category.

The Chairman: Surely there are instances where members of the press gallery are covering events—committee activities for example or indeed debates of the House of Commons when legislation is being dealt with, which may or may not affect a particular interest—wouldn't a reporter—have a vested interest if he was on a retainer from that company?

Mr. Collister: Yes. This is a question of ethical conduct. I don't believe the gallery can go into a man's private life and that type of thing.

Senator Prowse: We weren't asking you about the gallery because you are not here as the gallery.

The Chairman: Except, Senator Prowse, I am asking Mr. Hull in his capacity as president of the gallery. I am just curious to know what steps are taken to check on that kind of activity on the part of the members of the gallery?

Mr. Hull: You can't check it.

The Chairman: So presumably there is no way of knowing whether a member of the gallery has some outside vested interest in some kind of activity which he is covering?

Mr. Collister: But I think it is fair to say that if information is brought in we would look into it.

Mr. Hull: Yes, Ron, if it was brought in.

The Chairman: It has been brought to your attention?

Mr. Hull: No, if it was brought in.

The Chairman: What would happen to that person?

Mr. Collister: Well, I don't think it has arisen.

The Chairman: Is it a totally hypothetical question?

Mr. Collister: No, I am sure there are people around the press gallery who have some other interest but whether they conflict or not I don't know. If a case was brought to the attention of the committee they would have to look at it and give it their attention.

Senator Prowse: I am interested in—you write, Mr. Lynch, for 11 newspapers?

Mr. Lynch: Yes.

Senator Prowse: I believe you write a daily column?

Mr. Lynch: Five days a week, yes.

Senator Prowse: A good reasonable week. Do all of the papers carry all of your columns or is there some selection by the individual papers?

Mr. Lynch: They have the complete freedom of selection, Senator, and it varies from paper to paper. I think it is fair to say that the bulk of the papers carry it as a regular feature. Not all of them do so.

Senator Prowse: Then in your attempt at objectivity, and I give you full credit for attempting as a professional to get this, it's not possible in every column which you do to reflect complete objectivity in your view of public figures?

Mr. Lynch: Well, the word objectivity is a bit hard to define here.

Senator Prowse: Well, we know what we are talking about.

Mr. Lynch: One tries to be—I would prefer the word fair.

Senator Prowse: All right, fairness. Let's take fairness.

Mr. Lynch: If you are out to deliver a pointed comment it is going to wind up that way if it is any good at all.

Senator Prowse: Do all of these papers have the same political view?

Mr. Lynch: No. No, they don't. I think again you will be hearing more about this when the Southam witnesses are here but there is a tradition in the Southam papers, and there has been for years, about editorial independence. They are all over the map politically and sometimes they change from direction to direction.

The Chairman: May I interrupt you just one moment.

Mr. Lynch: Yes.

The Chairman: Last night when Mr. Claude Ryan was here, we talked about this and he referred, if I quote him correctly from the translation, to a "somewhat guarded kind of freedom". Would you comment on that?

Mr. Lynch: I wouldn't say so in terms of politics or the editorial tone of the papers. The head office in the Southam company has always been to me almost unbelievably detached from what the papers are doing editorially. They boasted about this in their company's prospectus and in their annual report. Sometimes it has even been suggested that this hasn't been very enlightened but they have insisted upon it.

I suppose, if you want to put it this way, it makes my work easier as a political commentator in pitching down such a variety of bowling alleys and as I say even if they wanted to impose a direction on me there would never be any unanimity and it has never come up.

Senator Prowse: Well, the question that I am getting at is this: Have you noticed that there has been a tendency for them to either select or to reject columns? Does this selection or rejection—do you have any knowledge as to whether or not they are keeping them?

Mr. Lynch: Oh yes. I check the usage and of course as a practitioner I would be delighted if they used them all. Either as a columnist or the chief of the news services, I have no say in what is done with our material when it reaches the papers. In fact, I have always sensed that they are much more critical of our material than they are of material that they get for example from the Canadian Press or from their own reporters. They are hypercritical of our material perhaps because it costs them so much money; perhaps it is again this exercise of individual participation and they lean over backwards to find fault with us because we haven't done something or because we have overdone something. This is the sort of judgment that comes into making up a newspaper.

Senator Prowse: Or the man who lifts his head above the ordinary level can expect to get it chopped off?

Mr. Lynch: Well, as I say, everything we do is done in public to the ultimate degree.

Senator Prowse: Have you noticed that there is a tendency in selection of the material or the selection of your articles to reflect the political thinking of the particular paper?

Mr. Lynch: I don't think so, Senator. I had an exchange with one of our newspapers about this; it was the one and only time in 12 years when I was worried about it and we haggled about it and again it was a judgment value. The paper in question told me at that time that the reason the column wasn't being used was because it wasn't very good and if I ever got around to writing a good one they would use it. I didn't like that very much but it was a pretty pointed answer.

Senator Prowse: Believe it or not, I have heard the same thing but not about you.

In other words you would say your image in which you have a vested interest of appearing to the public as a reliable and fair person has not been infringed upon by the editorial right or the exercise of the editorial prerogative of the various papers.

In other words they just don't take the things that are favourable to their point of view and reject the ones where maybe you might be kicking somebody?

Mr. Lynch: No, they have complete freedom to do that.

Senator Prowse: They have the freedom?

Mr. Lynch: I haven't suffered from that.

Senator Prowse: In that you have not felt at any time that your own personal image has been hurt by the prejudicial selection of an editor?

Mr. Lynch: Well, any time they spike a column by not running it they are hurting me to the quick. They are hitting me in my most sensitive spot.

Senator Prowse: But what I am getting at is that in a particular paper is it giving the public a different image of Charles Lynch's column?

Mr. Lynch: In the one incident that I mentioned my complaint was based on that sort of misgiving and as I said we argued it out and I got the reply that I told you about. It was rather unanswerable so the matter ended and the problem ended and they didn't continue to spike the column.

Senator Prowse: They ran it instead of spiked it afterwards, did they?

Mr. Lynch: Well, an election intervened and this was part of the background.

Senator Prowse: Now, I would like to give the same kind of question to Miss Fairbairn. You are not writing a signed column, you are sending news?

Miss Fairbairn: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Now, in the selection of that news you are going to have a column one day that may be favourable to one political thing and over a period of time you will try to get a balance but you can't do it all at one time. You can't do it all in one story, can you?

Miss Fairbairn: Well, I can answer your basic question very simply, Senator Prowse. In the five years that I have been working for the papers in F.P. Publication, I have never on any occasions been directed to write a story in a certain way and I have never noticed the way my stories have been played in the various papers. There has been this selective process but this is sometimes a thing that all of us have a large gripe about, that sometimes our stuff doesn't get used on a particular day and nine times out of ten that is the basic problem.

Senator Prowse: Your best paragraphs are always killed.

Miss Fairbairn: There is very little or no interference in our stuff from Ottawa.

The Chairman: Miss Fairbairn, I don't want to be technical but you said nine times out of ten. Does that mean that one time out of ten it isn't?

Miss Fairbairn: No. I get very hot under the collar about this.

Senator Prowse: Now, Mr. Collister, you have a very difficult job because as I said to somebody yesterday you have 100 bosses—you have what; 22 million?

Mr. Collister: Yes, whatever the figure is.

Senator Prowse: What technique do you use or what criteria do you use in order to maintain—let's say fairness instead of...

The Chairman: I am delighted to let Mr. Collister answer that but I want to say that there are corporations coming and I am sure those are the kinds of questions we will be bringing up then. If you would like to answer you might as well.

Senator Prowse: I would sooner hear the newspaperman—the guy who writes the stories rather than the guy who buys the services.

Mr. Collister: You are right. I am committed to presenting what is happening in the fairest possible way. What this involves in a day by day sense is to establish what seems to be the main news story of the day and sell this to the C.B.C. people in Toronto, if this is in fact a news story, and nine times out of ten they will accept it. They will accept my judgment and this puts a responsibility on me and it is a very sensitive responsibility because you can never please everybody and there is obviously criticism from time to time. But if anyone criticizes me I consciously absorb the criticism and see if they have a point and over a period of time I try to put the record straight. You can't achieve, you know, this idealistic fairness all the time but I consciously work at it and maybe I succeed and maybe I don't.

Miss Fairbairn: Senator Davey, if I might at this point I would like just as a matter of record to clear up something that the committee may have read in the Task Force on Information in the section again dealing with the press gallery.

In this discussion of groups or chains or whatever you want to call them our operation here is set up completely differently from Southam.

In the Task Force on Information it says the Max Bell newspapers (Free Press Publications) have one correspondent accredited to the gallery. Some of the papers in this chain have men of their own there as well and just for the record I thought I would jot it down exactly; I thought I would tell you that for all the papers in our chain, the total strength of the press gallery is 17.

The Chairman: So you think the Task Force is quite misleading?

Miss Fairbairn: Well, yes.

Senator Prowse: May I ask just one other question?

The Chairman: You may, Senator Prowse, but I would just like to say before you put the question that I am going to try to adjourn—there is a great deal of interest in this session, however I am going to try to adjourn by 12.30.

Senator Prowse: I am assuming that we all generally agree on what is meant by freedom of the press but it seems to me that there are three aspects to it.

One is the freedom of the public to be fully informed. Two: the freedom of the writer to write what he believes to be true and fair and three, the right of the publisher to determine the selection of news.

Now, starting and going down the line, Mr. Lynch, would you say that the publisher of a paper exercises his interest in freedom of the press or ought to exercise it in trust for the public to whom the larger freedom belongs?

Mr. Lynch: I don't think it is that simple, Senator. I think that what does into the paper is seldom the publisher's thinking. I would prefer the editor.

Senator Prowse: All right, the editor.

Mr. Lynch: That term is rather vague and it varies from paper to paper. The person who decides the shape of the paper from day to day is going to be a professional news person.

Senator Prowse: Well, may I just straighten it out. We get from various materials that we receive, particularly in the form of briefs, we get the suggestion that the freedom of the press is being interpreted by some people who will be in front of us as the right of the owner of the paper to print what he darn well pleases.

Now, against that background could you answer the question?

Mr. Lynch: It is a trust, of course. It is a public trust. It is not like owning a cotton mill or a local department store or any other enterprise in the community. It does carry with it special and almost mysterious responsibility to the community and I agree.

I think that most—what I would call—enlightened proprietors would agree. You can ask the proprietors that but as to whether or not it is a public trust I agree entirely. There is something very special about the proprietorship of a newspaper.

Senator Prowse: Would anyone else like to comment?

Mr. Collister: Just on the economics of the situation and the situation generally. This prevents a publisher from running a paper just as he darn well pleases.

I agree with Mr. Lynch entirely that he does have this public trust and in most of the cases that I have come in contact with he exercises it pretty well.

Senator Prowse: Unless he has another interest.

Senator Hays: Just one quick question. Mr. O'Neill, is the French reporter handicapped in any way in Ottawa?

Mr. O'Neill: Perhaps not a French reporter but a French newspaper.

Senator Hays: A French speaking reporter?

Mr. O'Neill: A French newspaper, a French speaking newspaper would be. I think we are handicapped—of course, if you want to report here you have to be bilingual and if you are not you are handicapped, but our English-speaking colleagues have the same handicap. They have the same handicap if they don't speak French, especially now they have that problem as well.

I don't think that otherwise we are handicapped, but newspapers are because the service from the agency as Mr. Ryan explained here last night is not quite satisfactory. They don't really get the complete flow of news that comes here in time to print it and therefore our newspapers are handicapped. I don't think we are. I believe that is all I would care to say.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: I have two questions, Mr. Chairman. The first has to do with the protection of sources.

The Chairman: Who are you putting the question to, Senator?

Senator McElman: Perhaps Mr. Hull. I was thinking of protection of sources such as reporters in the ordinary course of their activities; but forgetting that and getting to the legal aspect of it, when the matter is before the criminal courts and the information is dealt with by the courts and is felt to be germane to the reaching of justice, should the reporter still have a right to protect the source?

Mr. Hull: I think it would depend a great deal on the circumstances of the case. I would think that the weight should always be on the right of the reporter to protect his source unless there is an extreme reason why he should not.

Senator McElman: Well, this is why I mentioned it as a criminal case before a criminal court and the source being germane to the reaching of justice.

Mr. Hull: Yes, I think in cases like that that there has to be some public obligation if it is that important to the reaching of justice, yes.

Senator Prowse: A murderer that I have interviewed has confessed to me as a reporter but says, "Don't use this", but somehow the crown prosecutor gets the idea that maybe the guy told me this. Is it for my conscience or the court?

Senator Davey: I am sorry; Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: The question was in relation to a reporter, not a barrister.

Senator Prowse: No, I was a reporter at the time.

Mr. Hull: Well, if they don't divulge it I suppose they could be subject to contempt of court.

Senator Prowse: Would this worry you?

Mr. Hull: I think so. I would hate to be put in a position to have to make that judgment.

The Chairman: Senator McElman has a second question.

Senator McElman: It's not in particular addressed to the gallery but perhaps to Mr. Lynch because of the nature of the writing he does and his experience and the fact that he has already referred to two cases, and with your particular knowledge of the total picture in New Brunswick and your experience there as a working reporter and practitioner training for a profession.

When one conglomerate with wide interests that reach into all aspects, major aspects of the economy of that particular jurisdiction also owns or controls all of the daily newspapers in the English language and television which covers better than half of the province, and radio interests, would you feel that this could inhibit the editorial freedom of the publisher, editor and so on involved in that medium?

Mr. Lynch: Well, I think you are going to be getting into this one more deeply.

Senator McElman: I appreciate that.

Mr. Lynch: But I believe your question answers itself. You have to probe however into the motives of the person who assembles this media package if you like. My own experience, which I can speak to and did speak to for some 33 years—but I don't think you are investigating media as they were 33 years ago. If you were, a lot of the answers that you have received today would have been different. It was another world.

Senator Prowse: It would be a very interesting hearing.

Mr. Lynch: It might be a very interesting hearing and I could speak to that. I have been away from that for 30 years and have observed much less closely the situation that you speak about.

I would simply reply, not too evasively I hope, but I think your question answers itself.

The Chairman: Senator MacDonald?

Senator Macdonald: Early in the hearing one of the witnesses told us about the great turnover in the members of the press gallery. Would you have any figures to show how many members say had been there for 10 years or more?

Mr. Collister: No, sir, I haven't got that. Just this morning I counted them up in that particular case.

The Chairman: I am sure that would be a job for you to send that to us?

Mr. Hull: Well, I am not sure. I believe you can just take the press gallery list and you can very easily...

The Chairman: Yes, you can let us know.

Senator Macdonald: Would any members of the panel like to express their views on the idea of having a central information bureau operated by the government instead of the various parts having their own information department?

The Chairman: Well, that is a question which may take a long time to answer.

Mr. O'Neill: I will just say this and I will come back to something I said at the very beginning. I think the government as has been pointed out in the report has not only the right but the duty to involve itself in information directly to the people, which brings me to qualify what I said earlier about our right to know as a press gallery. I said I didn't think there was a right. I said this because press galleries have a tendency to consider that they have exclusive rights to political information that comes from Parliament and I say that is not so. We don't have this exclusive right and I don't think we have this as a right.

We have a privilege. I say that the people have a right to be informed but I say that the responsibility to inform the people is ours and it is also the government's responsibility and it is also all sorts of other groups' responsibility.

That is why I said we didn't have this fundamental right or we didn't have it as an exclusive right on political news that comes from here but on the government information services, I think it is urgent that they do it as a duty to the people of Canada.

Mr. Lynch: I would agree to the extent that operative information, the kind of information that has to do with the operation of programs and so on, tends to get through our sieve and we can't claim that we are equipped to handle that kind of volume of regional-interest or special-interest news, and to that extent I think the government information service is deficient and could possibly be improved in the way the Task Force recommended.

I would be very worried if, as I have some reason to suspect, the government people are thinking of larger types of information in the area that we generally deal with and wanted to set up channels of information directly to the public for what I would refer to as propaganda.

I would think that the experience in the many countries where this has been tried would tell us that that would be pernicious and the effects of it in terms of the public interest would be negative and I am very worried about that aspect of the Task Force's recommendation. They are worried about it as well. They have taken time out several times to express their own awareness of that danger. I just happen to feel a little more strongly about the danger than they do.

The Chairman: Mr. Collister?

Mr. Collister: I would just like to say I agree with the government agency. I think it is a good suggestion and it is long overdue because there is quite a problem existing.

Mr. Hull: If it improves information to the public and to the press gallery and doesn't impede our news gathering I think it would be fine.

The Chairman: May I on behalf of the Committee say thank you to the members of the gallery who have been here this morning and may I say I hope we have done no violence to your fierce spirit of independence. I don't think we have. It may be that later in the hearings we may want, if you would be agreeable—I am not saying we will to ask you back.

Mr. Hull: I may say that in drafting our opening statement we made it quite clear that perhaps we may have cause to come back here.

The Chairman: Please let us know.

Mr. Hull: To answer something that may arise.

The Chairman: By all means.

The committee adjourned.

(Upon resuming at 2.30 p.m.)

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, before we turn to this afternoon's hearing, may I make one correction relating to this morning's hearing for the record and for the purposes of the press and for the Senators.

I inadvertently referred to Mr. O'Neill as the representative in the Press Gallery of Le Devoir. He is the representative of La Presse. I think we should have that on the record.

This afternoon we are going to receive three briefs. The first is from Armadale Company Ltd.; the second is from the Regina Leader-Post Ltd., and the third is from the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix Ltd.

Now I should make clear at the outset that this will be a joint presentation with one leaving off and the other beginning.

On my immediate right is the President of the Armadale Company Ltd., Mr. Michael Sifton. Mr. Sifton, I should make clear to you—as I have to others who appear—that the written briefs were requested three weeks in advance and were received three weeks in advance.

The briefs have been circulated to the Senators and the members of the Committee have studied the briefs. I think, for the purposes of the presentation this afternoon, we can take your various briefs as read.

I thought that we would now allow you some time to summarize the contents of it, to expand or to explain or to use the time as you will.

Honourable Senators, Mr. Sifton will explain this in a moment or two, but as part of this introductory period there is a film which he wants to show the committee. We will be delighted to see this.

I think, if we go according to our guidelines, we will allow the prescribed 15 minutes for each one of these three briefs. There will be at your disposal some 45 minutes. In any event, you can use the time as you wish. You certainly do not need feel you must use that much time for your presentation.

The Senators will ask questions on the contents of your brief, on the remarks you are about to make, and probably on the film. They will ask any questions that may occur to them.

First of all, would you do us the courtesy of introducing the balance of your panel.

Mr. Michael Sifton, President, Armadale Company Limited: Mr. Chairman, Honourable members of the committee, ladies and gentlemen: Appearing with me in support of our brief are Mr. Harold Crittenden, the executive officer for Broadcasting Interests; operating assistant, Mr. Jim Grisenthwaite; Mr. Preston Balmer, the chief executive of our print interests; Mr. William Thomson, Executive Vice President of the Regina Leader-Post Editor of the Leader-Post, Mr. Scotty Melville; representing the Star-Phoenix is Mr. M. Macdonald, the Editor.

Also in attendance are Mr. Jim Struthers, General Manager of CKCK-TV Television; Ron Lamborne, General Manager of CKOC; Mr. Robert Macdonald, General Manager of CKRC Radio; and Gary Miles, General Manager of CKCK.

As you will remember, Mr. Chairman, on first learning of the formation of your committee, we wrote you expressing a desire to participate in your proceedings.

In due course, the Leader-Post and The Star-Phoenix, together with Armadale, were asked to prepare briefs and appear before the Committee. So that a complete picture may be formed, we have taken the liberty of including within the overall brief a look at our broadcasting entities. The men responsible for their day-to-day operations are here to answer any questions which may arise.

The only media interest of Armadale not represented here today is Toronto Life, which will appear at a later date in the proceedings.

While we are exceedingly proud of the modern facilities of our operations, we are aware that the presses, television cameras, radio studios—along with the paper, electricity and ancillary services we utilize, and even the licenses we require in the broadcasting entities—are merely tools used in the process of serving the community.

We are in the people business. The only real assets of Armadale are its personnel. The men here today are the leaders of the Armadale family of 682.

We are judged daily by the citizens of the community on the quality of our services—and in this age of dissent, I can assure you, we are judged daily on the relevancy of our service.

Competition among the media—and between them and the other services offered in the community—both for revenue and the time of John Doe is fierce. The changes of today foreshadow greater changes in the scope and nature of media tomorrow. Gradual, but ever increasing changes in our way of life and social patterns are only forerunners of the wholesale changes of the next decade.

Just as the elective processes of our democratic governments are determined at the ballot boxes, so are the media judged by the highest tribunal in the land—the reader, the listener, and the viewer.

Despite the challenges and the problems, surveys report that Armadale media have, in the main, continued to enjoy a high level of acceptance in the communities they serve. We are extremely proud of the track record of the Armadale interests through the years and the high level of service provided.

We do not, however, claim for one moment to be unique in this regard. Canadian media have played always a major role in the development of our country as a nation.

We do not claim to be an exception, but rather, closer to the norm. The quality, the quantity, the standards of excellence and the ethics exhibited by Canadian media are among the highest in the world, and I for one am proud to be a small part of this great industry.

Canadians on the whole are not prone to “blowing their own horn.” With all modesty, I suggest that newspaper publishers in this country have for generations—quietly and without fanfare—been generally active in support of almost every conceivable community endeavour from coast to coast.

They rarely document these activities and rarely, if ever, have felt required to produce such documentation as verification of service performed.

That is perhaps the primary purpose in our appearance here today. It is our hope that through your committee Canadians everywhere will be given an insight into the Canadian mass media, their fine record of achievement, and the nature of the problems facing them now and in the future.

It is in this spirit that Armadale is pleased to make two specific recommendations. These have to do with a minimum 75 per cent beneficial ownership of Canadian media by Canadians and the full disclosure by each of the media of its controlling interests.

As for Armadale, of course, its interests are owned 100 per cent by Canadians, and ownership disclosure is now in effect on all our services.

In our brief we have dealt in the main with our philosophy and our organizational framework.

At this time I also wish to refer to our feeling of accomplishment in being able to develop in each of our outlets an atmosphere strongly conducive to creative expression and to attract and develop talented people.

We mentioned to the Chairman our desire to present to the committee some examples of the creative work being done. He has consented to this departure from your customary routine.

The secretary will give each of you a long-playing record recently financed, directed and produced by our three radio stations, employing a group of Winnipeg artists. This record is being distributed through the Canadian Talent Library to all subscribing radio stations, and is part of our over all effort to give encouragement and on-air exposure to Canadian artists.

Recently our film production group in Regina completed a documentary titled "The Saskatchewan Suite". It was commissioned by the Leader-Post and the Star-Phoenix and will be distributed widely in Saskatchewan and other parts of Canada. We present it not only as a demonstration of production finesse but also as a positive declaration about life in Saskatchewan and our participation in it.

The second part of this visual presentation consists of a number of shorter productions, including station promotions, public service and commercial announcements. We believe these demonstrate that the markets we serve enjoy production services as professional as those available in the largest cities in North America.

Here then—"Saskatchewan Suite"—followed by a group of public service, station promotion and commercial announcements.

Roll Film

The Chairman: Do you wish to add anything following this?

Mr. Sifton: I would say the film stands on its own two feet.

The Chairman: The Senators will put questions to you and may they put questions to other people on your team?

Would you identify the Head Table again.

Mr. Sifton: Starting on my far left, Mr. Macdonald, the Editor of the Saskatchewan Star-Phoenix; Mr. Scotty Melville, Editor, Regina Leader-Post; Bill Thomson, Executive Vice President; the guy I rely on, Mr. Harold Crittenden, Executive Vice President of the broadcast interests; Preston Balmer, executive vice-president of print interests; Jim Struthers, Manager CKCK-TV; Bob Macdonald, Manager CKRC; Ron Lamborn, Manager, CKOC.

The Chairman: There are a lot of people to question. I am sure most of the questions will be directed to you. If you wish to redirect...

Mr. Sifton: I might make one comment, Mr. Chairman. We do not intend to give the impression of over-powering strength. We intend to make ourselves available so the Senators will have an opportunity to direct their questions directly to the one they wish.

The Chairman: We appreciate the spirit. I think Senator Hays is going to begin it.

Senator Hays: Mr. Sifton, and your group, first I should like very much to compliment you on your brief. I have not read them all, but I have read many of them. I should like you to know that I think it is an excellent brief, very thorough.

I think that the terms of reference have been well handled insofar as individuality is concerned.

The film that we just saw, I think, adds a great deal. I am a little disturbed sometimes when we see a picture of Saskatchewan when we from the west are down here fighting a different battle.

Mr. Sifton: Sir, I think both of us have spent many hours trying to demonstrate to some people in the east and obviously many people in the United States, we are not really just Eskimos, but a fine community with a fine way of life.

Senator Hays: Do not sell wheat and potash, and only half your oil. There is a difference. There is an old, old Saskatchewan story—the old couple who were hoeing in the garden. Neither one was saying a word. It was during the 1930's.

When they got down the one row, Martha went over and kicked her husband in the shins. He said, "Martha, why did you do that?"

She said, "Because you are such a poor lover." They did not say anything else. They turned back and went to another row. When they got to the far end of the row, she just happened to be in the right position. He booted her.

She said, "Why did you do that?"

He said, "For knowing the difference."

Mr. Sifton: No comment, sir.

Senator Hays: Mr. Sifton, on Page 23 of your brief...

Mr. Sifton: Page 23?

Senator Hays: Yes. Page 23 of your brief, Paragraph 36, you say that no local manager has ever been required to follow a course of action which he believes to be improper. Does this mean, Mr. Sifton, when you want something done that the editor or publisher in Regina might refuse to do it?

Mr. Sifton: If he believes it is improper, then he has that right. We do not try to have people work as tools. We try to give them an opportunity—they cannot function unless they function within the boundaries of what they believe to be reasonable, right and proper.

It may be that over a period of time we might decide to part company. I must make that clear. There have been rare occasions in the past that this, in fact, has happened.

Our practice is to carry on continuous dialogue between each of us on our team. We hope that any major difference of philosophies and beliefs will not crop up simply because we, obviously, depend upon each other to endeavour to put together a team of people who believe in a set of philosophies that are displayed throughout this brief.

In the process of hiring, Mr. Crittenden is associated down the line. We try to make it perfectly clear to people taking on responsibility within our organization that these are our beliefs, philosophies, etc. We tell them not to take it on if they do not believe; we do not give orders in that sense at all.

Senator Hays: Can you give any particular cases?

Mr. Sifton: Yes, as a matter of fact. Macdonald, Editor of the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix, in a very minute detail has a difference of opinion with me on a very major subject. I do not instruct him per se to follow my philosophy in this respect.

I think I should explain the whole situation to you. Now, this is a matter of philosophy in this particular case. May I say also that my father and I, for example, have disagreed many times on a means to an end. Rarely do we ever disagree on the end, on the desired end result, the basic philosophies of life.

Now, in his wisdom he may choose to go in one direction. Maybe, as with any youth, I may choose to go at it in the other direction. We both think we are right. He has not forced his beliefs on me and I have not foisted mine on him. I try not to foist mine on others.

Mac, it might be well to explain, without naming names for obvious reasons, the experience that you had.

Mr. M. Macdonald: Editor, Saskatoon Star-Phoenix Ltd.: I will let you know where I differ.

There was a question raised in the hearings earlier about the right of a reporter to protect his sources. There were various points of view expressed. We had a situation in Saskatoon, but I am not sure where the case stands before the court now. I would not want to wind up in contempt.

One of our reporters went out on a story. In the course of that story, she interviewed an individual and quoted him, not by name, but quoted him. The police in subsequent investigation thought that some testimony taken from the accused sounded very much like the same thing that was in the story. They summoned the reporter to the preliminary hearing with a view to having the reporter identify the individual. Her attitude was that she would rather not do this.

She came to me for advice. My advice to her was that I did not feel that any person can hold himself above the law. If it interferes with justice or the laws of our land, the laws of our land are more important than any part of our social structure, including individuals working for newspapers.

Now, I did not direct her on what she should do. I said, "It is up to your own conscience." This is the way I feel about it.

As it turned out, she went home and discussed this with her husband, came back and wondered if we had some kind of mental telepathy because he told her the same, basically, the same thing.

She did appear as a witness. If she had refused, I presume the judge would have held her in contempt.

Now, Mr. Sifton looked at this in a somewhat different light.

The Chairman: Do you want to say the light you saw it in?

Mr. Sifton: I apologize for the necessarily long-winded method of getting at this. I think it is important to get at the basic policies involved.

I believe that the effective rule of law depends upon a free press. I think it depends upon the publication of names of offenders. In many cases, just for example, you get drunk driving charges. We do not think it is the levying of a minor fine—what to many people in the community is a minor fine—that is a deterrent that stops one from drunk driving.

We think one of the most effective, the hardest kind of deterrent is to live with the fear of having every guy in the neighbourhood saying "That guy was caught for drunk driving."

We think to work effectively, you have to have a rule of law to work in our society. We think it requires publication. Now, in our belief, this is a function of the press within our society. We think it is a very important one.

Now, included in this whole area of the role of the press and the rule of law, in my opinion, I must say is the disclosure of people or individuals who may live off the weakness of other individuals.

Now, we have had situations with things like dope and some of the other things that are in evidence in today's society. We think it requires a free press, or I think it requires a free press to expose things going on in our society.

In the case of dope, there is a tendency on the part of many parents not to want to face the facts. My youngsters, fortunately, are a little younger, at a stage where I hope these things get straightened out before they get to the age where I must be concerned with that kind of thing.

The fact of the matter is we think there are lots of parents who maybe think their youngsters are involved with the taking of dope but really do not want to face the facts. It is almost like a man lying in a hammock. He keeps swatting flies, hoping they will go away.

We think in our society that one of our roles in this rule of law is to expose things that may be detrimental to the community, at least expose what is going on within the community for people to judge the situation properly with all of the facts.

Now, in the collection of the information that goes into this kind of a story, let us take this writer in the case of this dope situation. Now, this writer, capable, thorough, did a tremendous amount of investigative work, weeks of talking to every possible segment in our society, senior people in the police department, junior people in the police department, senior citizens in the community, informers, probably criminals, people in every segment.

Let us face it, this whole situation of dope at this point—now I use the term "dope". I hope this is taken in the full sense, including LSD, marijuana, the whole thing. This is a problem that we really do not know too much about.

It is a major problem, wide-spread problem. It may be more wide-spread in some communities than others. It certainly is not going to go away, and certainly it behooves us as publishers to deal with the facts as they are within our communities.

Now, as I say, in getting into, delving into the problems and what actually exists, we are talking to all kinds of people all the way from criminals and that kind of individual to the most respected. Those sources of information are of utmost importance.

It is critically important that we have access, free access, to discussions and dialogue with these people to be able to give a totally rounded figure or a picture of the situation.

If this writer were to, for example, expose the fact that he or she got significant information from a junior member of the police force, it is conceivable that his job may be in jeopardy.

If significant information were to come from the criminal elements or informers, they would be in serious jeopardy of possibly having criminal action taken.

If our researchers and reporters in the process of picking up this information were to contact a significant element in the community, and if we earned the reputation within this element of exposing them, then I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that our sources of information will dry up and our ability to give a full, comprehensive picture of the way it is would be impossible.

For that reason I have a very strong feeling of responsibility as far as defending the right to protect the sources of information.

On the other hand, I would not myself nor would I suggest that any of our people advise any individual, either directly associated or indirectly associated with us that they should go on the stand in a court and, in fact go to jail to protect this right.

If I were in their position, I would fight for the reasons that I have just given you. I cannot and will not tell any other member of our team of any level that they will go to jail or suggest that they should use the other alternative, being perhaps a loss of a job. I will not do this.

Senator Hays: In the Gazette last week a judge was reported as follows: "I will not force any journalist to divulge the source of information. However, I personally feel that reporters should not involve themselves in police investigation so long as the investigation is incomplete as this only serves to hinder the proper administration of justice."

"But once the case comes before the court, then reporters can nose through files as much as they want to." What would your feelings be about that?

Mr. Sifton: I would be happy to answer. If I might suggest, we have got two editors who have to deal with this on a regular basis.

Mr. Scotty Melville, Editor, Regina Leader-Post: The question there is that apparently a reporter was doing some investigating while the police also were doing investigation. Is that correct?

Senator Hays: Yes.

Mr. Melville: I would be inclined myself, if a reporter were doing that; he found out something—I would feel that he should help the police in the investigation. In other words, if he found out something relative to the case, I do not see why he should not tell the police to help the police.

Mr. Fortier: If he were called as a witness in the course of the trial, should he divulge his source of information?

Mr. Melville: That is a difficult thing. It puts a fellow on the spot and I really have no answer for that. Suppose he gets some information from a fellow, say it is a criminal case of some kind and he gets some information from a fellow. If the name of that fellow comes to light, there is a possibility that violence could come to him.

I am talking about extreme cases now. I do not know what I would do if I were in the reporter's shoes, to tell the truth. If I honestly felt some harm might come to somebody else I would not know what to do.

I would have to wait for that to happen first.

Mr. Sifton: This is a personal thing to individuals.

Mr. Fortier: Did you say, Mr. Sifton, you believe the right of reporters to claim a privilege should be written into the law?

Mr. Sifton: Mr. Fortier, I am not a lawyer. I am sorry. I think I would be inclined to take another look. Again I am not an expert lawyer and really you seem to be talking about a technical thing here.

There should be some—to me there should be some reasonable limitation so that, for example—and you see this in dictatorships, people locked up for life because they are not prepared to cooperate.

This is a critical thing but the same thing possibly could be involved in contempt of court. At the present time there is nothing in the law that says a guy cannot be locked up for life, to my knowledge—and again I am not a lawyer.

There is no limitation to the length of time he can be locked up. I am sorry I am not a lawyer. I cannot give you details. I have concern about writing it into the law.

Mr. Melville: Are the police asked to reveal their sources of information? They have stool pigeons and that sort of thing. They get tips from people all the time. They are not asked to do that; are they? Very often?

Mr. Fortier: They certainly have no privilege in a court of law.

Senator Macdonald: We are getting a bit confused. Right now the law is that a reporter has no privilege, I think.

Now, you say that personally you would not obey that law.

Mr. Sifton: That is right, sir. I happen to believe strongly in the principal of the role of the...

Senator Macdonald: You go further, that you would not obey any law that you did not believe in?

Mr. Sifton: No; I would not. If I may make one suggestion, at no time did I ever suggest that we should live outside the law or above the law or that we should have this privilege.

Incidentally, this whole area of privilege in the sense of a reporter to protect his source of information is not the privilege of the reporter. It is the privilege of the right of an individual to know that is involved here. It is your right as a citizen, sir, to have access to the free flow of information that is involved here.

Senator Hays: Let us face facts right now; be realistic about this right now. There is no privilege. Now, to give a privilege you would have to have a law which would give that privilege.

Now, it was the same way in the old days of prohibition. Just because a person did not believe in the law, did that mean they did not have to follow it?

Mr. Sifton: In this particular case, as I say this is not a matter of digression with the law. With all due respect, I look upon this as being a function or responsibility of a reporter, and we are really talking on the individual level. In this case we are talking on the level of the individual reporter.

We are talking about the role of the press as a result or as a rule of law.

Senator Hays: Would you not agree that if you do not agree with a law, you should work to change the law, rather than say, "I won't obey"?

Mr. Sifton: I would not—as a newspaper publisher—be part of suggesting that this newspaper should have any special privilege.

Senator Hays: I think perhaps they should have. I am sort of inclined to think the reporter's information should be protected, but while they are not protected, does he have to obey the law? That is what I am getting at.

Senator McElman: I am referring to Senator Hays' last question. I think we are getting away from the nub of it.

The Chairman: Yes.

Senator McElman: Obviously, he was suggesting that it was not the role of the newsman to conduct a criminal investigation, but the role of the police.

Mr. Sifton: How? Please, I do not mean to—I do not suggest for one second that there is any specific case that I am thinking of. In fact, I am thinking strictly in a hypothetical sense.

How do we know the police are, in fact, investigating thoroughly? As citizens, somebody has to represent you. This is the balance that we have had in our society, or way of life for generations.

They might be interested in hearing from Mac. MacDonald. He is the other working editor. They might be.

Mr. Macdonald: Just to make something clear, to begin with, the reporter to whom I referred earlier did stumble into this rather than going out doing police investigative work.

She was not taking over the role of the police. In the course of her discussions, she happened to meet somebody whom the police subsequently charged and tracked it back that way.

I am inclined to feel that the press has a role to reveal itself in society, but that the investigative processes should be in the hands of the police. If the reporter, in the normal course of his work, comes across things that he thinks should be told to the police, he should be like any other citizen and inform the police.

Now, this is my feeling.

Senator McElman: Should he also publish it at the same time?

Mr. Macdonald: Unless you are talking about a specific thing, I do not think we could answer that because there are laws that prevent—laws of libel, for instance, that would prevent you from publishing material that you had picked up via the grapevine.

However, in other instances, you may have it solid enough that you should publish it. One instance, perhaps, would be where there was some corruption within the police department. This would be a case that would have to be judged on its own merits, I think.

Senator Hays: Possibly we have explored this sufficiently. It reminds me of Cabinet meetings with seven lawyers in there.

The Chairman: Do you have another question?

Senator Hays: I am sure Mr. Sifton will understand this better.

The Chairman: I think he understood the last question.

Senator Hays: Paragraph 41, Page A-25, bottom of the page: What, Mr. Sifton, did you consider a fair return?

The Chairman: Is that A-25? Yes.

Mr. Sifton: I cannot make a flat statement that would apply to newspapers or would apply to broadcasting. You have to look at the kind of investment and the particular media and the particular individual market.

There I cannot give you a percentage. It would vary within our own organization. We do not look upon it as a matter of percentage.

This incidentally opens up a point—if I might. I am a third generation media man. I have been taught since I can walk that if you publish without bias, and without interest, without specific interest, without any other motive but the community interest and the people that we serve, the reward will come to you. It has been very good to me.

The fact of the matter is, our attitude is one of not going out to say that we should make a percentage out of this business; it does not work that way. It does not even show an informed figure within our own organization, sir.

I hesitate to make a bold, bald statement. It just does not apply.

Senator Hays: You agree with Mr. Farrell of the Windsor Star, to charge all the traffic can bear?

Mr. Sifton: Obviously, if you are talking a rate and you need more money, obviously you go to the extent that you can go. If you go above that, in your judgment, you lose business and, obviously, you do not go.

Senator Hays: Do you feel the same about the broadcast business too?

Mr. Sifton: Yes, sir; I do.

Senator Hays: On Page A-32, Paragraph 56, can you give us specific examples of how your publications have exposed abuses?

Mr. Sifton: If I might, I think that once again one should go to the working editors. This is the thing that we are doing on a regular basis.

Senator Hays: Pardon me.

Mr. Sifton: This is the thing that we do on a regular basis. It is part of our job, our way of life, part of our job. If I might say, I think this should go to working editors.

Mr. Macdonald: First of all...

The Chairman: Mr. Macdonald, would you care to go first?

Mr. Macdonald: I am trying to find what we are talking on.

Senator Hays: A-32, Paragraph 56.

The Chairman: It says that "While mass media do have influence on public opinion, the power they have is the power to discover and disclose to the public, the activities of those who feed on the weak, and the ignorant, and the defenseless in society."

As I understand it, Senator Hays' question is "Could you give some examples of this?"

Senator Hays: Yes.

Mr. Sifton: Yes, of course. We get this in the political realm every day, sir. There are all kinds of things people would just as soon not have published: attitudes of the opposition, may I suggest.

Senator Hays: Other than political.

Mr. Sifton: Mr. Macdonald?

Mr. Macdonald: There has been a growing problem in society of the place of our Indians and Metis, for instance. They have come to the fore in various ways. In the attempt to bring this before our readers not in our terms, but in the terms of the people who are supposedly disturbed, the Indians and Metis themselves—I had someone on my behalf contact one of their spokesmen and had them write a series of articles in their own terms about how they thought they were being maligned.

We published them as a series so that the rest of society would realize what these people—what is really bugging them. We hope this contributed to a better understanding of the problems.

Senator Hays: You felt their abuses should be exposed?

Mr. Macdonald: Well, yes. I did feel there were some and that rather than us express these ideas for them, I felt it would be better for them to do it themselves.

Now, after reading the articles, I did not agree with all of the things that they had to say about their problems, but we published them anyway so that the public could judge for itself just how valid they were.

Senator Hays: Do you have another short example?

Mr. Sifton: If I might mention the story with regard to this dope thing. In your community is a situation that, of course, the dope peddlers do not like any part of—publication of it.

Mr. Melville: We had one recently and I do not think there is a final outcome of it yet, but the old grapevine again comes into this where we got a tip where it was likely there was some wrong-doing in the building department of the city.

Through our investigation which also involved going to Calgary, or getting contact with people in Calgary, it was learned that a fictitious firm was stamping plans. That was turned over to the authority and...

Senator Hays: The firm was not from Calgary surely.

Mr. Melville: No; it was at a Calgary base. Now...

Mr. Sifton: I would take another example, Scotty. I cannot go beyond that.

Mr. Fortier: You are not dealing with the wheat now.

Mr. Melville: But the gentleman already had been sentenced for defrauding the Income Tax, but this case is separate. I really should not be speaking about it. It is not quite finished yet.

There are other cases like that where you find things out through tip-offs. Again, we had another case—we got a tip-off from a petty crook that one of his pals had dumped some nitroglycerin that they were going to use some time and had hidden it in a field and...

Senator Hays: He got that from Montreal?

Mr. Melville: I do not know where they got it, but certainly it involved a laxness on the part of our own police at the time, before this stuff was found and experts came and look it away.

The Chairman: Senator Hays.

Senator Hays: Yes; I have more questions. Maybe I am taking up too much time.

The Chairman: No; carry on.

Mr. Sifton: May I make one more comment on that? Senator Hays, it is a very, very obvious one. We always are looking for sales practices that victimize the public. Of course, the people who have been exposed are not very happy with us.

This kind of thing we are always watching for.

Senator Hays: On Page 34-A; really it is on page A-34, Paragraph 62, you say that the media must remain free of government interference so that they can react instantaneously and vigorously to the challenge of technological change.

In what ways are they reacting now?

Mr. Sifton: There are many things that we are now doing in a regular way, on a regular basis: things that maybe you as a reader of a newspaper, for example, may not be overly sensitive to. We go at it very slowly and carefully to make sure how the reactions are working.

You do not close down the newspaper today and open up with new everything, a new ballgame tomorrow. For example, there is some question in the minds of all of us as to the relative space allocation to photographs as opposed to written type. We are into the whole area.

There is a great deal going on in this area within the media or industry, but there are a great many other things that are going on outside of the media, directly out—completely divorced from the media when you look at it from a close-in standpoint.

Let me give you an example. Can you imagine what would happen to the lives and disposable income of families of Regina if a Houston Astrodome were to be put in Taylor Field in Regina?

All of a sudden, allocation of disposable income would be radically changed, the time that they allocate to various different things in their lives would be radically changed and altered and even ski-doo's; we saw indications of ski-doo's, all kinds of them, out there.

Years ago, as you know as well as I do, sir, as a westerner...

Senator Hays: It has country to run them on.

Mr. Sifton: Wintertime, cars used to be put up on blocks and taxis used to be in business.

Now, instead of being in houses, the people are out. They have things to do.

There are little things quietly working away at the time allocation of the individual. This means that maybe our book as it is presented, our package, will have to be altered to fit the new time allocations.

Maybe we have to do a tighter editing job. Maybe it is time for more allocation to the visual, the photographic area. Maybe it is other things. We do not know what this answer is. We do now know that changes that have taken place over the last ten years, or five years indeed, have been tremendous.

We think they are going to come at us in more directions, at greater speed. We feel that maybe the things, the changes that were required within this newspaper or within broadcasting, indeed, in the past may have been spread over five years.

It may have to be spread out over a year to survive. If we are not smart enough, it may be that we have to be able to instantaneously change our product, to fluctuate, to remold, to change.

Any kind of a restriction put upon us in any respect, very likely, could handicap our ability to free-wheel to meet your desires, sir.

Senator Hays: Would this be like when television came, you had to change?

Mr. Sifton: Yes. The great change took place with radio. If I might suggest, authorities at that time were so interested and involved in the formation of regulations and policies and everything else that were involved in television that radio was quite heavily left on its own to fluctuate and to change.

Now that was one incident of where one major external factor came into play. I fear the problems involved, the multiplicity of problems involved by not one external force coming into play, but dozens of them: Little ones, big ones.

I am told by experts that it is not out of the realm of possibility at all that within the next ten years or so, at the dollar available to the average individual you will be able to buy a unit that will go on your existing television set that will permit you to dial directly to terrestrial satellites, which will be fed directly the Rose Bowl Game, and indeed the Red Square Parade direct from Russia through the use of a satellite.

That has got to have a major effect on many existing media today. It may have a radical change on what people want from their newspapers. Indeed we have survival at stake here. We have to be able to change our product to be able to be a viable and desired service, to be capable of standing these changes.

These changes that are taking place are environmental and technological changes that take place regularly and intimately and in every possible way.

Senator Hays: Mr. Sifton, on Page A-39, Paragraph 71, you refer to pressure groups and threats of reprisal. Could you give us some examples?

Mr. Sifton: Yes. There are two or three things here, sir. There is almost no limitation as to the degree from minor to major. Many of the reprisals that are in the minor items are major ones down the street. You go down the street and they grab you and say, "Crit-tenden and Lamborn, why did you put that in? Did you have to do that?"

"Well, it is the truth."

"All right; it is the truth but did you have to print it?"

Then you go to the club and you get some of these messy items; for example, this dope situation. You are told to go to another table because you are not welcome. It is not quite that bald, but it is there.

Senator Hays: Do you have any specific examples?

Mr. Sifton: Most communities in Canada go through night time shopping and you are dealing with merchants. They appear to be the ones that are most concerned in this. I have no disrespect to merchants because they have some good arguments, but you wind up with 40 percent of the merchants violently opposed to night time shopping or 60, as the case may be, just because you are exposing both sides.

They say, "Why plug those people" for the side they are against.

Senator Hays: Are they members of a Board of Trade?

Mr. Sifton: No. The threats that I have had in writing are not from a member of the Board of Trade. Again, I wish to protect my source. I would be happy to show the Chairman evidence of this.

Senator Hays: On Page 45—am I taking up too much time?

The Chairman: No; you are doing well.

Senator Hays: Paragraph 82, I believe, you talk about the difficulty of keeping pace with rapid salary increases. Could you tell us whether salaries are increasing faster than profits?

Mr. Sifton: I think we are all in what has become known as the "cost squeeze, cost revenue squeeze."

Senator Hays: Are you involved?

Mr. Sifton: A very simple answer, Senator, is yes. Absolutely.

Mr. W. Thomson: Executive Vice-President, Regina Leader-Post Limited: That is quite true for the newspaper business too. I do not know if I could give the relationship between profits and increased salaries, but it is there to a marked degree.

Senator Hays: Would this be the same in broadcasting? Do you know?

Mr. Thomson: I do not know about broadcasting, television, or radio. We have specific cases where our increases are matching our losses.

Senator Hays: Now, Page 47, Paragraph 88, do you, Mr. Sifton, feel it is socially desirable for independent conglomerates to own newspapers, broadcasting interests, even if they disclose the beneficial ownership?

Mr. Sifton: Excuse me sir. I am anxious to answer your question so long as I know exactly what you are asking me. Would you be good enough to define for me what you believe is a conglomerate? This term is a nebulous one to me.

Senator Hays: You should know what a conglomerate is. Do you?

Mr. Sifton: Do you consider me a conglomerate?

Senator Hays: Yes.

Mr. Sifton: You are asking me to say that I do not act in the interest of the community.

Senator Hays: Well, I am asking you...

Mr. Sifton: I personally do not think we are a conglomerate, but again, that is a personal definition.

The Chairman: Senator Hays has the opinion you are a conglomerate.

Mr. Sifton: We think we do an admirable service to the community. In fact, we are proud as hell of it. The listener, reader, and viewer is the ultimate judge. Whether we succeed or fail is in their hands and I could not care less who competes.

General Foods, they may not be a conglomerate but if they want to be competitive in my particular market and if they can perform a service for the public, then bully for them.

I have only the instructions of beating the living be-Jesus out of them. Now, again, they are successfully predicated on how they serve that particular community.

The very fact that we never have offered any resistance to any competition or competitor in applying either for a broadcast license or, indeed, if they want to start a newspaper or billboard or anything else; that is their business—it is done quite regularly. We have never opposed.

Mr. H. A. Crittenden, Vice-President and Managing Director, Transcanada Communications Ltd.: But the listener, reader and viewer is the judge of their success. Bring on the competitor; we have got to take our place alongside of him.

Senator Hays: This is from a letter: "You may be interested that as a boy I was raised and worked on a farm. I worked at the Eaton Company in Hamilton; for ten years later, I traveled to Western Canada. I am a retired farmer."

"The people survived a depression in Canada and in the 30's, dust storms; depression, the grasshoppers and other pests.

"The worst curse of this area is the monopolized news media. Government committees have proven a waste of the taxpayers' money in the past, so far as Saskatchewan is concerned. Best of luck."

Mr. Sifton: Senator Hays, may I present to you, sir (might I have it back?) a file. I suspect by the wording in the letter that I have had correspondence with this gentleman before.

Senator Hays: Should we ascertain if it is the same fellow? I had several files when I was the Mayor and several large letters.

Mr. Sifton: I spend some days more on the phone than I do with my wife.

The Chairman: On that happy note, I think we should give ourselves a five minute break. We will perhaps reconvene at about eight minutes after four, if that would be satisfactory.

• 4.00 p.m.

Thank you.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, I think we could perhaps reconvene. I do not want to ask a series of questions, but I have a couple.

Senator Hays: May I ask just one more question?

The Chairman: Yes.

Senator Hays: This is on Page 48, Paragraph 89.

Mr. Sifton: 48, sir?

Senator Hays: Yes. Down at the bottom, you say, "In particular, and in any event, we believe most strongly that to subject the press of Canada to the discretionary supervision of a regulatory board would—regardless of the quality and integrity of the board members—constitute the gravest possible threat to these freedoms."

I should like to ask, Mr. Sifton, the management of a newspaper itself, is this not a regulatory board? Does it constitute a threat?

Mr. Sifton: Yes; it is a regulatory body. It must be, and that in the sense of responsibility for that outlet. However, it is not the only outlet in that community by a long shot.

In the case of having all of our media in Canada under regulatory bodies, I think, yes, it would create a threat.

Senator Hays: Any...

Mr. Sifton: If we had all our media under regulatory bodies, whether a threat of or lack of threat, as the case may be, desired or undesired, or whatever the case may be, whatever might be involved—renewal of licenses and this kind of thing, yes; I think it would be a definite threat to the freedom of the individual to know.

Senator Hays: Do you think that a board within your own organization, your own regulatory body within your organization, is a threat to freedom in some cases?

Mr. Sifton: May I ask, I have been in the hearings the last couple of days. I have heard reference to a code of ethics per se, a press council.

Senator Hays: No; I am just trying to define...

Mr. Sifton: I think any kind of centralized control of thinking in Canada is dangerous—or any other country, for that matter.

Senator Hays: Would a board within a newspaper be a threat; this same sort of threat?

Mr. Sifton: Only because—if it was the only source of information to the community, then I would feel it would be a threat. If magazines were kept out or if cable television was kept out, if radio signals were kept out, there was in fact only one source of information—yes; I think it would be a very important threat to freedom.

Senator Sparrow: May I ask something?

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow.

Senator Sparrow: You asked Senator Hays what a definition of conglomerate was and I think he referred to your firm. You seemed to not understand what conglomerate was.

Mr. Sifton: I have a definition.

Senator Sparrow: In your organization, there is such a thing as danger of a conglomerate and I just ask the question.

Mr. Sifton: May I say in definition of conglomerate, it is motives to me that make the definition, make a conglomerate. If the motive of the proprietor is the motive of supplying a service for profit, then this would be.

If the motive, the prime motive of the proprietor and operations is for something other than some ulterior motive, other than the sufficient and successful serving of a community with a service with the resultant profit, then I would say yes; I have considerable concern as to a conglomerate.

Again I say it comes down to definition. I do not want to say that is a conglomerate in my definition. There are some conglomerates today that are predominately motivated by sheer appreciation and the stock market. You and I both know of these.

Again, if the motive is to provide sheer appreciation, that is one thing. God bless them. If the motive is for providing a successful service to the community, then that is a different thing altogether.

I do not look upon the conglomerates that are looking for service to the community as being conglomerates.

Senator Sparrow: Who determines today the motives of the publisher, radio, the TV?

Mr. Sifton: I think you know special interest publications have historically failed over a period of time. There are very few, if I might make the obvious observation, newspapers that have been founded for the purpose of special interest.

In any competitive situation you will find that if there are two newspapers in a community, one is doing a job of serving the community and doing the job, as we see it, of contributing to the information pool from which the public can make decisions.

If they are actually doing that, they will beat the living "be-Jesus" out of the one that is only peddling a special interest.

Now again, if you are talking conglomerates, I thought conglomerates were ones with a motive of a special interest, that of share appreciation. If this what you are referring to as a conglomerate, then I suggest they are not likely to be a success and any success they have will probably be a short-term success.

Does that answer your question?

Senator Sparrow: It does to a degree excepting if one firm has or an individual owned all of the media in a province, they could own all of the media across Canada as such. It is a possibility.

Your brief is very opposed to any government regulation—and I buy that, but in fact, if the build-up is towards conglomerates, as we are referring to them, is there some area where perhaps legislation or regulation may be required, if not now, at least to be able to look to the future where the possibility may be and be prepared for it when it comes?

Mr. Sifton: If the people of Canada decide by one method or another that there should be some form of regulation, I suggest that whatever is done must be done, if indeed the basic interest is the public, I suggest that it must be done not by regulatory bodies with licensing and all involved.

There is no question the licensing and the fear of removal of that licence has a bearing on the vehemency that is involved in the fight, the degree of exposure of difficult problems in the community.

I think that that has a major bearing. I think that it would not be to the public interest to have media in the hands of regulatory bodies. I must make it very clear I do not cast any aspersions whatsoever upon the individuals of the CRTC. We think they have done a fine job.

But by the very nature of the brief, they have had some extreme difficulties in their operations which I am sure they will admit. They are only some of the media.

If all of the media fell into the hands of regulatory bodies, I suggest it would be a serious threat to freedom of the individual in our society.

The Chairman: I wonder if I might ask you a question. On Page A-25, Paragraph 40 you say—and I quote: "On the other hand, a proprietor who owns a single outlet may operate it in such a way as to be highly detrimental to the public interest."

Could you give me an example of a newspaper outlet operating in Canada that is detrimental?

Mr. Sifton: No, sir. What we are talking about is a hypothetical situation.

The Chairman: You do not think a newspaper in Canada which is operating detrimentally for a single purpose can be named?

Mr. Sifton: It is a big country with a lot of newspapers. I am not in a position to, and I were, maybe I could make a learned decision. But for me to make a statement of this nature, I am sorry; I cannot. I do not know of any at the present time.

There may be some. I do not know if there are. If there are, they are a small minority.

The Chairman: Okay. There are some; none that you know of.

Mr. Sifton: No. That part is part of the overall discussion in this area, for those who have the brief, and we say that mere closed media is not in itself detrimental.

The Chairman: But a single outlet is not necessarily detrimental either?

Mr. Sifton: No.

Mr. Crittenden: That is where one case was brought out; the idea of a single operation.

The Chairman: Could we deal with that part?

Mr. Sifton: In a brief covering one survey taken, there only was one case they could put their finger on that they felt was operating detrimentally to the public interest and it was in a single ownership operation. Do you recall this?

The Chairman: That brief I am familiar with. It was put out by the National Association of Broadcasters.

Mr. Sifton: That is correct, sir.

The Chairman: Can you give an example?

Mr. Sifton: If we had an example, we would have put it in the brief.

The Chairman: I have some other questions. I will defer to Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I would like to question Mr. Macdonald, if I may. In your brief on behalf of the Star-Phoenix, Mr. Macdonald, you explain how and under what conditions and on what terms you came to work for Mr. Sifton.

I am reading from Page 7 and also Page 8. When you were hired, the owners felt they must hire someone to be a member of the Sifton family who shared their philosophies of newspaper making. This goes on for a couple of pages.

Then on Page 9, you refer to terms of reference, with guidelines governing opinions expressed by the newspaper on the editorial page.

Are you referring to written guides which were handed to you by Mr. Sifton when he hired you?

Mr. M. Macdonald: No.

Mr. Fortier: What was the nature of those guides?

Mr. M. Macdonald: As I outlined here.

Mr. Fortier: It was a result of discussion that you had?

Mr. M. Macdonald: Yes; rather long discussions, I might say.

Mr. Fortier: In Item 9, you say "It was, naturally, agreed that news also be selected with an eye to good taste and the laws of the land."

Could you tell us what you understood to be good taste, as defined by Mr. Sifton at that time?

Mr. Macdonald: I do not think either one of us defined it at the time. I certainly do not think I can define it in a broad sense now because it shifts from day to day as the mores of the community change.

I can give you an example of a picture that shocked me that we ran last week. I expected the roof to come down on my head. I got one phone call and one phone call only on it. It was the news editor who had made the selection. When the paper arrived on my desk, I was a little disturbed by it. It was one of the pictures of the bodies in the Vietnam thing. It was a pretty shocking kind of picture.

Now, I did not question the news editor's judgment on it. I read through the story and part of the story said that it had gone to the United States Senate committee and the pictures had made them physically ill.

I felt to tell the story like this that the news editor probably used good judgment to illustrate. Apparently it was accepted by the community.

I cannot help wondering, I do not know, if this would have been the same reaction we would have gotten five or ten years ago. I am older than the news editor and I did not talk to him, but presumably he gave the same sort of consideration that he gave everything else.

Mr. Fortier: Would it be fair to say that you presumed that Mr. Sifton, had you checked with him, would have allowed you to publish the picture?

Mr. Sifton: He never had been asked to check with me, ever.

Mr. Fortier: In the discussions to which Mr. Macdonald alluded, would this have been included in the guidelines? Did it influence your own judgment when you decided to publish the picture?

Mr. Macdonald: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Did you in your mind think back to the conversation which you had two and a half years ago with Mr. Sifton?

Mr. Macdonald: No; it was just my own reaction to the picture.

Mr. Sifton: Mr. Fortier, may I make one comment? On the question of good taste, it is our professional responsibility, in our view to be knowledgeable, to be sensitive to the bounds of good taste as judged, not by us, but by our customers.

Mr. Fortier: By the readers?

Mr. Sifton: By our community and the area. It is the responsibility of the manager and his team to judge whether this kind of a picture would fall within the bounds, as they know them or believe them to be, of decency, propriety, etcetera within the community.

It never has been suggested that we should foist our bounds of decency or lack of decency—whatever the case may be—upon the community.

Mr. Fortier: Supposing you picked up a copy of the Star-Phoenix one day which you believed to have been in bad taste in your own judgment. Would you tell Mr. Macdonald?

Mr. Sifton: Oh, we have a continuing dialogue. The next time I would contact Max, I would say, "What happened when you printed that picture?"

Mr. Fortier: Has this happened?

Mr. Sifton: Have I asked questions of this nature?

Mr. Fortier: Has this happened that you picked copies of either one of your newspapers and found pictures or stories which you thought to be in bad taste?

Mr. Sifton: We always have continuing dialogue and again, as I emphasized, the dialogue aim is for a team; these are the people who are responsible for a professional job.

Mr. Fortier: But if you, as the owner, thought any given time that a story in one of your newspapers were in bad taste, would you tell your editors?

Mr. Sifton: Yes; I would. I would start off by saying, "What happened? What was the result of it? Did we get into trouble?"

Now, in my association with these enterprises in this team, there has been only one editor who was removed. I am very anxious about quality; but it is a matter of taste. If you get an individual that has concertedly gone about trying to destroy by, for example, articles and letters in the community, then we try to come up with a common understanding.

If we cannot hit a common understanding as to whether it makes sense, if it is a blatant case, then we decide to go our separate ways. Now, that has happened rarely. It has happened on one or two occasions.

Mr. Crittenden: On the matter of taste in the broadcast part of our entity, we are confronted with entertainment ads and on the latest kick, sex, with due respect to the girls that are in the house, appears to rear its ugly head. We are going into homes, to the living room or family room or kitchen where the family is involved.

Mr. Sifton: We have to make a decision: Is this the time? You know, 11:30 at night, when some of the youngsters are in bed, probably is a good time. It is maybe where it should go.

We are turning down some entertainment ads that we just think are too rough for a particular time of day.

Mr. Fortier: You would run them later on.

Mr. Crittenden: Maybe not necessarily. Now, if somebody acquires the rights to Hair and comes to my management, I will let them use their own judgment on this, but I question very much whether we would make anything like that without it being reasonably late at night and highly publicized for what it is.

Now, the people of Regina, I think, percentage-wise are going to see Hair as much as percentage-wise they are going to see it in Toronto. Again, I think we would do a disservice to our community to play something of this nature in general audience time.

Mr. Fortier: I would like to relate that statement and Mr. Sifton's present statement to question Mr. Melville. I read that your newspaper, Page 21, "considers itself a family journal which can be read by anyone in the family who has the ability to read."

Would you make the same distinction when it came to taste as Mr. Sifton and Mr. Harold Crittenden?

Mr. Melville: Well, there are some things that we do not use in relation to some news stories—particularly if we come across one from the United States or Europe going into some details that to our minds, after some discussion, are not necessary.

I know that—I do not know why, but if you look at movies these days, which I am afraid I do not do too often, you see a man and woman going into a bedroom. Now, in my young days, the mere fact they were going into the bedroom as such was sufficient for me to realize they were not going in there to discuss pet dogs.

Nowadays, I understand they go through, well I was going to say the full motions. In other words, they give them the works. Maybe that is even worse I do not know. You get the picture.

All right, but there are some things we take out because we feel it is a family journal. The context or the flow of motion, should I say, is not lost by taking things like certain four letter words that sometimes appear in some copies. It is not necessary to get the message.

Mr. Fortier: Is there in Regina another type of newspaper which would not necessarily appeal to the family?

Mr. Melville: We have a university paper there, if you are familiar with it.

Mr. Sifton: We are not in a position to judge, nor do we suggest there should be possible prohibition from one who is.

Mr. Fortier: Surely you are in a position to judge the needs of the community.

Mr. Sifton: We try to provide a service to the community.

Mr. Fortier: Since there is competition in the newspaper field in Regina, I ask the question, are there segments of Regina's population which would like to see four letter words or other items which you would not publish in your newspaper?

Mr. Melville: We certainly would not run a center piece picture as does Playboy. They can get Playboy. It is available there. There are other publications coming in that deal with all kinds of stuff.

The Chairman: How long have you been with the paper?

Mr. Melville: Roughly 35 years.

The Chairman: May I ask you on the whole question of taste, have the standards in terms of taste changed in those 35 years?

Mr. Melville: Indeed they have.

The Chairman: You progress more slowly?

Mr. Melville: That is the idea.

Mr. Sifton: There may be a time—we are in a time when these mores are changing rapidly. At the present time it is not inconceivable that things we are doing today that are accepted as maybe being square in the community may, tomorrow, in fact be judged obscene by that community.

These mores alter. They fluctuate through history. It may be that we are out of line tomorrow. It may be that the judgment is going to swing in the other direction.

Mr. Preston W. Balmer (Vice-President, Regina Leader-Post Ltd.): Panty ads in our town don't shake us today.

Mr. Fortier: I am glad to hear that, sir. Did they 10 years ago?

Mr. Balmer: They shook me.

Certain people in our community have information which they would like to have and which we do not provide. I would just like to suggest to you that we are not doing so because I have a record here of 103 weekly newspapers published in the Province.

There are 10 other Canadian newspapers circulating in the province. That is from out of the province; over and above the Moose Jaw and Prince Albert paper, which, as you know, are published in Saskatchewan. There are 17 published in the province which do not belong to the Audit Bureau of Circulations, so we have no record of how much they penetrate into our community.

There are 25 Canadian magazines who are members. There are eight Canadian farm publications, 11 Canadian business publications, and 69 United States magazines, including Playboy.

Mr. Sifton: That for a population of just under a million.

The Chairman: Could we pursue that? Just what is the population?

Mr. Sifton: 146,000; that is the Chamber of Commerce talking; 146,000.

The Chairman: And the Leader-Post, according to the circulation figures, is about 60,350.

Mr. Sifton: 68,000 altogether.

The Chairman: And is it the only daily newspaper?

Mr. Sifton: That is one of many sources.

The Chairman: CKCK, Regina, a circulation of 143,000—143,500. Are there other radio stations?

Mr. Sifton: Yes; there are a good many other stations in Regina. There are four others in Regina besides CKCK.

Mr. Thomson: Perhaps I should correct that 68,000 figure. That is the circulation of the Leader-Post; 39,000 approximately are circulated in the city and approximately 29,000 are in the country.

The Chairman: CKCK-TV station in Regina has a 178,300 figure. Are there other television stations in Regina?

Mr. Sifton: Yes. The Moose Jaw station is really a Regina-Moose Jaw one. Regina and Moose Jaw have one market and, indeed, the Moose Jaw television station, certainly in their trade journal advertising, refers to CHRE—Regina; they have a stick on the east side of Regina and we have a stick on the north of Moose Jaw and they are treated as one market.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Balmer, you listed some penetration of other media into the community. You listed, I forget how many, newspapers from outside.

Mr. Balmer: There are 12 Canadian newspapers circulated in the province, 10 from outside the Province and, if you like, there are 14 daily newspapers in the province, including two of our own and Regina-Moose Jaw, but there are 10 coming from outside the province.

The Chairman: Would you agree that it is fair to say that the Regina Leader-Post is the only newspaper, the only daily newspaper which circulates in Regina and gives coverage to local Regina news?

Mr. Sifton: Yes. There are university papers—

The Chairman: But I am talking about coverage of Regina City Council on a daily paper basis. Surely it is exclusive to your paper so; therefore, is it not fair to say if I live in the City of Regina and want to read daily newspaper coverage of, let us say, what is happening at the Regina City Council, then I must buy your paper?

Mr. Sifton: The only consumption of information is through the printed media. Yes; this is true.

The Chairman: Because you would agree. I am sure.

Mr. Sifton: It is axiomatic; it has to be.

The Chairman: Do you agree the in-depth coverage is superior to television or radio?

Mr. Sifton: I will buy that. I am not inclined to make bald statements.

Mr. Crittenden: You have got five radio stations covering City Council to a good degree, and you have two television stations that are doing the same thing in Regina. Now, aside from the daily reporting of those activities through our particular medium, if there is anything that is of real interest to the community, then either our radio or our television takes the in-depth, either through open-line shows or special features, which we have done many times.

We are not the only ones in the community. The other broadcast stations will—well, we sometimes say they are not as aggressive, but in particular instances, they do it.

The Chairman: I think I take that point. If I may express an opinion, I do not think radio stations or television stations provide the kind of in-depth coverage that I am speaking of.

I agree from time to time they move in on special events. Would you agree with me, Mr. Sifton, that a newspaper which is the only newspaper in a city the size of Regina has a special responsibility?

Mr. Sifton: Yes. I suggest to you that—just a second now, because of the complexities, I do not think you can say they have a monopoly.

The Chairman: I did not say a monopoly.

My question was, would you agree that a newspaper which is the only daily newspaper in a city the size of Regina has a special responsibility?

Mr. Sifton: Our attitude all down the line is a matter of is it in your self-enlightened, better interest to provide a non-biased service.

The Chairman: So the answer to my question is yes.

Mr. Sifton: I do not think in a multi-newspaper community that I would do any differently. Maybe Bill Thomson would like to make a comment on that.

The Chairman: By all means. I would like to ask Mr. Sifton a question which he has anticipated. Does an operation of an only newspaper in a city the size of Regina—I think you have said there is a special responsibility—my next question is how does that special responsibility differ from the responsibility of the proprietor of a daily newspaper in Toronto or Montreal?

Mr. Sifton: We are accustomed to providing this kind of service so that it is a hypothetical case. If I were to be in the position where I was responsible for a newspaper operation in a multi-newspaper town, I cannot see that we would alter our methods or approaches or philosophies in any way, shape or form.

I think you can only read one newspaper, or most people only prefer to read one newspaper. There are people and lots of them who have special interests and want to get all the newspapers' approaches on it, but I do not think we would change our philosophies in any way.

I cannot conceive of any difference.

Mr. Balmer: I would like to make a comment. We sometimes have our disagreements. I am sure we agree with this one. He is all the time berating for certain what he thinks are inefficiencies. We say, "Look, here are 10 other papers doing a job. This is better than any one of them." He says, "I am not a bit interested in what the other newspapers are doing. We have to do the best job we can." That is his answer. This is the philosophy that operates in Regina, Saskatchewan: We know what other newspapers are doing and as long as we are better, what somebody else does is of no concern.

Mr. Sifton: We are not interested in the yardsticks of somebody else; we create our own yardsticks.

The Chairman: I would like to return to yardsticks in a minute or two.

Mr. Thomson: I think we have a responsibility. I think we do everything that is expected of us and I think we meet the needs of our readers.

Over here I brought an exhibit to show the sort of service we give to Regina people at civic election time. In that exhibit you will see a series of stories that came about in various ways through conversations with our own chiefs. I mean our own local executives in Regina.

In the articles, we outlined the whole operation of civic finance. Closer to the election, we ran another series of stories which had to deal with money questions that were coming before the electors. All these things were discussed fully and everything was laid out for the electors.

Two days before the election, we carried one full page of aldermanic candidates and who they were. It is in the book.

We also carried on another day all of the school trustee candidates. When I say we devoted a full page, I should say we devoted our main local page, page 3, for this particular information to the public.

I say this is our responsibility. We feel that the public must be informed and adequately informed and we think we carry out that responsibility adequately.

The Chairman: I am going to ask Mr. Thomson when that was.

Mr. Thomson: Just prior to the last civic election, in early November.

The Chairman: I would be curious to know what percentage of the electorate voted.

Mr. Thomson: 32 or 35 percent. It was not good; it was in that area.

Mr. Sifton: May I just ask to clarify, would you do it any differently if you were operating in Montreal or Toronto?

Mr. Thomson: Not in principle; no.

Mr. Sifton: In other words, the basic philosophies you applied to the situation you would apply at a multi-newspaper situation as well?

Mr. Thomson: We have done this to a greater or lesser extent every year for civic elections. We do it for every provincial election and for every federal election, too.

Mr. Crittenden: On the point of obvious concern to you, the low vote. I should explain in the community that the office of mayor only comes up once every second year and attracts public attention more in that year than in a year in which you are just replacing a few aldermen.

In a year where the mayor is included with the aldermen, then the vote goes up, but not to our liking.

The Chairman: I would like to return to Senator Hays, but I shall come back.

Senator Hays: I would like to ask a question about the amount of space that you give to agriculture. There is a great vacuum as you pointed out in your brief and that is as far as farmers.

There is a great deal of information that is just not available to farmers today. I realize your papers are doing an excellent job so far as farmers are concerned.

Do you feel more could be done insofar as agriculture? I would like to, for instance, point to the man who grows wheat which out-yielded the wheat which you grow mostly in Saskatchewan by seven or eight bushels. Saskatchewan farmers are still growing great percentages of that much cheaper wheat and I do not know what they are going to do.

Are you getting stories as far as agriculture is concerned? You also related that 36,000 papers in are Regina and 29,000 went to the outlying areas which would be mostly the farm community, whether they were in towns or not.

Mr. Thomson: It is farming communities that read our papers even though the papers go into the villages and towns. The changing living habits in Saskatchewan have been similar to other places in Canada and a great many farmers now live in little towns for a large part of the year.

In some cases, they live there just the winter months. In other cases, if the farm is not too far, they live in town and commute to the farm and carry on farming operations.

As far as agriculture goes, we carry every bit of agriculture news that we can find and get our hands on. We have one chap on staff, a reporter, who has become pretty much an expert. I would think perhaps he is not a technical expert, but he has a good working knowledge of a great many things having to do with the farm and writes a column at fairly regular intervals.

I could not tell you exactly what they are. He is also a chap who is reporting and is so respected by agricultural organizations that he is invited into their sessions which are otherwise kept closed to the press.

Senator Hays: What percentage of your staff are working in agriculture?

Mr. Melville: There is one reported whose sole duty is the coverage of agriculture and we have another chap who is now promoted to others, but he is still there and he actually is our expert. The other fellow is a good man and is under his guidance.

Mr. Sifton: May I suggest there are stringers out in the community. A good amount of the agricultural news comes out as news and can be treated by other members of the staff, in that sense; but Scotty is talking about the constant delving into what you call the farm beat, the agricultural beat. I think that is fair to say.

Mr. Melville: On top of that we have a provincial editor, a knowledgeable man coming from a farm area in the first place and travelling the country extensively. So we have men go out all of the time.

Senator Hays: How did you treat the fact that the Government provided $225 million and advanced payments to wheat farmers?

Mr. Sifton: Front page.

Senator Hays: That was front page news.

Mr. Melville: Yes; sure.

Senator Hays: That is the way you would treat that sort of news?

Mr. Melville: Absolutely yes.

Mr. Sifton: The most important factor, sir, is the community. It involves a great deal more than merely the farmers direct involvement.

Senator Hays: The premier did not know it.

Mr. Crittenden: From the electronic end of the family we recognize how important it is, the agricultural field, and we originate the weekly show, Rural Route Saskatchewan. This has been going on for a good number of years and has the participation of both provincial and federal officials, with strong participation of the farmer. You better believe this, any amount of money that comes from anywhere gets a dominant place in any news-cast we have got.

Senator Hays: I should say I could make you feel kind of good. We have done a bit of a survey and your papers are one-two in all of Canada, so far as this goes.

Mr. Crittenden: We are most pleased.

The Chairman: Senator Hays, you have been doing your homework. May I just ask a further question of Mr. Sifton, a hypothetical question. Would you think it would be regrettable if in a city like Toronto there was only one daily newspaper?

Mr. Sifton: Boy; that is a hard one to answer. Let me say this: It may be in due course with the changing desires of the public, it may be that there will be no newspaper in due course.

The Chairman: I did not say none.

Mr. Sifton: I am saying there may be one, may be none, may be 20, but we do not know. For example, the things that are referred to in magazines today, are they going to be the future for the newspaper?

The Chairman: Would you think it would be a healthy situation if in Toronto there were only one newspaper?

Mr. Sifton: And how many radios?

The Chairman: Talking about daily newspapers for the moment.

Mr. Sifton: I would not want to make a bald statement in respect, sir. I am sorry. It is conceivable it might be bad. If that were the case, it might be more likely they probably would serve the community well for the people who want to get their basic information, their background information, the whole works, from a newspaper.

I do not think that I can go on record as saying this kind of thing is absolute. I do not think it is absolute. I think you have to look at the situation and all of the sources of information.

The Chairman: Let me put another hypothetical question. Let us theorize there is only one newspaper in Toronto. Would you agree with me that we could then describe the newspaper as having a monopoly so far as daily newspaper circulation is concerned in that city?

Mr. Sifton: Not necessarily. It would be a monopoly only if they performed there in such a way as to prohibit another newspaper.

If they went out of their way, for example, to consciously drive anybody from coming or indeed to the licensing authority and said, "Do not license", I think you might be into a monopoly situation.

It is a pretty hypothetical situation. The yardstick that I apply is a matter of service to the community. This is another thing altogether.

The Chairman: Let me ask you a more practical question. How big must a city be before newspaper competition can survive? In other words, let us say the Prince Albert daily newspaper is the only newspaper in Prince Albert. Presumably another newspaper could not survive there.

Mr. Melville: In Vancouver a few years ago another newspaper tried it and failed.

Mr. Sifton: On the other hand, using those same yardsticks, look at the small community that has daily newspapers and has had them for a long time on small revenues, smaller than are available to the Vancouver market.

Mr. Melville: With reference to the period when we had a second paper, I looked at it at that time. There was nothing wrong with it, but economically, it just could not work. One or the other had to go.

The Chairman: I am not being critical.

Mr. Sifton: I do not mean to be difficult. I do not think that you can—that I can make that bad a statement.

The Chairman: I think personally that in a city the size of Regina in which you own the only daily newspaper, that that puts you in an unusual situation. I am sure you would agree. Now what I am trying to find out from you is what size of city do you think could support another daily newspaper at the present time compared to Regina?

Mr. Sifton: Let me ask a question, too, to the answer. I have been laughed at by an awful lot of people from coast to coast when I got involved in Toronto Life Magazine. I think we are going to make it but everything said it could not be done.

I do not know. I do not think that I could make a bald statement that a town of 100,000 can support one, two, or three newspapers. I do not know that I am on sound ground to say that 100 million people can support a particular number of newspapers in general, even when you get a role of that nature.

Look at New York, for example, with the dollar that is involved. You talk about economics. I do not think the economics—I think there is a great deal more involved. I do not think that you can pin it directly to the straight economic factor. Look at the New York market. It is a fantastic area.

Any yardstick that I may have does not apply and vice versa. I do not think that there is a magic formula. I really do not.

Mr. Crittenden: In answer to your first question, if we had three newspapers, I think we would find it regrettable if one of them went under.

The Chairman: That is a good answer.

Mr. Sifton: We think it is less desirable.

The Chairman: I am trying to establish what in your mind is the size of the community in Canada which can provide for a competitive situation.

Mr. Crittenden: It is pretty difficult. You look at the American scene.

Senator Hays: What about Edmonton?

Mr. Crittenden: There is a city of 420,000. Calgary, which is smaller, supports two; Edmonton one.

The Chairman: Without my passing judgment on the Edmonton situation at all, do you think it healthy that a city the size of Edmonton only has a single newspaper?

Mr. Thomson: I think you have to look at the sort of job the Edmonton Journal is doing. If it is providing the service to the public that the public requires and needs, then I see no harm in a single newspaper in that city. The more service available to the public, the better so far as the community interest to the citizens is concerned.

The Chairman: Is it healthy in Regina?

Mr. Sifton: This is one of the reasons why we never have gone out and said, "Do not license our competition." If there is a new guy who wants to compete, let the public decide.

Mr. Crittenden: Obviously if there were another paper in Regina and it could survive, then we have a desirable situation.

The Chairman: You have been very patient in my line of questioning. I do not want to prolong this. You said earlier in the presentation about the people passing judgment on the adequacies of the various media you represent. I would suggest to you that that is true up to a point.

Mr. Sifton: Sure; put us out of business in a hurry.

The Chairman: You must remember for the certain kind of service you have, they have no alternative in that community. I think you agree.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Melville, if the owner of your newspaper gave the newspaper a million dollars to improve the Leader-Post, what would you do with it to improve your newspaper. How would you go about it?

Mr. Melville: First I want to see if it was counterfeit because I do not think he would give it.

Mr. Fortier: The reflection...

Mr. Melville: When you see all that money at one time, with all due respect, I have not...

Senator Hays: Joe Smallwood would know what to do.

Mr. Thomson: You may or may not be aware that is was only about five years ago that we erected the new plant in Regina.

Senator Hays: I am aware of it.

Mr. Thomson: I have among the exhibits a set of pictures to indicate the kind of plant we are operating, the atmosphere under which people work and I think they probably indicate the fact that, perhaps, we could not spend a million dollars.

Mr. Fortier: I would like to hear from the editor to see if he could improve his newspaper with the million dollars.

Mr. Melville: I suppose I could possibly hire back some of the bright young men who left us for the richer fields in eastern Canada. I know a number of them that started out with us, green as grass. We helped train them. You must remember in our papers, there is one thing: The key members of our staff have been with us for a great many years. They grew up inside the paper situation, as did Bill Thomson and myself, our news editor, our provincial editor, the fellow who puts out the front page. They have been with us, none of them less than say, the end of 1945, after the war.

These people are good people, competent people, so when some young men with great possibilities come in with us we are not going to keep them, but if I had a million dollars, I would bring them back. Do you want me to name some of them?

Senator Hays: You named them in the brief.

Mr. Fortier: I would be interested in hearing whether or not there is an aspect of your present coverage which you would attempt to improve, for example.

Mr. Melville: You could do it possibly a little easier with more bodies, but we work hard at it as it is.

Mr. Fortier: Would you like to have correspondents in other cities besides Ottawa, across the country?

Mr. Sifton: It would be nice to have our own man in Moscow, Paris.

Mr. Fortier: Let us start with Canada.

Mr. Melville: I think Ottawa; I would not mind having one in Vietnam; I would not mind having one in Moscow basically.

The Chairman: How about in Quebec?

Mr. Melville: Yes, sir; in Quebec. I am fond of Quebec.

Mr. Fortier: May I ask you the same question. How would you go about improving the quality of your newspaper if you had more funds than you do have today available to do so?

Mr. Melville: I would be inclined to use these funds to give more of our reporters more time for more detail. Now we do have some who would like to work on a story for six weeks, but their time is limited. On occasion, we are able to take a good senior man out and turn him loose on something we feel is very important so he can do a real solid backgrounding job on it.

We carry the day-to-day news. I really feel there is a function in a newspaper which was, at one time, really looked upon as a function of the magazines—of taking these day-to-day stories and drawing them into perspective. This is the way I would be inclined to use that million dollars.

Mr. Fortier: You make a point—I am addressing my question to both editors here—of stressing that your newspapers are politically independent and that this is as the owner would wish it. Now has it ever happened in either a provincial or a federal election that you have endorsed different leaders, different candidates competing for the same position?

Mr. Melville: I would say this: I do not know. Not in my time.

Mr. Fortier: Going back five years.

Mr. Melville: I have been there only since 1964.

Mr. Fortier: But your time with the newspapers goes back. I am just not clear on your answer. I am sorry. You have been with the newspaper 35 years.

Mr. Melville: Right.

Mr. Fortier: When you answered "Not in my time", did you refer to 35 years or what?

Mr. Melville: Six years or five years that I have been editor.

The Chairman: Prior to that, did it happen?

Mr. Melville: I am afraid I cannot tell.

The Chairman: Can anyone answer that?

Mr. Thomson: There certainly have been different instances on public questions. However, I think your question was confined to leadership of a party.

Mr. Fortier: Leadership of a party; support at election time.

Mr. Thomson: I cannot recall.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you.

Mr. Sifton: The job of a newspaper, as our team sees it, is to make the information available so that the electorate can make a choice. When that includes the editorial page, there is some information on that page that is written by our people, supporting a stand on the particular issue. There is a great deal of information on that page that is collected from other organizations, other newspapers.

If they see something in something that particularly appeals to them, whether in the Miami Herald or the Timbuktu Journal, they may lift that and put it with the credit as in their opinion a profound statement of principle.

The Chairman: But at election time, your paper takes a...

Mr. Sifton: We take more positions in between elections than at election time. The primary purpose at election time is to make knowledge available. In fact the boys have actually said, "All right, here you are. Here is the space" and published the flat information on the individual involved.

The Chairman: We accept that. Mr. Fortier's question is a good one. Have the Leader-Post and the Star-Phoenix ever supported different parties in the same election campaign that you recall?

Mr. Sifton: I cannot recall an actual position of supporting two candidates, but I can certainly recall a degree of support for one candidate as opposed to another and recall this very well. Regina had a very good friend of mine who was running for the leadership, I believe, at that time, and he said, "Why can't you get Regina to back me, or Saskatoon?"

I said, "That is up to the individual. I cannot do this at all."

I think another thing is related to what Mr. Fortier is trying to get at. This was given to us in a facetious manner, yet I do not think I intended...

Mr. Fortier: No; no.

Mr. Sifton: I think it was about the Star-Phoenix that the Premier said, much earlier, "I think these papers must be doing a good job when all parties are mad at them." At the same time, it was evidence in favour. That was great competition for the public.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Sifton...

Mr. Sifton: Incidentally, at that time, the other members were in the room and they were going like this too, indicating an affirmative.

Mr. Fortier: I read the brief where only one owner is not inherently detrimental and you have explained it well. What I would like, what I think the committee would like to get from you is a view as to whether there is a point where concentration can become dangerous.

Mr. Sifton: Per se, no. Conversely, we have been talking hypothetical cases, whether in my opinion we can look at Toronto and say—like forget about radio and forget about magazines and other formal means of the flow of information—to say per se that this is detrimental in itself. Maybe that paper is doing a fantastic job, as I say. It is also equally possible, it has a great deal of bearing as to the type of individual that heads up the corporation, that are responsible for the service that is being provided and it doesn't matter whether the radio, television, newspaper combines, without the others, it still comes back to the people that are involved and the degree of service they provide.

Mr. Fortier: I ask you this question because of your wide experience in the field of media. It is a hypothetical one.

Mr. Sifton: It is a very difficult one to answer. Please, I am not trying to evade...

Mr. Fortier: I am not asking you to name names, but I would ask you to look across Canada, the people involved in the ownership of more than one media and I would ask you, if you can, to tell us whether or not in your opinion power to which you refer in your brief has been exercised detrimentally by the owner of more than one media.

Mr. Sifton: Not to my knowledge. I do not know of any special situation; no. Just to emphasize that point about the multiple owners and their radio is maybe second or third in the market, and again you get back to the public making the choice. So long as they are well served by a multiplicity of units, then the public is going to make a decision.

Mr. Fortier: I was going to refer back to this citation from Mr. Litwin which I find at Pages 20 and 29 of your brief. I am going to read Item 8:

"Common ownership of media was found to be potentially detrimental to the public interest in only one case (out of 38)—in a small isolated market where an economically-powerful family controlled the only newspapers, and a radio-TV combination".

Is there an instance of this type of thing in Canada in existence?

Mr. Sifton: I am unfamiliar with any incidence of this. It is conceivable. I do not know of any. I consider myself a very proud Canadian. I know most parts of Canada.

Mr. Fortier: You make two suggestions; one is about the 75 percent Canadian ownership and the second one is about disclosure of owners. Does your suggesting this mean if the owner is involved not only in the field of communications, but also in other industries? Should this be pointed out in the newspaper that the publisher not only owns...

Mr. Sifton: Yes. If I might say what our practice is; this is something that we chose to do. If, for example, the newspapers are to make editorial comment at all regarding broadcasting, one of our rare instructions that our gentlemen have been given by me is that they must disclose in the editorial the fact that this company has a sistership involved in the broadcasting business.

Mr. Fortier: Has it happened?

Mr. Sifton: Yes. It has happened. There is another factor here. We talk about the effect of disclosure in the community. It is not necessary to go maybe to the extent that we chose to go. However, we think it is necessary and maybe through the medium of the Securities Act, I am not sure this is possible, it may be through the disclosure factors in the Securities Act.

Take a hypothetical situation where there is a wheat situation in the community and the newspaper decides to take action. It may be that the newspaper is owned by one of the elevator companies. Now, even if the ownership is not displayed, although we choose to go overboard in this respect, even if this is not displayed, the fact is that the wheat pool has got the right to find out whether special interest is involved through a disclosure situation. If they find out that they have a special interest, believe me, the newspaper would be in deep, deep trouble in the judgment of their readers. There is no question of this.

Mr. Fortier: Using your example, would your recommendation go so far as to include disclosure of that ownership?

Mr. Sifton: Yes; I think there should be access to ownership interests by the public. I do not think there is any question of this.

Mr. Fortier: If there is editorial comment, say, on the wheat situation which you have just described, there should be a postscript.

Mr. Sifton: We think so.

Mr. Crittenden: And the public judges accordingly.

Mr. Sifton: The judgment of the public as to whether or not the newspaper's authenticity, weight of argument, is valid or not could be totally different.

Mr. Fortier: I appreciate your answer; thank you. I just have a few more questions, if I may.

The Chairman: Senator McElman? Fine.

I just might say this has been a long session for the witnesses. We will try to adjourn presently.

Mr. Sifton: Thank you, sir.

Mr. Fortier: I have several more questions. We won't try and spin the thing out. Please cut me off whenever you wish.

Next to Newfoundland—and we heard from a representative of Newfoundland yesterday—Saskatchewan has the poorest daily newspaper coverage of any Canadian province. The figure which I have over here and which you may dispute if you have contrary information is that 34 percent of the households in Newfoundland are reached by newspapers, while there are 50 percent in Saskatchewan.

Now, obviously, there are geographical reasons.

Mr. Sifton: May I make one comment? I have often envied the metropolitan newspapers. They literally lean out and fling the newspaper up the driveway.

Mr. Thomson: Just in case there is a misunderstanding. When the reference to Regina's population was made, it was 146,000. We only have 39,000 papers being delivered in the city. This is a wrong relationship of figures. We should give you household if you wish. In fact, there are about 37,500 householders in Regina and we distribute about 39,000 papers.

Mr. Fortier: My statistics deal with household penetration and the information we have is 50 percent of the householders in the whole province of Saskatchewan are penetrated by a newspaper on any given day, by a daily newspaper. Now, as you will point out, this is for geographical reasons, but the point this would appear to make is that it puts a special onus on radio and television to transmit daily news.

Now, my question in view of this, does CKCK radio in Regina provide more than CKOC in Hamilton?

Mr. Crittenden: I think probably CKCK does because we are the oldest and we were the first station by a country mile in our community.

Mr. Struthers: I think we got this way by giving the people what they want. For instance, we have special coverage of the legislature, City Council, you name it. It is in the book here, all the facets that we project through broadcasting station.

Mr. Fortier: I could not make a comparison between the Hamilton and Winnipeg stations. I wonder if you have figures which shows that in Regina you show more news content over your station than in your Hamilton and Winnipeg ones.

Mr. Sifton: May I suggest, we have one of the most unique situations as far as radio in any comparable market anywhere in the country that I know of and news always has been heavy.

The Chairman: How many people are employed in news at the station in Regina?

Mr. Struthers: Public affairs director, news managing editor, legislative reporter, editor and three editor announcers and reporters, photographers...

The Chairman: Is that radio?

Mr. Struthers: We operate a joint pool in which suitable news for television can be pulled from it as well as for radio.

The Chairman: Can you make a comparison?

Mr. Sifton: Yes. I have been in Regina when we have had a snow storm and people cannot get home. The whole damned broadcast day is disrupted "Mrs. Jones, your husband is not going to get home" and so on.

Mr. Crittenden: To get a little closer to the question, we are serving a far greater area. Winnipeg and Hamilton are more concentrated as far as area. We cover a far greater area that extends coast to coast in our province, and we have stringers all over and we reflect the whole community.

Now, the other thing is that we are located in a capital city and it has a bearing. The people are interested in hearing what is going on in home plate and we project this.

Mr. Fortier: Would you call them horizontal stations in Hamilton and Winnipeg?

Mr. Crittenden: They are a different makeup of station completely.

Mr. Fortier: So you cannot make the comparison that I asked for?

Mr. Crittenden: No; we really cannot. I think I should explain that fitting into the market where we think we can perform a service, and with due respect to my President, this is maybe something the newspapers should do if—there is a specialization, maybe somebody could go ahead and become a competitor to the newspaper field by supplying a specialized service.

It is happening in radio. If you all do the same thing, one is going to be a leader. By picking out specialists, they can make a field for themselves which they can become dominant in.

Mr. Fortier: I was amazed to read that your television station until recently was affiliated with CBC chain and had a higher view audience than the CTU.

Mr. Sifton: That involves an operating approach that we would just as soon not hand out to our opposition.

Mr. Fortier: But have you joined the CTV chain?

Mr. Crittenden: And take our secrets with us.

Mr. Fortier: The formula is a secret one.

Mr. Sifton: No, sir. At this time, the formula is a matter of approach. The more we get into it, the more I am disclosing our hand or our position.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier was not expecting to divulge secrets.

Mr. Struthers: Our people are deeply involved in the community. This goes for every member of our staff in the main. They know what is going on.

We present a program format, not only that we get from the network, but that of our own station in addition and all of these things made a mix that was desirable, obviously, and in comparison with other markets, appeared to be more desirable, reflecting our success, than it did with other affiliates of the CBC.

This was not true of all of them because I see one sitting in the room that did maybe a better job than I did as a CBC affiliate. We are most proud of our record.

The Chairman: Have you other questions?

Mr. Fortier: Thank you.

The Chairman: Senator McElman, while you are deciding how you are going to phrase your question, I would like to ask about a quotation which interests me. In Mr. Litwin's National Association of Broadcasters report, at Page 29, you have made a brief statement of his findings.

The first one is "The mass media have less influence on thought and behavior than is popularly believed". Would you care to comment on that?

Mr. Sifton: Yes. It happens to be something right down the line I believe. I do not think it is the popular conception. There is a great power of the press that can lead people down the garden path. I do not think we should worry too much about this. I think the great power of the press is not in that way at all.

I think all we can do—I think it has been time after time after time in history ably demonstrated that we cannot as media people lead people down the garden path or, in fact, get them to do something they do not believe in at all. All we can do is contribute to their fund of knowledge as an information source so they can make a learned decision. That is the name of the game.

The Chairman: Is it not a decision dependent upon what you see in your paper?

Mr. Sifton: I think what they see in our paper is certainly—I would hope—something that contributes to their knowledge, the factors they know about in coming to a decision as to what should be done or should not be done.

The Chairman: Well, I wonder if the people who are selling advertising space and selling radio time and television time, the advertising agencies—and this is a billion dollar business in this country—I wonder if they would agree that the mass media have less influence on thought and behavior than is popularly believed.

Mr. Sifton: I think there are a lot of advertising people that think that.

The Chairman: Isn't your advertising influential?

Mr. Sifton: That you can sell a bad product over again?—I do not think; all we can do, if you are interested in soap, we can maybe inveigle you into buying a specific brand. It never has been suggested, to my knowledge, that if you are not satisfied with a brand that you are going to go back and buy that brand again.

The Chairman: Does advertising not move products?

Mr. Sifton: Yes.

The Chairman: Is advertising not in the mass media?

Mr. Sifton: It moves products through introduction of new products. It moves products to the extent of reminding—I am sure you are not different from what I am. I go to the store with my wife and get some soap.

I have got to admit there is a subliminal thing that is involved. I go to the one that has dingle bells on it because of something.

The Chairman: Please do not mistake what I am saying. I speak as one who has sold advertising in the mass media.

Mr. Crittenden: I think there are two different ways to look at this. There is one that moves in my mind, a pleading announcement every day to the public to drive carefully; you know, respect your family; tighten your seat belts. Yet every day, people are going out and...

The Chairman: Think how awful it would be without these announcements.

Mr. Crittenden: The increased number of accidents means obviously people are not paying too much attention.

Mr. Sifton: All we can do is remind you to put on your seat belt.

The Chairman: All you can say is that national advertising campaigns develop sales, which would drop rapidly without mass media.

Mr. Sifton: Of course. Talking about leading people down the garden path in a political sense, asking them to put their vote on something, they do not want to put their vote on, really is the area this thing if referring to.

The Chairman: Okay. Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: Could I just comment on the discussion you have had. First, I think there is a differentiation as to short term and long term. In your last statement, you were talking about a short term political aspect of which, if you will let me, please—this was the approach in the famous case of Harry Truman.

This was an effort on the short term to dump a man; perhaps in any event, to give him no chance. It was proven that all of the media were wrong. If they were trying to lead the public, they were unable to do so.

I think all this tires people who are students of what happens in the media. The degree of constant, day-to-day, month-to-month, drip, drip of the Chinese water treatment in any particular area will get through to people. I do not think there is any question. I think that is the approach used around the country to a large degree.

Mr. Sifton: You are referring to the reminder advertising, like the coke billboard.

Senator McElman: No; given editorial policy.

When I speak of the Chinese water treatment, I am talking of some advertising as such, although certainly advertising consultants say you must keep it going; do it both by changing your ad a little today; drive it home day after day. Of course, Coca Cola you mentioned is the prime example to totally convince the population to buy their produce. All they have to do is keep up day after day after month after year.

So I think this statement here was divided as to short and long term. I do not want to get into further discussion. I thought it was a valid point.

Mr. Balmer: you said there are ten other dailies that come into Saskatchewan; is that correct?

Mr. Balmer: That is correct; yes.

Senator McElman: The 10 are not too relevant without circulation. What would be the total of circulation?

Mr. Balmer: I must admit it is not that exciting. I have not totalled them up as such. I would tell you this: They are all under a thousand. The two Winnipeg papers are 882 and 829. Then the Edmonton paper, being the nearest, is 541. The Globe and Mail is one that is really growing—560; plus 213 on a daily basis.

The Globe and Mail Business Report comes not every day, but when it comes, 560. The daily itself has 213 subscribers and then you go right down the line, there is Medicine Hat News, 149; Toronto Star is 66.

I like to think that in most cases when people move from a community, they retain their papers for some time. Then they will eventually drop this. People will be reaching to subscribe to another paper because they do not like what they are getting at home.

Senator McElman: Well, we are at a 4-5,000 mark; are we not?

Mr. Balmer: Yes.

Senator McElman: So the 10 is not that significant.

Mr. Balmer: That is true.

Senator McElman: Probably, as you say, this is people who have some special interest; it does not compete with local news in any sense.

Mr. Balmer: True.

Senator McElman: The Armadale brief appears to reject out of hand press councils. There are various types of press councils; the type currently used in the U.K., of course, is a self-policing press council, composed mostly of people in the business. I believe there is a judge as chairman. That is one type.

We have heard and, of course, their situation is somewhat different in a geographical sense and other senses from that in Canada. We have heard several propositions as to what might work in Canada. One of those was that it will be a tri-level council, at local or community level, at the provincial or regional level, and at the federal level. Although it was not spelled out, I assumed it is somewhat like the levels of an appeals court, that it could not be handled at the community level. It would move up into the next levels.

Would such a council composed of media people and responsible people in the community, without being established by the government or encouraged by the government or influenced by the government in any sense, would that be acceptable at any level, or at all three levels?

Mr. Sifton: I personally feel that the main thing that is involved here is the substitution of a press council—it is tantamount to the substitution of direct access to the people who are responsible. That I find undesirable. That is substitution for responsibility.

I have even heard some people state that it is a form of yellow journalism. I cannot go that far, but I do think that definitely there is no substitute for the responsibility being firmly placed upon the individual responsible by the community and there is the place where the halter must lie. It must go on the right horse.

Senator McElman: Let me put the same question to the editors. In your direct dealings with the community, would it be of any assistance in carrying through the philosophical objectives set out by Armadale to have some reference to the people of the community in this fashion? Would there be some feedback here that would be useful to you?

Mr. Melville: You are asking me?

Senator McElman: Yes.

Mr. Melville: I personally do not like the idea because I believe myself and the people who work with me are responsible people and responsible to the community. I do not know what a press council could do or would do.

You would have to state cases. Do you know of any cases where a newspaper is so bad that a need of that kind of direction is present? Also, does the Senator, for example, need a body over him or over the Senate to see that it does right? You are public officials in some respects, as we are.

Does Parliament need it? Where do you stop or where do you start? The other thing, and I may be wrong, but it seems they have a press council in Great Britain and not long ago the discussion came up; a certain lady wanted to sell her memoirs. I believe the press council suggested that nobody should touch it with a ten-foot pole because some people have suffered in the past and have rehabilitated themselves. It would be wrong to bring it up again.

One newspaper laughed that off and I understand is going ahead with these memoirs, which I am quite sure will find is an individual paper which has a large circulation. Now, was there any penalty?

The Chairman: Do you think there should have been?

Mr. Melville: No. I think that a press council does not work.

The Chairman: Well, do you think there should have been a penalty?

Mr. Melville: What I am asking is how could they stop this fellow from doing it.

Mr. Sifton: There is a substitution of putting responsibility for republication of that on the shoulder of the individual concerned. You have got a situation like "Don't bother me; that responsibility is the responsibility of the press council."

Senator McElman: Mr. Melville, you are suggesting about it being a body over the press.

Mr. Melville: No.

Senator McElman: Let me tell you please that we would not want another body over the Senate either. It does not apply. Let me say that the principle involved here is not that a press council is over anybody; it is simply a reference point. I think perhaps the best simile that could be drawn is an ombudsman, something that is finding apparently growing favour throughout the world.

The only reason I raise it is because of your reference to Parliament. There are a number of European countries with Ombudsmen who apparently are serving a highly useful purpose to which individuals can make their requests for investigation, not in a legal sense, but consideration of a grievance.

The principle of a press council is very similar; that the public, if they feel a grievance, can go to a reference body—as in a one-newspaper town—and put their case. It is not totally necessarily newspaper people, nor totally just people of the community. It is a combination of each. It has no power of coercion.

Mr. Melville: At the present moment, if anyone feels that they have been wronged by my newspaper, he gets more than equal space in the paper to state his case. I have never refused anyone that access to state his case; never.

That is my responsibility. You have a fellow like the fellow to whom Senator Hays referred. You will never satisfy a man like that if you give him a whole page. You have got those kinds of people, of course. They do not bother us. They are not important, but anybody—particularly public officials—at any time, if they feel that we have not done right by them...

Mr. Sifton: Again, I would be delighted to have you go through the correspondence with this man. As an example, that gentleman made extensive use of the open-line shows on the other radio stations in Regina.

Now, sir, with regard to the Ombudsman aspect, there is one Parliament in Canada for all of Canada. When I say one Parliament, I mean one government. In the case of the sources of information in almost any community in Canada, with the possible exception of the extreme northland country community, there are alternative sources of information—whether they be print or electronic.

Any one personal opinion has not really too much relevance. The main thing is that he has an opportunity for varying and different opinions to be expressed.

Senator McElman: This has nothing to do with the expression of opinion. It is grievance, of course, that we are talking about.

Mr. Sifton: If, for example, Senator, you have a grievance with Scotty as far as the job he is doing in the community, I am sure that the other radio stations would be delighted to have any information from you that would beat him to death. It is a very competitive community. They have all kinds of opportunities as I say, as were referred to earlier, to make extensive use of open-line programs. They are very important in opinion.

Senator Hays: Do you think they bring listeners?

Mr. Sifton: Yes; big audiences and people are interested.

The Chairman: Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: I am finished with that.

The Chairman: Do you have anything further?

Senator Macdonald: I should like to go to another editor. This morning a few members of the press gallery gave a definition of what is meant by freedom of the press and in my mind it was wider than the traditional definition of freedom of the press.

Mr. Sifton: I think I gave it in a carefully worded section in our brief.

It is the right of the individual to know. It is the right to access to all information. This is a thing that we feel very strongly about. It is not something that we are asking for privately, or asking for ourselves. It is the privilege that we are asking on behalf of you as citizens.

Senator Macdonald: I am wondering if they are confusing the freedom of the press with the right to know.

Mr. Sifton: I believe that they are the same thing.

Senator Macdonald: As I understand the traditional definition, it was the right of the press to print. In other words, they could print unless it was illegal or against libel laws or things that that. Their definition seemed to be somewhat like yours, to include the right to access to new sources.

Mr. Sifton: We are only an implement of the community. In this sense we are an implement: We act on behalf of the citizens to gain access to information for you.

I think that most people today take the attitude that a fundamental right of every person is to have a full and free access to facts and on matters that directly or indirectly affect him, to hear and read the opinions of others who also are free of encumbrances.

That is the wider view, I think, of the legal definition.

Senator Hays: In your policy within your organization, Mr. Sifton—and this is probably old straw—you have a code of ethics within your organization?

Mr. Sifton: We have philosophies.

Senator Hays: You do not have a code of ethics? You do not want to police certain areas? For instance, I have used this example before: A man is charged with rape and then he is proven innocent. Do you disclose that sort of thing in your paper?

Mr. Sifton: This whole area of the police reporting is a very, very difficult one. We are the first to admit this. Our practice and the practice of our newspaper, I think you will find, is that we publish all of the findings of the courts, all of the time: all of them.

Senator Hays: Some prostitute charges some chap with raping and you publish his name?

Mr. Sifton: We do not cover the examination for discovery. That is not correct. If the man is charged in court and there is a court case, the court is open to the public. People sit there, so we also sit there.

Senator Hays: There are many people—well, so far we have found there are many newspapers that do not name names until he is guilty.

Mr. Melville: In most cases like that, we do not use the name until the verdict is given.

Senator Hays: You do not name him?

Mr. Sifton: Until the verdict is given. It is the same with impaired driving. If he is found not guilty, we do not use his name.

Senator Hays: Do you say he is arrested and charged with this and name him?

Mr. Melville: No. Not until after the case is up before the magistrate and the magistrate sends him to jail or finds him innocent or fines him whatever; then we use it.

Senator Hays: If they pick up Tom Jones and charge Tom Jones with rape and he has got to appear in police court on a certain day, do you say Tom Jones?

Mr. Melville: We do not say anything until he is charged.

Senator Hays: Do you mean when he is charged in court before trial?

Mr. Melville: No, when he comes to trial in court, answers his charge, is charged; if the court is open, what would happen if we did not use that sort of thing is that people in court would say, "Why are you people not covering this? The courts are public."

Senator McElman: Among the underlying principles that are referred to in the brief, there are such things as full and free access and fairness, accuracy, and balance. Do you have any sort of consultation on any regular basis with any persons or organizations outside of your own company and its holdings to test those standards?

Mr. Sifton: Every day. They are constantly in contact. Bill, would you like to start?

Mr. Thomson: I am sure that I fully understand. You did not make a reference to the brief, but if I understand you correctly, this is a matter of balance between pro and con on a given news story. Is that what you are after?

Senator McElman: No; no. You have set certain fair standards. I was wondering, although the corporation at the central level may feel that these are being met continually, do you have any measurement, any reference to public organizations, as such, to determine whether these in truth are standards that should change, that should meet changing conditions?

Mr. Sifton: You were saying do we have a set of constant contacts, community listening as to whether things are being treated properly?

Senator McElman: First at the central head office level; then as to what they may have in the given community where they operate.

Mr. Sifton: May I answer the first one? I have a number of friends that are known as being friends of mine that are within the community. In each case, these gentlemen are constantly asking how we are doing or how we are going in left field, or are we on the beam.

There are many ways that I have of judging. I make a point of having friends within these communities who know whether we are out in left field, whether we are in fact, doing a job, at least as far as the people I have contact with and their friends.

Beyond that, all through our organizations we have got people of specific interests. We have people of specific ethnic groups. We have different religions, etcetera, involved.

The first one I mention is by contact in addition to whoever is on the operating scene. We have people allocated throughout the organization. There may be an advertising salesman who has a particular interest in an ethnic group. As an example, one of our senior executives at the radio station is actively involved with the Roman Catholic Church. He not only acts as a barometer for us, but he also acts as a source of information of how we can take part in the lives of these various different sections of the community.

Senator McElman: In addition, I would assume that you do measurement of your readership.

Mr. Sifton: Regularly, sir.

Senator McElman: This would be broken down in various ways, including age groups. Could you tell us out of the studies, do you find that in the standards that you have established, the readership by the youth of today has in your papers been going up or down?

Mr. Sifton: It is a somewhat hard area or community to second guess, as you can imagine. It is a very hard one. We hope we are going to do a job, we hope we are doing a job. We are never satisfied with our own service.

Senator McElman: Did your measurements give an indication?

Mr. Sifton: No; we are not satisfied with what information we have that we are acceptable in that sense. We hope we are doing a job. We are never satisfied we are doing a good enough job. We are constantly searching for ways and means of being in contact with specialized elements in the community, such as the youth.

Mr. Thomson: We do not actually take a scientific measurement of our readership. We do not have that sort of breakdown. We have to rely and we do really rely on what we know and from our own contacts within the community.

This is, as I say, not specific, but it does give a very good idea of how we are doing.

Senator McElman: The reason I ask is, of course, there are suggestions that a large segment of the youth of today are turning off on newspapers as such, and, of course, circulation, looking to your own future—this seems to me to be one of the areas of measurement that is very important.

Mr. M. Macdonald: We are concerned about the youth groups and we have devised a method to keep us in touch with them by working through the teachers in high schools. We have a reporter from each high school in Saskatoon who contributes articles of high school news to a special section that we run on Saturday.

These reporters come in and they talk to the editors who are putting this section together. They ask questions and there is this feedback that we get about how these things are being accepted in the schools.

Now, it is not scientific, but it is an area that we are developing. I hope we develop it more.

Mr. Thomson: That same situation applies in Regina, by the way, of the teenage reporter.

The Chairman: I am not sure what it means, Mr. Sifton, but this has been a session of record length. Therefore I am going to wind this up.

I think Senator McElman has one question. Mr. Fortier has one and I have two, each very brief.

Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: I know you spoke at length of conglomerates and what your feeling is. There is one area I do not think you have touched, certainly in any detail. What would be your position with respect to conglomerates which had extensive media holdings, print and both broadcast media, but these extensive media holdings were only a very limited part of the total holdings of that conglomerate and the total holdings of the conglomerate reached into every sector, major sector of the economy of, let us say, a Province?

Is that too involved?

Mr. Sifton: Yes. I am in a position where I think the most critical element that is involved is the quality of service that is being given. I cannot comment further.

Senator McElman: There is a situation in Canada today where there is a conglomerate, in your definition of it, as well as anyone else's. This conglomerate holds extremely broad interests in every segment of the economy of that Province. It also holds all five of the English language daily newspapers. It also holds a television station which covers better than half of the Province. There are only two English stations. It also has radio interests in the one metropolis.

Mr. Sifton: I know what you are referring to now, sir. I think there is only one that fits the description that you have.

Senator McElman: Now, you have described conglomerates as being all right, depending upon how it is run, with the public interest or public peace of mind to be considered.

Would you care to venture an opinion on whether this is good or not good?

Mr. Sifton: I think that is one of the very few provinces that I have not set foot in. There is no way I can make a sound comment, sir. I would be doing an injustice.

I would be doing the people who are in the room an injustice to be talking as an expert. I am sorry. I am not ducking the question. I am just not in a position to be able to make a sound comment.

Mr. Crittenden: I wish I had the problem.

The Chairman: I will put one of my two questions. You stated in the brief that you are planning immediately to include ownership in the mastheads of your newspapers—how often do you broadcast it on the broadcasting stations?

Mr. Struthers: A minimum of once a day.

Mr. Fortier: This is my last question. It has to be of interest. Mr. Sifton, I believe, the income available insofar as the inheritance tax is concerned is of concern to you.

Mr. Sifton: Not personally.

Mr. Fortier: Members of your family?

Mr. Sifton: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: They are particularly vulnerable because you are a family-owned company.

Mr. Sifton: It is actually a trust-held and I am sole beneficiary.

Mr. Fortier: Would you like to give your views on the amendment as far as succession duties, when it came into being, how it applied to newspapers? I will leave the broadcasting interest aside for purposes of my question.

Mr. Sifton: The same factors apply there. Let me make it perfectly clear that I am not talking from personal special interest in my lifetime. My family's interests are held by a trust organization.

In principle, I cannot help but believe, I cannot conceive an advantage to having media unnecessarily chopped out of the hands of individuals through the imposition of succession duties.

Surely if this committee is very concerned about it and we seem to have had a lot of questioning and discussion and dialogue this afternoon on the business of the media coming in fewer and fewer hands, this has to be a major factor and you will certainly have read the crystal ball correctly; it will certainly be more so in the future.

Mr. Fortier: Would you have any recommendation to make to the committee? We have heard the view expressed—you may have heard it yesterday—that succession duties, in a case such as this, should be spread out over a period of five years.

I have also heard it expressed in another quarter that the succession duties be postponed for a period of 'x' years, then be recaptured, in the event the holders should sell their holdings.

Mr. Sifton: There is a wrinkle that was rather interesting where I think the Toronto, and I speak from what I know of what happened—there is a situation I believe in Toronto where the decided goal of correspondents seemed desirable within cosmopolitan community like that. They could not last on the basis of the existing taxation so they said, "All right, we will tax you a different rate". It may be that this could be highly desirable.

The Chairman: The last question I would like to ask is, do you think your papers contribute to the national interest?

Mr. Sifton: I would sure hope so.

The Chairman: Do you think they should?

Mr. Sifton: Let me put it this way: I am a Canadian and in that sense, I say, yes.

The Chairman: Last night we had as witness Mr. Claude Ryan, the publisher of Le Devoir. He was very critical of the coverage which the rest of Canada received in Quebec, but he was also very critical at the same time of the coverage of Quebec in the rest of the country. He made particular reference to the fact that with the exception of the three Toronto dailies, that none of the other daily newspapers in Canada, in his opinion, did an adequate job of servicing French Canada.

They were not inventive in discovering ways and means of covering that part of Canada.

Mr. Sifton: We had a situation at CKOC, some years ago now I am afraid, where we had an exchange of programs with a French station. I think it is a question of money, mainly. We are one of the few people, one of the few organization of our size that have an Ottawa correspondent, sitting in the back of the room—Stirling King does a fine job for us.

The Chairman: He's a good man.

Mr. Sifton: I would think if you posed that question to Scotty, Mr. Fortier, "What would you do if you had a million bucks to spend on your source material," that has to be one of his answers, where he would have additional people in these areas.

Mr. Fortier: Would you like to see him delegate a correspondent to the Province of Quebec?

Mr. Sifton: Now, this is off the cuff, without looking at the mess they are involved in.

The Chairman: Well, the other point, Mr. Sifton. The broadcasting business says that you must contribute to national unity.

Mr. Sifton: But in broadcasting, you must conform to the law; but I wonder if you think...

The Chairman: You said you think you should.

Mr. Thomson: I think I should point out one thing. We do have full access to exchanges of news through Canadian Press.

They may not do enough; I cannot say. We certainly carry a good proportion of all Quebec news that comes into our city over press wires.

The Chairman: I said earlier that this has been a long session. We must remind ourselves and the witnesses that we are receiving not one, but three briefs. We are very grateful. I thank each and every one of you on behalf of my colleagues and myself.

Senators, in our next session at eight o'clock this evening in this room, our witness will be Professor Tom Sloan, who is a veteran journalist and now head of the journalism faculty of Laval. He will be discussing the role of the media as it relates to national unity and he will be discussing training for journalism.

Thank you.

The committee adjourned.

(Upon resuming at 8 p.m.)

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, if I might call this meeting to order. The witness this evening, as I am sure you all know, is Mr. Tom Sloan who is a former newspaper man and now is the head of the faculty of communication and journalism at Laval University. He has a BA and an MA from the University of Toronto, studied at the Sorbonne, at the London School of Economics. He received a Nieman fellowship scholarship at Harvard 1967-68 and he is a former reporter for the Globe and Mail and the Montreal Star.

I think tonight, Mr. Sloan, it is your intention to proceed with a statement following which the Senators will be free to question you on the things that you say, and with your forbearance on the things that you don't say. Is that agreeable to you?

Mr. Tom Sloan: Yes. First of all I would like to stress, or I should mention that I did write a brief of approximately 11 pages which I presume perhaps some people have read.

The Chairman: My only reason for not mentioning the brief we have received is that I don't know whether it has been circulated to the Senators.

The Senators have a copy of the brief but frankly they have been inundated with materials and I can't guarantee that everyone has read it. I have read it myself and I thought it was excellent.

Mr. Sloan: Well, I have no intention of trying to make a formal statement but if I may just mention a few things which are referred to in the brief and perhaps a few that aren't during the five or ten minutes. When I say I am not making a formal statement, I don't really feel in the place to do so because I am here really representing myself. I am here as an ex-newspaperman, somebody who is still obviously an extremely interested observer of the media in Canada, but I am not a statistician and I am not a professional research person.

What I have to say in the brief, and what I have to say here are simply a few thoughts that come into my mind.

I was going to suggest that you ask for example, members of the Ottawa Press Gallery to put some of their thoughts before you but I understand this has to some extent, at least, already been done.

The Chairman: I have a note which I have been asked to give you.

[Translation]

Mr. Tom Sloan: First of all I apologize to the French speaking senators for not having prepared my brief in French. I simply did not have time to do it. Of course, I was told that an interpreter would be here, and if anyone wishes to ask questions in French, he is free to do so.

[English]

What I would like to say to begin with is that what I am sometimes afraid of doing and what I hope I haven't done in the brief, and I don't want to do now, is to make a statement of the obvious. Sometimes when you live in a field for quite a long time you can do one of two opposite things. You can either say something which you think is terribly profound and then you realize that everybody knows everything about it anyway, and everyone has their own ideas about it, or you can pass over something very quickly which you just assume and you discover that, of course the people who aren't in the field not only don't assume it but don't really know what you are talking about. I hope I don't do that but perhaps I shall and if I do I gather that questions in the discussion afterwards will straighten that out.

Generally, I am going over a little of what I had to say in the brief here, but it's in different words. Always I think in the mass media in any society you have to distinguish, you have to bring together to a certain extent a social and an individual role. They are individual in the sense that you or I sitting there in front of our radio, or sitting there in front of our television, or reading a newspaper, we are doing something as an individual or perhaps as a small group in a family. We are being entertained, we are being informed as an individual, but on the other side we are also there, we are also being informed or entertained as the case may be, as a member of a social unit.

Whether this social unit is as a member of humanity, a Canadian, or Quebecker, or a person who lives in a certain suburb, or anything else, nevertheless we do have these two roles, both of which I think have to be considered.

Probably tonight, I am concerned as you are, primarily with the social role. The individual role unless you are dealing with the Nielsen ratings or something of this type is not really something perhaps which interests us. We are dealing in terms of the Canadian community, in terms of this country, and in terms of the various societies and groups that make it up. One thing I would like to stress right at the beginning—I think in Canada especially, the social role of the mass media is absolutely vital. Much more vital than in many other places. There are obvious reasons: because of our cultural differences, because of our regionalizations and because—excuse me for saying this while I am in Ottawa—but there is no geographical centre, no physical material centre in Canada if you like, around which a feeling of unity can be crystalized.

We are just too disparate, just too far apart in so many ways and this is where I think the media should be doing today what the railroads were said to have done in the 19th Century; that is bring the country together. They are the system of transportation and communications if you like that can bring some sort of a sentiment of unity to Canada, to any country that is this large and this dispersed. Of course, we are speaking about Canada as it is right now.

Now, speaking specifically for example, as to the question of entertainment over our mass media. Here, I could be talking about newspapers—there isn't a great deal to say there except that we do have a certain amount of Canadian content. We probably have more Canadian content in one sense—I will come back to this—in newspapers than any other medium. When we come to television, of course, we have an entirely different situation. We realize, and it has been brought home to us, and it is obvious that a good deal of what comes to us over television in the guise of entertainment of course, comes from elsewhere. By the way, I am speaking of entertainment because I believe entertainment is important in the broadest cultural sense. It is in being entertained even while we most think we are individuals that we are, in a sense, without realizing it subconsciously most also perhaps a member of the community. On this basis I think it is fair to say—I am not certain I like the phrase Canadian content as such but I do think nevertheless that it is something we could be concerned with.

For example, I live in a part of the country where on many Sundays during the fall we can tune in our publicly owned network and we can have our choice of six American football games. Perhaps it is because I am a Canadian football fan but I feel I am speaking here strictly of entertainment and I think that it is rather too bad that at least on this specific small example that certain parts of the country are being forced to watch a sport from elsewhere and not being allowed to watch their own, which quite often happens. To put it more positively, I could say the same thing about certain programmes that do come over the publicly owned network—and I mention that because I think one of its basic aims is supposed to be Canadian unity—I wonder why we do have to be inflicted really to a very great extent with some rather minor situation comedies and I am thinking of one in particular—I don't know whether I need mention the name or not...

The Chairman: Certainly.

Mr. Sloan: The Beverly Hill Billies which I find might be interesting for somebody maybe once a week but do we really have to have it six nights a week at the beginning of the evening just between children and adults time?

More positively, what can we do? Well, I think the main challenge—it isn't the main challenge obviously but one of the main chal-allenges, is for us to get across to each other what—to use that word—biculturalism can mean in this country. This is difficult. I have seen some supposedly bicultural, bilingual programmes which have made me rather sick because they have been mechanically contrived. Somebody has put two words in French and then two words in English, or perhaps they have forgotten to use any words at all. This is difficult, extremely difficult but it's one of the things. It's one of the things that specifically in the mass media, and speaking of television it's one of the things that we should be trying to do and it costs money to do, and it is going to take imagination. I have seen some evidence of some effort, but not nearly enough.

There is another thing as well. We pride ourselves sometimes or call ourselves sometimes the Canadian mosaic. Well, is it really essential for us to have—I am not a statistician but I will take a guess—95% of our foreign programming all coming from the one country? Couldn't we perhaps—and I am speaking here of the English networks—put a little more emphasis on a plurality of sources? We say we want to be Canadians, we say we want to be open to the world too, but let's be open to the world and not just one part of it. I am not trying to be ultra chauvinist here I can assure you, and I do not believe in any way that we will ever or should ever get away from a situation in which American programming will be an extremely important part of our culture. After all we are part of North America and they are a lot bigger than we are.

Now to get on to information. The problem with information—here again, one of our basic issues, or one of our basic problems is news sources. Too often, we see the world through the eyes of others. I am thinking here specifically in terms of foreign news and I am not thinking of Canadian news because here I think that the publicly owned networks and a certain number of other private stations, for example, do a great deal to let us know what is happening on the Canadian scene.

In terms of foreign news, and I am not blaming anybody here, but it is a fact nevertheless—First of all let us say that there are a number of newspapers and again television stations especially connected with the CBC, who do have their own people out covering stories in the world, seeing the world if you like through Canadian eyes, and trying to explain to us in terms of our own interest and in terms of our own psychology what they do see. They are still being rather swamped and they are being swamped due to the fact that inevitably the Canadian Press news agency is an agent if you like, or a subsidiary in terms of world news of the American agency, the Associated Press.

Now, that is what is happening on one side. On the other side, Quebec, you have the French language newspapers emphasizing in their news—they say Canadian Press is of course doing this—The agency France Press news. I saw figures the other day which would suggest that in most of the major newspapers over half of the foreign news comes in through agency France Press. Whereas, the English language newspapers have nothing. They find most of it either through UPI or Associated Press or, of course, Reuters. Well, this tends to increase, if you like, our two solitudes. I make one suggestion in the brief and that is that we, the people, consider it. It may be impossible but is there no way whatsoever—it is expensive, I know, but is there no way whatsoever in which you could consider the possibility at least of having some sort of indirect or direct—I don't care, government subsidy of the Canadian Press in its foreign operations? It is quite obvious that it would be too expensive for the small numbers of papers that we have, the smaller number of papers that would be in a financially viable situation to do it otherwise.

This raises problems of course and I realize that but nevertheless I believe something has to be done if we are going to again, have some idea of what is happening in the world. Again, this is through our own eyes.

From there, I go on to the question of Canadian unity. It is one of the things that we should be concerned with and quite obviously, it isn't the only value but it's one of them and we should give some priority to it. The question is how best it should be done and I would suggest that one way we should not be doing it is by harping on it all the time. I am talking about the media here again. I am talking about television, radio and newspapers. If we simply keep talking about it as a slogan I think that we accomplish very little. We can retreat into our own little ideas as to what Canadian unity is or what it means. Canadian unity means this or it means that. It means biculturalism or it means another kind of biculturalism perhaps in the West. It could mean freight rates, or any number of things. What we should be doing is emphasizing, I think, objective information. When I use the word objectivity—I would like to come back to this later during the discussion period—I don't believe in absolute objectivity in the press because I believe it is impossible. I think if it were possible it would be too bad because absolute objectivity to me is simply machine-like reiterating of what somebody else has said. A good newspaperman, at least as far as I am concerned, is somebody who uses his own experience, his own background and his own intellectual honesty and integrity and tries to interpret as best he can what is happening.

One problem in harping on abstract Canadian unity is that sometimes in certain parts of the country, we all know, there are prejudices, local prejudices in various parts of the country. Well, there are sometimes newspapers especially, and radio and television stations who not only reflect these prejudices but broadcast them even louder and therefore help to increase them in a certain area. They can do this always with the slogan, or in the name of certain abstract national unity but I think one has to go far beyond this. I think what we should be doing is emphasizing what is happening in Canada even if some of it isn't good. Not all of it is bad either, of course, but I believe we have to stress this.

In Quebec, the question of the press is especially important; I think, maybe it is because I am there but nevertheless it is an important problem.

The English language press, especially I believe in Quebec, have a responsibility and they have to do a great deal of interpretation. It is in a beautiful place to interpret English and French to each other in Quebec because there are a large number of English speaking people in Quebec who read the English language press and they interpret what they see in Quebec from up close to the rest of Canada and I think this is about it.

Beyond biculturalism there is another problem, the problem of the Government role and that of the media as well, but I am thinking specifically of Government. I am thinking more specifically of something as down to earth as the Post Office. I have seen and I have heard what has been happening in Quebec, to Quebec newspapers, and I didn't even have to listen to Mr. Ryan last evening because this has been known for quite a long time, and I think it is probably happening all over the country, that any effort to make any system of communication, especially in a country like Canada—and I would stress this—to make it pay its own way is in the long run self-defeating because we depend—we live by communication in this country. There are very few other people in the world who do this—we live by it and if the Post Office, for example, were to have to pay its own way and all other systems as well, transportation and communications should too. If they do, well, I think that is about the end for us.

In other words, my basic principle is that communications offer the main potential resource for the preservation of Canada and we have to pay the price. We can't avoid paying the price if we decide we want to remain a country. I don't know whether you would like me to go on to the generalities of education etcetera now..

The Chairman: Well, I think we would be interested in hearing from you if you would like to carry on and talk about it.

Mr. Sloan: Fine, thank you. My experience in the field goes back just approximately a year and a half and that's all really, and that is when the Laval University courses started.

I will explain just a small bit of its philosophy. We say that there are two types of education, practical education in journalism, and communications. One is practical and has been done in a considerable number of places both in Canada and in the United States—the practical—the effort to achieve a practical training of journalists within an educational framework; and the second is theoretical. That is an attempt to make the students understand the problems of communications, the problems of the mass media, the challenges that are facing them, the shortcomings and an analysis of what they are doing etcetera. Well, Laval has opted so far at least for the latter idea. We have a feeling that practical training can be done much more quickly in either a television studio or a newspaper office than it can be certainly at university level, and not only that but it might happen that you may be training people to do the wrong things in any case.

Practice in the mass media is changing so rapidly and it varies so widely also from enterprise to enterprise and from group to group that really you might be training somebody to do something that they will have to unlearn—let me put it that way—when they get out. We may be wrong in this but this is our idea now and we will see what happens in the next few years.

One question that has been raised about journalism education quite often is whether any formal education is necessary. I find it very difficult to answer this. I find it difficult because some of the best journalists that we have or we have had have not had any formal education. Some of the people who have had formal education have not been particularly good journalists. Nevertheless I would weigh down just very slightly on the one side in saying that we are now coming into an area of more and more specialization in journalism as in other fields. A good general reporter is very important but what is becoming more and more important is a good labour reporter, a good economics reporter, a good financial reporter and so on. While it is possible to get this in many other ways than with formal education, nevertheless I think for the majority of us it is simpler to get some idea as to what we will be able to say about our specialization by taking a few years off and going to university.

One can say, for instance, that all roads lead to journalism but nevertheless a formal education is probably one of the better ones. Now, this is not to say however that holding a degree is or should be a meal ticket. I think, on the contrary, that journalism has to be kept wide open. It cannot be a profession in the sense that law and medicine are professions. I don't believe it can ever be that because we are dealing with too many varieties of life. Journalism has to cover just too much for us to say "All right, this is the road by which you become a journalist." I don't think this is possible.

Another thing is that journalism education, it has sometimes been said, is only for journalists but I think it's also for people who just simply might want to be a good newspaper reader. Somebody who wants to know his world a little better and somebody who wants to know what communication is doing for us. Communication isn't just something that is now on the fringes of our lives but it is inundating us all the time. I think a study of the theory of communication could be just as good for political scientists for example, as a study of political science would be for a journalist.

I haven't mentioned the monopolies, the problems of concentration of the press because I think you are going to hear a great deal about that and you are probably going to ask a great number of questions. One reason I haven't is because I am not certain where I stand. I am not certain as to what the future does hold or should hold.

For example, in the Quebec Committee hearings at their beginning—just to give you one small example—Mr. Pierre LaPorte, who is a former journalist of long standing with Le Devoir in Montreal, before he entered politics, said in his opinion that as far as he could see now with the present trend towards concentration of the press, there was more real freedom for the individual journalist than there was in his time, when newspapers were separate individual entities.

Well, I just don't know. For the time being, I think it is a moot question. I think that we can see situations in which there are extremely good newspapers and a position in which they form part of an empire if you like but there are extremely bad ones that are independent; so that is question that as far as I am concerned I will leave open.

Basically I would say that—I guess this has been said many many times before, and I guess it won't hurt to repeat it—that freedom of the press is simply the other side of the right of the public for information. Without that right it means nothing. Any abstract freedom—if somebody says I am a newspaper proprietor therefore I have freedom to do and say what I want—this to me is strictly abstract and it has no real meaning in our world today. I don't think it should.

Really, that is about all I wish to say at this time.

Senator Hays: Do you mind repeating that again, Mr. Sloan?

Mr. Sloan: Yes, certainly. I do not believe in abstract freedom of the press taken apart from responsibility. Responsibility on the one hand and the right of the citizen to know on the other. There has been a time when freedom of the press was considered simply as the right of people who owned newspapers, or worked for newspapers, to be immune to Government interference. There was a time when I guess this was valid—a couple of centuries ago but today, I think that abstract freedom taken apart from responsibility, taken apart from the right of the citizen to the information that he has to have to be able to pick up or make up his mind about what he is going to do in his own country—I think this is quite a meaningless. Now, that was the point I was making.

The Chairman: Fine, thank you Mr. Sloan. That was an excellent opening statement and with your forbearance I will turn to the Senators and let them ask you questions. Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: First of all, Mr. Sloan, your shorter presentation and your presentation tonight was very good, and I was particularly impressed with your document on the situation in the press in Quebec. I hope there are other Senators here who may be more familiar with the local situation as such; that type of a study would have been valuable to us from all the provinces but it was certainly informative and I wish I was more familiar with the Quebec press.

In your brief as presented tonight on page 3, number 9, I will read it:

The resources of television must be used to permit Canadians to appreciate their own dual heritage. Development of the best methods will take patience, imagination and money, and success is not automatically assured but the effort must be made.

I reread that several times and I wonder if you might elaborate on how this could be accomplished?

Mr. Sloan: That is why I said it's going to take a great deal of imagination and a great deal of patience. Which one were you reading?

Senator Sparrow: Page 3, number 9 is the paragraph.

Mr. Sloan: I have to answer with the statement that it is going to take further study. First of all, it is going to take the will to do it. It is going to take the will to do it on the part of the people who are in charge of the media. Somebody is going to have to say at some time "Well, this is one of our essential priorities. We are going to have to find a way to present the facts of biculturalism and to present—not the facts, I mean something stronger than that—to present the realities of biculturalism." This will be from each group to the other and it is going to take quite a while to do it. For example, I wonder—if I were to ask tonight how many Senators who are not from Quebec or are not from French Canada in general know the names of more than one of the Quebec chansonniers, let us say, folk singers. I am taking a chance here but I have a feeling from having spoken to other groups that there wouldn't be very many.

The Chairman: Well, the only one I would bet on would be Senator McElman. He might know.

Senator McElman: Not really Mr. Chairman. There is only one subject that I am an authority on.

The Chairman: I believe you have proved your point.

Mr. Sloan: Well, I didn't know it.

Senator Macdonald: Well, does that mean anything though?

Mr. Sloan: Well, I think what it means is this—yes, I think it does.

Senator Macdonald: Well, you take for instance—I don't know the name of the English ones.

Mr. Sloan: It may be because we haven't got as many. There are half a dozen anyway, first rate people singing and writing their own songs and singing them in Quebec. The top are Gilles Vigneault, but there are others as well who are household words to most Quebecers and deservedly so. These are not people who are simply there and simply made a name because Quebec happens to be a small community. That, of course, I cannot prove. This is a question of taste but the fact that they have not been presented in any comprehensive way to the rest of Canada even though it is only minorities that are going to listen to them—I grant you that—the same way that it is the minority that listens to, or watches public affairs programming but nevertheless it is a minority that counts and that would be willing perhaps to listen to them—to listen to these people or try to understand what it is—this other culture.

Of course, the same thing goes on the other side.

The Chairman: If I might just interrupt you on this point. Aren't some of these people presented on the CBC on the English network?

Mr. Sloan: I see Pauline Julien doing a few political discussions. I have seen—I wouldn't say very frequently but there is something else here.

The Chairman: I didn't mean to interrupt you.

Mr. Sloan: No, you brought up a good point. There is something else here though and that is that they may be brought up more reasonably and put over more reasonably but there doesn't seem to be any general pattern, there doesn't seem to be any general aim if you like on the part of the media to do this. They might do it and they might say "Oh wouldn't it be a grand idea to have Gilles Vigneault on for half an hour." Yes, it might be but the pattern hasn't been established and this is something I think that has to be established in a country that calls itself or thinks of itself as bicultural. I haven't got an answer for that really—it's just a question.

Senator Prowse: I presume what you are saying is, never mind whether I know who can sing in French or English or anything else, but what you are saying to us I gather is that the average young Canadian today, who is listening to singers and radio performers could probably tell you all of the American bands and things but they haven't got a clue as to any band that came out of Quebec. Is this what you are saying?

Mr. Sloan: Or out of the rest of Canada for that matter. I think this is essentially what I was getting at. Of course, this is a problem because biculturalism obviously has two problems but it is a challenge. I think if young English Canadians got to know some of these people, they would get to like them. I am talking about the entertainers.

Senator Prowse: Well, they got to know the Beatles because they were a success in the United States and not because they were a success in England.

Mr. Sloan: Well, that is a general Canadian hang-up isn't it?

The Chairman: Well, I think that is also incorrect. We got to know the Beatles before they came to the United States, Senator Prowse.

Mr. Sloan: I don't really know.

Senator Prowse: I don't think we really wanted to know them but they did come to us through our American neighbours.

The Chairman: Well, I would say that they were popular here when they were still in Britain.

Senator McElman: What I think should be more worrisome to us in the current context perhaps is that when some of these outstanding young singers and interpreters of the French Canadian culture make their appearance, let us say on some of the variety programmes—The guest appearances—is the bloody damn patronizing air with which they are treated. Now, the people who have them on I am sure have no intention of coming through this way but to a New Brunswicker with some background with the problems similar to those of Quebec, I have on so many occasions been offended, as I am sure the people of Quebec have been offended, by the lead in the variety programme almost saying "Hey look fellows I have a French Canadian on my programme." Does this strike you in this way or am I being overly conscious of this?

Mr. Sloan: Well, I guess it has struck me on occasions but there is something more that has struck me a well. I have seen a couple of so called bilingual programmes and they were billed as bilingual programmes, and they were even broadcast over the English and French networks—I am talking about television programmes—this was perhaps three years ago—where the bilingualism consisted of the lead in the variety programme making a few bad attempts, laughing attempts to speak French, having a couple of signs perhaps in French and maybe one or two songs and simply switching back to English but without any real attempt at what I would call—this wasn't even good mechanical bilingualism. That to me was patronizing as well.

Senator McElman: Well intentioned but dreadfully damaging?

Mr. Sloan: Yes, that's it. I would say so but this is the kind of bilingualism—well, I haven't seen too many of these lately but I haven't seen very much of anything lately. We have a few programmes such as Chansonnettes which is once a week I guess at various off-prime hours, presenting occasional singing groups from the Prairies through to Newfoundland—from BC through to Newfoundland—and has one in English and one in French which is mildly pleasant but it perhaps is the kind of thing that we should be looking at and putting the budget and putting some imagination into it and seeing what else could be done along that line. In its own very limited way—I don't know what it is but I know their budget certainly isn't very much—that I think is presenting something to Canadians. Yet, I don't know how many people watch it.

The Chairman: Why hasn't this been done?

Mr. Sloan: I don't know why it hasn't been done. That would be the question I would hope you would be putting to the people. I am looking here really as a spectator if you like.

The Chairman: Why do you think it hasn't been done? The point I am driving at is surely there is a will to do these things.

Mr. Sloan: Well, there is one thing; perhaps this goes beyond biculturalism and bilingualism. It is the tale of two cities if you like. I have been told—let me put it this way—I have never worked in fulltime television or radio, but I have been informed on a number of occasions that in the publicly owned networks—in the CBC—there is a feeling, or at least there has been in Toronto, that the network shows, all the ones that are worth anything whatsoever, originate in Toronto. Anything that originates anywhere else has either got to be a local show or very occasionally be a low budget show of some other kind and this is, or has been specifically the case between Toronto and Montreal. Now, I admit here immediately that I am going to a certain extent on hearsay evidence. No, I can give you one example. I am in Quebec City, living in Quebec City. The Montreal English language network a few years ago put out a very serious documentary on Maurice Duplessis. This was a documentary, I personally think, that was one that could have been seen or should have been seen at least, or should have been available to people across the country. Not only was it not available to them but it wasn't available to us in Quebec City because in Quebec City the local affiliate of the CBC, which was a private station—I phoned them to find out why it wasn't coming over, and they said "Well, this comes from Montreal. This isn't a CBC programme really and Toronto certainly hasn't asked us to take it, therefore we are not doing it." This is just a very small example if you like, but there are certain problems along this line.

The Chairman: How long ago was that?

Mr. Sloan: Well, this specific instance was—I think it was in 1966.

The Chairman: That recently?

Mr. Sloan: Oh yes. This would be something that I would suggest that the Committee might look into; that is to find out how many public affairs shows produced in Montreal are not presented on the networks of the CBC. I think there are many but I might be wrong.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow, you started this line of questioning. Do you wish to pursue it?

Senator Sparrow: Yes, Mr. Chairman. With regard to your brief again on page 8, number 23, pertaining to subsidies as such, or assistance or aid. If you can give it to communications and transportation and others why not to the media? We have heard, in presentations and briefs, concern about the increase in postal rates for one thing as it affects periodicals and newspapers and magazines, and so on. Should there be a free distribution of newspapers in Canada and periodicals in Canada? Is this what you are getting at in this particular case, and the reason I ask that again is that the CBC is subsidized very heavily and the newspapers, of course have nothing. Again, I am asking this in the context if they wish to remain independent although they are highly critical of the increase in rates.

Mr. Sloan: Well, I really haven't thought of free rates. If they were possible, I certainly wouldn't be opposed to them. I certainly think they should be minimum because as has been so often said in terms of all sorts of communication and transport, the natural lines of communication tend to run north and south even in terms of newspapers as well.

Senator Prowse: Not between Quebec and New York?

Mr. Sloan: Well, not so much in Quebec specifically. There it is simply a question of sheer finance. I mean some newspapers have just gone to the wall, especially weekly newspapers. But I am thinking more generally here that we depend so much upon this line of transport and communication across the country no matter what areas. Whether it is Air Canada or railways or our postal service. I haven't thought about it in terms of it being absolutely free, no, but I certainly think that any attempt to make any system of communications here to pay its own way, I think it's doomed. I think it is bad. I think they have to be subsidized.

Senor MacDonald: May I make a comment on that point. Don't you think if you are correct that instead of a lower postal rate there should be a subsidy?

Mr. Sloan: To whom?

Senator Macdonald: To the people who are—the railroads or the...

Senator Prowse: The carriers?

Senator Macdonald: The carrier or someone. In other words people would know "This is a public service and we are paying so much for it," rather than indirectly for a lower postal rate. For example, the CNR—they come to Parliament each year and we make up the deficit and the people know that we are doing this. Wouldn't that be a better system rather than trying to give them a lower postal rate?

Mr. Sloan: Well, Senator, I think we could also say that a lower postal rate—I am thinking in terms of something just as simple, if you like, as letters. I do mention in here some recent studies in political science and I don't mention the name—but his name is Karl F. Deutsch who is an American political scientist and it is on the basis of his studies that I make the claim, if you like, that it is the cross-flow of communications of all sorts that distinguishes a community, whether it be a national community or a local community. I don't think that anything perhaps in terms of communication should be forced to pay its own way in Canada unless it is making some money some other way.

Senator Macdonald: Well, I am not saying that it should pay its own way...

Mr. Sloan: It should be subsidized.

Senator Macdonald: I would think it would be a better policy to have a direct subsidy rather than an indirect subsidy.

Mr. Sloan: Who would you make it to, if I may ask, in the case of newspapers?

Senator Macdonald: To the publishers.

The Chairman: To the publisher?

Senator Macdonald: Yes, to the people who put them out. Whoever has to pay the shot now.

Mr. Sloan: Well, first of all you wouldn't guarantee anything?

The Chairman: Well, that is the suggestion that Mr. Eric Kierans himself has made, I think in the Senate Committee on the Post Office Bill. Didn't he say if we are going to subsidize an industry, let's make it in the form of a subsidy to the publisher? I am not sure that he was making that as a serious suggestion but he did say it and Senator Macdonald is just saying it again.

Senator Smith: This thing should be worked out some day. It would seem to me that you would immediately get into a situation and there are quite a number of them in this country where the publishers are known from the records even to be doing pretty well. If they are subsidized and their mail rates go down, or their distribution rates are lowered it only adds to their profits. Now, it is all right to follow up and say but the Income Tax Act will take a poke at them but we don't know just how effective that would be.

The Chairman: I take your point but the effect of the postal rates on Le Devoir as indicated by Mr. Ryan last night is simply devastating. I am sure that Senator MacDonald is not even advancing the idea but he was asking you about it.

Mr. Sloan: Well, I am not sure. There would be the problem of control in the sense of how you are going to make sure its subsidy is used in this way. You could do it but then that would lead to more complications and more bureaucracy I am afraid. I have a feeling that a subsidized postal rate as such would be simpler and more efficient.

Now, mind you, this other possibility certainly might be worthy of consideration I don't doubt it but I am just saying that I have a feeling that the other would be simpler.

Senator Hays: Isn't the lack of service more damaging than the cost of postage?

Mr. Sloan: It certainly is.

Senator Hays: You know really the additional cost when you look at a magazine over a year is just a matter of a few bottles of beer, but the lack of service is the damaging one.

Mr. Sloan: I think they both go together. I know in the case of Le Devoir and L'Action in the Province of Quebec—I am not here to speak for L'Action, but I know that a newspaper such as this which has a large postal readership—large mail readership if you like—is automatically going to be hurt very much by the raise because after all the raise is more than just a few percentage points. However, on the question of service I agree. If you mail a paper on Friday and the Friday paper doesn't get to you until Monday or Tuesday or maybe even later sometimes, then of course I fully agree. I think this is another aspect. The reason that the Saturday mail was curtailed was for financial reasons and this simply is another aspect of the whole problem pointing up the fact that we can't afford to do it, not as a country.

Senator Hays: But the direct subsidy as Senator MacDonald suggests to the publisher is much better. I saw some figures, I don't know how accurate these figures are, but back in 1965 we were subsidizing in so far as postage rates were concerned $7,000 for everybody connected with the newspaper business. This was pretty substantial. I think at that time the deficit was something like 50 million dollars. It did increase to 85 million.

Mr. Sloan: Yes, but after all it is helping the people in the newspaper business. What I am thinking of is in terms of the public, the public who in one way or another depend on the information they are getting from newspapers. Even if it was 85 million it would be an average of $4 each presumably for every Canadian. We can say it's worth it or isn't worth it but I am saying that the principle is that communications here have to be subsidized; that is my basic point.

Senator Hays: Supposing you included it in the guaranteed income, would they buy it?

Mr. Sloan: I am sorry, you lost me.

The Chairman: You lost me as well.

Senator Hays: Well, taking Newfoundland the other day we learned that 20% of the householders in St. John's were not receiving a daily newspaper. I don't think it was cost at all. They just weren't interested or they were using some other means.

Mr. Sloan: Well, we can't force people to buy newspapers. Nevertheless, there are a lot of Canadians who do and I think that is the point we have to look at.

The Chairman: Well, how do you relate that to the guaranteed annual income if you don't mind my asking, Senator Hays?

Senator Hays: Well, there are certain people regardless of cost who just don't buy newspapers. They just don't buy magazines because they watch television today. They are not interested in this sort of thing. Most of the people that do I think are quite able and capable of paying providing that the services are good. I think that the service is the most damaging aspect.

Mr. Sloan: Well, even if they would be capable of paying, the problem here for example, would all the readers of Le Devoir be capable of paying the rate—perhaps they would, perhaps they would be capable of paying 25 or 30 cents a day for Le Devoir...

The Chairman: I must say at this point that Mr. Ryan last night gave us or gave the committee a file full of cancellations which I did have a chance to look through last night and I must say in fairness that poor service was the reason advanced by almost all.

Mr. Sloan: Well, I don't think the cost—I don't think the actual price of Le Devoir has gone up a great deal to the people who are receiving it through the mail.

Senator Prowse: Well, you will run into a psychological problem with that interpretation as well because people don't like to say that they can't afford anything.

The Chairman: Well, I think perhaps we have spoken at length about the postal increase. I don't want to terminate questions on it but are there any other questions that you want to get on to? Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: Well, in talking with daily newspapers and so on, and regarding the circulation they have, daily newspapers primarily cover urban areas and the cities as such rather than the small towns and rural areas. In our province in fact—and we didn't get into a discussion on this today—the cost of a daily newspaper in a rural area is either double or very close to double the subscription costs for the person who lives in the city. Now, this has to be a factor of economics in the buying of a newspaper. I subscribe to the Leader Post and it is delivered to me. My subscription cost is $40.00 per year. Now, that is a fairly costly item when you compare it to the daily newspaper that could be delivered in Saskatoon or something like that plus the problems of course of the service that we were referring to. It seems to me that there is an injustice when the person in the rural community must pay a higher cost for his newspaper than the person living in the city when he is just as entitled to a daily newspaper as anyone else is. Would you agree with that?

Mr. Sloan: The point is this. If you are living further away from larger built up areas you are going to be affected. There is no doubt about it. However, I would say—again in principle—that nevertheless there would be a just argument there, yes, for further subsidization of some sort of this sort of communication. If we want to keep people informed as we should and not only by television, it is probably inevitable that it is going to cost a little higher.

The Chairman: May I ask you a question myself. This has to do with national unity. How would you assess the coverage of Quebec and Quebec problems in the press in English Canada and I think an auxiliary question, how would you assess the coverage by the newspapers in Quebec on what is happening in the rest of Canada?

Mr. Sloan: First of all the coverage of the Quebec situation in English Canada is pretty good for one reason and that is—I think it is anyway—that the major papers individually, and I am thinking here of the Toronto and Montreal papers, the big Metropolitan papers have their own correspondents full time. Now, I am thinking in terms of politics but also for example the Globe and Mail have people in Montreal to cover the provincial angle, and the Canadian Press is pretty well served in Quebec—I am thinking here again for example of the Quebec Press Gallery where the Canadian Press has direct services in both English and French and also the chains of newspapers—the big chains are either directly or indirectly represented in that Gallery. So, politically, I think it's pretty good.

The problems sometimes come when you get to editorial comment in certain areas where no matter what their correspondents are writing perhaps it isn't always understood. However, quantitatively and qualitatively from the standpoint from the people who are there I would say it is satisfactory, it is adequate.

Going in the other direction it isn't. There's no French language newspaper in Quebec that has any correspondents except for Ottawa outside of Quebec. Of course, it isn't only English Canada that is boycotted there in a sense. The only correspondents for French language newspapers in Quebec outside of the country are in Paris which is reasonably natural I guess. There are problems of course. Well, a financial problem because the press in Quebec—I don't want to go into the question of finances—the financial question of Le Soleil and the other ones—but it's just say that they are not as well represented as they should be. But the situation is perhaps worse in terms of the Canadian Press service because insofar as I know, and I want to be corrected if this is wrong, I checked it out and I don't think I am, outside of Ottawa there is no direct French language service from any Canadian city with the possible exception of Moncton to the Quebec members of the Canadian Press in Quebec. In other words, everything that comes into Quebec from outside is filtered.

First of all it is seen through English Canadian eyes and it's translated more or less well and presented to the Quebec newspaper reading public. This I think is extremely unfortunate because without saying—and I do not say—that on the average English language reporter is better than the French language reporter, or vice versa, but what I do say, and you see this if you see Canadian Press dispatches written either from Ottawa or from Quebec in both languages, they have a different way of looking at things. They have a different way of interpreting a story and they have a different way of appealing to their own publics and readerships in either case. I think it is very unfortunate—economically it may be inevitable for the time being but it is unfortunate—that there is no regular French language coverage of events in English Canada.

The Chairman: May I take it from your comments then—Mr. Ryan last night for example, differed with you in part. He felt the coverage of Quebec in English Canada—he specifically said that the Toronto papers did a good job and he thought that the rest of the papers did a bad job. I was wondering if you presumably differ with that?

Mr. Sloan: First of all it's only really the Toronto papers that are directly represented. Southams are represented indirectly through a reporter who works for the Gazette and I presume, and I can only presume that his stories are going to the other Southam papers across the country. The Free Press publications are again indirectly represented by the Globe and Mail reporter in Quebec and I presume again that his coverage is going throughout the country to those papers. To the extent that it isn't of course, it is each newspaper's decision to decide what it wants to publish and what it doesn't. When you talk about the Toronto press I think you really in general are talking about at least the major chains. Of course, on behalf of the Thomson papers there is nobody. There is a Thomson newspaper in Quebec City but it has no real representation at the Press Gallery and they take their information from the Canadian Press.

I am not quite certain to what Mr. Ryan was referring. For example, I can give you this, and that is that the Gazette in Quebec has had until recently some difficulties in finding a permanent reporter and during this period I am sure that a number of Canadian newspapers went without. Now that they have somebody I presume again that this coverage will pick up, but essentially I certainly know that the Toronto newspapers are covered and well covered in Quebec.

The Chairman: May I ask you something on what you said earlier, and if I can quote you—you said we see the world through non-Canadian eyes. The Canadian Press has been here this week and I believe they were here yesterday morning and we put that point substantially to them and the answer was that this really doesn't matter because what we receive in terms of CP coverage from outside of the country is accurate, factual, objective and I guess the contention there was that there isn't the distinctly Canadian view of this information. I wonder if you would comment on that?

Mr. Sloan: Well, when we start talking about the accuracy of the wire agencies, yes, I am convinced that neither in UPI or Associated Press, or Agence France Presse is there any willingness or any deliberate idea of distorting the news but nevertheless, and we can see I think in Vietnam in one case, and Algeria in the other, a pretty good example; the way that Agence France Presse treated the Algerian question back in 1958 was quite distinct, to put it mildly, from the way in which the American services treated the Algerian question. One can say exactly the reverse today in the case of the Vietnam question. But more than that, without wanting to mislead, or without distorting the facts—and I am certainly not accusing them of this—nevertheless an Associated Press reporter anywhere in the world when he is sending back his copy to his head office in New York, he is not going to give a damn what the Canadian newspaper reader or the Canadian newspapers, or anybody else might feel about it. He is going to be appealing to the psychology of the readers he knows and of the newspapers he knows.

There may be some places for example, and I am thinking in terms of French Africa, or Commonwealth Africa, where perhaps either people in Quebec in one case, or English speaking people in Canada on the other, might have a specific interest and the Associated Press will not be giving us this. They won't be interested in it and I don't blame them. Of course, we could be getting it from Reuters and from Agence France Presse in one case and the other, I quite agree. But in all of these cases nevertheless we are still seeing it through the eyes of somebody from a different culture, with a different psychology and who is aiming at a different readership. We can call the news accurate and we also don't need to say that everything has to be slanted Canadian—that there has to be a Canadian interest in something—but nevertheless I think somebody who is Canadian or who at least knows the Canadian newspaper media world can, all things being equal, give to Canadians a better picture as to what in effect he is seeing in other sections of the world.

The Chairman: Could you give me an example of what a Canadian interpretation of some international news event might be as opposed to something which is on the wire service at present?

Mr. Sloan: Well,...

The Chairman: Take Vietnam if you wish.

Mr. Sloan: Well, Vietnam is one case; we obviously have both AP and UPI as non-official but nevertheless as representative sources who represent a country which is at war. Well, obviously, they are going to refer to such things as the enemy, the ally and again, without distortion, because in what they have done in the case of the Song My massacre, I am sure they are trying their best to bring out the reality of the war—but nevertheless whether they are pro or con, they are bringing out this reality in a reflection of an American opinion, of an American readership.

This is another example where a Canadian reporter presumably would not be exactly the same bind. On the other hand, we can say that Agence France Presse will be giving an objective report. Well, maybe it will, but on the other hand Agence France Presse has its own historical background in the specific case of Vietnam and it is consciously or unconsciously going to be in one sense or another justifying the French attitude towards this. It may be a 'we told you so' attitude, or it may be anything else and it may lead to extremely objective reports but nevertheless—it could be a series of reports coming from and aimed at another psychology than ours.

I think also, for example, what would have been the situation if the Canadian newspapers had not had representatives in Paris during the last two or three years of the DeGaulle Government? Now, this was a pretty obvious case where Associated Press wasn't really going to be very interested except incidentally and the Agence France Presse was going to be giving us a French view and we had to have our own people there to give us a view as to what they thought was happening in terms of not only French internal politics but of Canadian relations as well.

The Chairman: Let me be the Devil's Advocate. You have made the point that the Canadian papers were there during that period. Would you therefore justify having a Canadian correspondent in other parts of the world?

Mr. Sloan: Everywhere.

The Chairman: Well, where would you have them?

Mr. Sloan: Well,...

The Chairman: Would you have them in Israel?

Mr. Sloan: Yes. I think you have to have them in key points. We obviously are never going to be able to compete with Associated Press in terms of finances even if there were a Government subsidy.

The Chairman: How many key points, a dozen?

Mr. Sloan: Well, a baker's dozen if you like. I wouldn't attempt to name them except to say it's quite obvious—London, Paris, Moscow, Peking, and some place in South America, I don't care where because again South America is another example where there are specific problems and specific relations between the United States and South American countries, and the Associated Press man and the UPI man for example down there are going to be looking at these things on the question as to how certain events are going to affect relationships between the United States and these countries. We are interested in this but that isn't the only thing we are interested in.

At the same time we can't necessarily take it from Reuters or AFP because we are on the same continent as South America—not the same continent, excuse me, but the same hemisphere—and we do perhaps more and more have some sort of feeling that there is something in common between us and that perhaps Canadians should attempt to look at Latin America the same way as they may be looking at us.

Senator Smith: Mr. Sloan, just to clarify one point. Are you pretty well satisfied with the way CBC news is handled by the appointment of their people to Moscow, Paris, London, and they send them down into Israel and over on the Arab side, and around the world?

Mr. Sloan: I think it is pretty good.

Senator Smith: You think it is pretty good?

Mr. Sloan: Yes, I think it is pretty good. Of course, it is being done by subsidy. It is being done with the public money but I think this is something the public money should do.

Senator Smith: By the way, if I might also comment on this. It's one of the things that I hear quite often and quite generally. Why does the CBC have to spend all this money to cover subjects on which there are others there anyway and they could always buy it from Associated Press and we can't seem to see the need for viewing it through Canadian eyes. I think this point is a very important one. I am glad that you have suggested that.

Senator Hays: I was wondering if there has ever been an exchange of reporters. For example, we have New Zealand reporters here and we have Australian reporters, an exchange of reporters insofar as certain newspapers are concerned, where a reporter works 90 per cent on the news staff of Auckland and 10 per cent of his material goes to Canada and 10 per cent of the Canadian content goes to New Zealand. Has there ever been any of this?

Mr. Sloan: There has been a little bit of this, I think, let's say between some papers in Canada and perhaps Britain and there is some between Quebec right now and France. There is a group in Quebec, a Government sponsored group called L'Office Franco-Quebecois which is receiving and sending both reporters to France and from France. This is on a relatively small scale but it is being done. In the other Commonwealth countries, to the best of my knowledge, I have never heard of it. I believe we have imported quite a few and very good Australian newspaper men over here but I don't know whether we send any.

Senator Hays: Is there a possibility of being able to do this? This would eliminate the costs that you speak of. We would be more familiar with the Australian situation and they would be much more familiar with the Canadian situation.

Mr. Sloan: Yes, I think that would be an excellent idea.

Senator Hays: Let's say Australia or New Zealand or Africa or any of these countries. To take Vietnam for instance, you get an entirely different viewpoint of the war in Australia and New Zealand and you wouldn't think it was the same war as you do from the United States or from Canadian news reports, and in countries in Africa.

Mr. Sloan: Yes, I think this is a good idea. It certainly bears looking into. The cost problem would be there but let's face it, we are an expensive country. This would be something that I would think would be a very good idea.

Senator Hays: I was just wondering whether this has ever been explored?

Mr. Sloan: To my knowledge no, but I think that maybe the publishers could tell you better than I.

Senator Prowse: I am basically interested in the suggestion we had a few moments ago that it might be helpful if it were possible for papers to be carried by the post office or express or something without cost, and somebody mentioned a figure. How much do we pay a year—do you have the figure—I just can't recall it—for the CBC?

Mr. Sloan: No, I don't have the figure on that.

The Chairman: No, we have that figure on file. But we do have it here?

Senator Prowse: But it certainly is more than we have been subsidizing newspapers?

Mr. Sloan: Oh yes.

Senator Prowse: By a long shot.

Mr. Sloan: I should think so.

Senator Prowse: You are interested in...

Mr. Borden Spears: One hundred and seventy five million.

The Chairman: One hundred and seventy five million?

Mr. Spears: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Is that the deficit?

Senator Hays: No, the subsidies.

The Chairman: That is how much it costs.

Senator Prowse: We are paying 175 million to subsidize radio and television and chiefly television, and we are going to make newspapers pay their way. This is what it looks like, but let's take something else. My understanding is that originally when Canadian Press was first set up there was a subsidy provided to them and then they finally gave it up because they felt that it might influence their objectivity if I might use the term. Is that correct?

Mr. Sloan: Well, for a brief period there was a demand for a subsidy, there was a subsidy I think around 1918 or 1919.

Senator Prowse: Well, whatever it was.

Mr. Sloan: During the First World War.

Senator Prowse: It was for the cost of carrying the service?

Mr. Sloan: Yes.

Senator Prowse: But it was the press themselves that gave up that particular subsidy because it was in a direct form. Now, if it is decided that it is in the interest of Canadians that there should be the widest possible dissemination and information, or access to expressions of opinion, wouldn't it be better to provide it in the form of, let's say, free transportation for the sake of illustration to which anybody could have access and the market would take care of the rest...

Mr. Sloan: Such as the telegraph companies for example?

Senator Prowse: No, what I have in mind is a subsidy to the post office. For example we do it with weeklies now. We have a 40 mile free area or something of this nature. For example we just say all right, one of the things the post office is going to do is carry any kind of a daily, or any kind of a weekly to anywhere it has to go in Canada—now, aside from the fact that there would be some problems would this serve a useful purpose as far as the exchange of information or communication between various parts of the country?

Mr. Sloan: Yes, I think it would. I don't know how much it would cost but...

The Chairman: Well, may I ask Senator Prowse and Mr. Tom Sloan—surely you would both agree that there are a great many newspapers in this country that are making a great deal of money and would you make that offer, or that kind of an offer available to them?

Senator Prowse: I was going to come to that. As a person who is interested in a newspaper school or a school for the training of journalists, would you agree that generally today the wages available to writers in the newspaper business are probably the lowest of any graduate of any professional school?

Mr. Sloan: Well, first of all just one very small correction. Our school is not trying to train journalists.

Senator Prowse: You are providing a facility?

Mr. Sloan: Yes. It varies so tremendously. The wages for example—the difference in wages when I went into the newspaper business and what they are now, I guess they might not have tripled but they have certainly increased dramatically. There was a time when what you say was absolutely true.

Senator Prowse: I started at $50 a month in the newspaper business.

Mr. Sloan: May I ask where?

Senator Prowse: Yes. In Edmonton in 1934.

Mr. Sloan: Well, by 1949 in Hamilton it had gone up to $25 a week.

Senator Prowse: Well, that is not very dramatic either?

Mr. Sloan: No, but that was 1949, and I am old that in Quebec, and I was checking some figures and the Quebec Federation of Journalists estimates that in the last five years the average wage has doubled in Quebec. Now, when you talk about the average wage, you have to watch out because you can go up for some stars to $18,000, and you can go down to some small town dailies—I am not even speaking of the weeklies here—dailies, I rather the minimum right now is around $4,000.

Senator Prowse: Well, we had a Guild figure the other day of $75.40 a week as a starting wage in one contract.

Mr. Sloan: Would this be in Toronto?

Senator Prowse: No.

Mr. Sloan: Would it be after one year experience or two years of experience?

Senator Prowse: No experience.

Mr. Sloan: In Toronto and Montreal generally speaking they have the one year wage and the two and the three and the four and they have a five year minimum contract and most people who are working for a newspaper in Toronto have the equivalent of five years.

Senator Prowse: Do you know what teachers start at?

Mr. Sloan: Well, it depends where.

Senator Prowse: Well, in Ontario?

Mr. Sloan: What, grade schoolteachers?

Senator Prowse: Yes. A person that is able to go out and teach.

Mr. Sloan: No.

Senator Prowse: It would be a little more than that I think.

Mr. Sloan: Perhaps in some rural areas. I really don't know though but as far as salary goes it has improved.

Senator Prowse: Well, the point I am making is this. Would we be better served in your opinion in the type of communications we get if wages in the communications business were considerably better than they are today?

Mr. Sloan: I think not only in communications but just about any business perhaps.

Senator Prowse: It is an economic law?

Mr. Sloan: Yes. The thing is you have to remember that when you are starting off in a small newspaper, or in a chain newspaper, very often the person who is starting has no experience whether he is or is not a university graduate. He may have to do such a simple thing as learning how to type after he gets there, or he may never learn to type, but at least he will have to learn to do some of the fairly simple things that a newspaperman does. Very often after he has had a year or two's experience, at low wages admittedly, then he has a chance to move up and to improve considerably. One has to admit that there are some small newspapers who simply, I presume, can't afford to pay any more.

With weekly newspapers in Quebec the wages are pretty ridiculously low in a sense, but they are not ridiculously so from the standpoint of the publisher of the weekly newspaper. This is where people without training go to learn the craft and certainly an improvement has to go on, but to say that it is going to improve very drastically in relation to other trades or professions in the next five years I can't honestly predict.

Senator Prowse: Can you tell me what the school you are the head of does attempt to do in training people?

Mr. Sloan: It attempts to—by the way, there are available if you don't mind my mentioning it, some of our new calendars that you may wish to look at. It does attempt to initiate people to the problems of journalism, into the challenges they are going to face, into what a newspaper is doing and how it is doing it, and to what the wire services are, and it is doing this. I must stress one thing. On the basis—let's say we have 36 courses or 30 courses; 12 of these, approximately two-fifths, will be in journalism and information, and the rest will be in other faculties entirely. Our students go wherever they want pretty well in the university and take whatever courses they want. They choose their own specialization. We don't choose it for them. Each student might have a different course from the next student. There are some, of course, that are more popular than others.

First of all we do not try to teach them how to write leads and we don't try to teach them how to write news stories because we feel that if we teach them this they might have to be untaught as I mentioned earlier, and secondly they are going to learn in one or two months on the job what we would try and teach them perhaps in eight or nine months. We feel that we can be spending our time better.

Senator Prowse: In other words, what you are doing is trying to give a basic standing and the basic equipment to the insatiable curiosity of the individual?

Mr. Sloan: Yes. In a sense we are trying to do what political science does. Political science doesn't turn out politicians but it turns out some journalists. We don't turn out journalists but we turn out some who might become journalists and others will be looking at them.

Senator McElman: Last evening I started to develop a dialogue if you will with Mr. Ryan and I was awfully sorry that the time ran out so that I couldn't pursue it. It has to do, Mr. Sloan, with the situation of the Acadian people in New Brunswick. As I recall you are quite familiar with New Brunswick having spent a fair deal of time down there?

Mr. Sloan: Yes.

Senator McElman: Through a very difficult period; and I might say you did an excellent job of interpreting what was going on to the people of Quebec and elsewhere. The population of New Brunswick is not as concentrated in one specific area as it once was but it is still largely on the northeast shore of the Madawaska and across the top of the province down to the Moncton environment, but it is moving out into the total community.

L'Évangeline with its financial history isn't a heck of a lot better today in spite of the subsidization it's received from the late General and I believe currently some assistance from the Federal authorities. It is still in desperate straits and it is not really serving the French speaking people at large in the province. Circulation certainly isn't sufficient...

Mr. Sloan: About 2,000 isn't it?

Senator McElman: Yes, and you are talking about 250,000 people which we would assume would be about 50,000 households on the average.

I asked Mr. Ryan if perhaps in this special circumstance—what I was trying to do really was to hold up to him a mirror of not the complaints but the relation of the situation of Quebec apropos of the rest of Canada, but to a lesser extent the same situation perhaps in New Brunswick and the responsibility of the media in Quebec to the people of New Brunswick of Acadian descent. The Acadians, relative to the population and the rest of Canada, are very small but relative to the population of New Brunswick very large and a very important segment of the second culture, and I asked him if he didn't feel that there was a distinct and heavy responsibility with the French language press to not only interpret to the French speaking people in Canada at large the problems of their French speaking brethren in New Brunswick but as well to make some strenuous attempts to interpret to the Acadians of New Brunswick the problems of the people in Quebec. Believe me, in the Province of New Brunswick there is a great misunderstanding of what the problems of Quebec are, and what the French speaking people face in the Province of Quebec within Canada; there is a very grave misunderstanding. The intellectual elite if you will, or whatever terminology you use, do understand it but L'Évangeline editorially and otherwise has not sufficient strength to carry this message from the elite to the masses of the Canadian people. They are getting their news of whatever calibre you might regard it from a very closely held, closely managed English speaking press and the viewpoint of that—and I don't think I am simply expressing my own view here—the viewpoint expressed there in these matters if expressed at all is a very very narrow one.

Mr. Sloan: I don't think Mr. Ryan would have disagreed with you.

Senator McElman: No, but I wasn't able to follow it through to the full extent as I would have liked to have done. As a matter of fact I would love to have an evening with him to discuss this further. I think this would take a full evening to really probe the depths of it. Do you feel there is a great responsibility here? Do you feel it's something that is being overlooked by the people of Quebec?

Mr. Sloan: I think you know the Acadian problem much much better than I do but there is one danger that I could see, if what I understand is correct, and that is that this might not be appreciated too much by the Acadian people themselves. In other words there is, in spite of the common language, there are nevertheless what the Acadians consider are cultural differences between what they call French Canadian and Acadians. There already have been campaigns carried on in Quebec and as far as I know the Quebec Government has done something directly or indirectly through the Cultural Affairs Department to help L'Evangeline and Le Devoir has carried out campaigns in the past few years as well. These are subscription campaigns for L'Evangeline and if Le Devoir or if Quebec media as such tried to push too much the Quebec view in Acadia it might not be welcome. I am asking you as much as saying it. I don't know. I have a feeling it wouldn't be welcome.

Senator McElman: You are quite right in one sense. Mr. Ryan suggested last evening that the only salvation here was not for just a strong L'Evangeline but strong leaders from the Acadian people themselves who would through L'Evangeline develop additional leadership and additional strength in their communities quite aside from the Quebec viewpoint, but I think you missed my point. One of the other angles of it is that the Acadians do believe they are different from Quebecois except in Madawaska county in the Republic where they are Quebecois but in the rest of the province they are Acadian.

Mr. Sloan: Yes.

Senator McElman: So there is this difference and perhaps because of it or in spite of it, I don't know why, but there is a devilish misunderstanding with I think the great majority of the Acadians of just what the legitimate ambitions of the people of Quebec are. I think perhaps the misunderstanding is almost as great, or greater—no, I shouldn't say than the Canadians of the Prairies—but pretty close.

Mr. Sloan: It is a problem.

Senator McElman: It is a devilish problem. It is one that is bothering the people of New Brunswick very very much and we hear very little about it. Like yourself, I believe in exposing things and having a dialogue and getting to the roots in order to find solutions. It's a festering sore. It is a piece of dynamite with the fuse lit.

Mr. Sloan: Perhaps it could be worked the other way as well. That is that Quebecers and the French language press in Quebec might be more interested in what is happening to the Acadians. We talk of two solitudes between English and French but in a sense perhaps there is another two solitudes as well. A good many people in Quebec Province, and certainly the Quebec nationalists don't really care about the Acadians as they think the Acadians are doomed anyway. There has been some work done by some newspapers; La Presse for example a few years ago carried out quite a lengthy evaluation of what was happening in northern New Brunswick to the Acadians but there hasn't really been a great deal done. Quebec is concerned so much about themselves now and as I say they tend to ignore the Acadians and the Acadians naturally think their own problems are completely different and I agree with you that this should be explored. I don't know how it can be done and the only thing I can see is that L'Evangeline somehow or other has to be kept, has to be maintained independently even though it does receive subsidies. It still has to be an independent voice for the Acadians. Le Devoir could never go down there, or any other paper, and preach to the Acadians.

The Chairman: I think, Mr. Sloan, we won't carry on too much longer but with your forbearance I believe there are a few more questions.

Mr. Sloan: Of course.

The Chairman: I say with your forbearance but I will say also with the forbearance of my colleagues. They have been sitting here since 10 o'clock this morning.

Senator McElman: You will recall Mr. Sloan, during the period you were in New Brunswick there had been undertaken—let's forget all political considerations here which is difficult for me to do—I think what could be fairly described as one of the most extensive reform programmes that has been seen in any part of the nation at a provincial level which restructured the whole of Government at the provincial and municipal levels. The design of this, of course, was to attempt, ill-advised or otherwise, to ensure that every citizen no matter where he might live had the same basic level of services, educational—and I stress educational, health, welfare and justice.

Now, you have to have some appreciation of the history of New Brunswick up to that point, where not by design but by lack of attention one very large part of the province had less than a reasonable standard of services particularly again in education, which has resulted in the Acadian people generally not being able to bring their economic standards up because of lack of better standards.

In the course of this programme there was one specific part of it which upset some very influential people and the media of New Brunswick with the exception of L'Évangéline (it got rather uptight on occasion as well, if you will recall) but with the exception of that went almost wholesale against this programme and it gave rise...

The Chairman: Senator McElman, I have been asked by some of the people at the back if you will please speak up.

Senator McElman: It gave rise to old feelings that many of us were thinking with delight and complacency had been buried and we found out they were still smouldering in both ethnic groups and these by the vehemence and at times viciousness of the press were blown back into bonfires.

Now, all this brings me to one point alone which comes back to my earlier question. There did develop a very strong feeling not solely with the Acadian people of New Brunswick but with many people who have tried desperately hard to get to the bottom of these problems and find solutions; there arose a very strong feeling that the press of Quebec were almost traitors in that—not that they didn't intervene but at least that they didn't try to tell the people of Quebec what was happening in New Brunswick. This brings me back of course to my initial question to you. Is there a responsibility?

Mr. Sloan: Well, personally, as a Canadian I would say yes. Without trying to defend any—are you talking specifically about the French press in Quebec?

Senator McElman: Yes.

Mr. Sloan: I don't know what else was happening in those days. I can't remember what was happening in Quebec in those days but it was undoubtedly part of the same pre-occupation or same general pre-occupation. Unfortunately, a large proportion of Quebecers and presumably a large portion of the Quebec press just didn't feel it was important. I think they were wrong but I don't remember. It seems to me, however, one newspaper at least did send someone down and someone did do a series on that particular problem. I think it was from La Presse.

Senator McElman: Yes, that's right.

Mr. Sloan: It was probably the only newspaper that had money to do it. It certainly was unfortunate and the role played by several of the media in New Brunswick I feel was rather unfortunate. I can say this, that you do have to distinguish here again between what you might call the working reporter and the person who makes the editorial policy. I knew a great number of the working reporters in New Brunswick and I found their attitude fair, their own personal attitudes, and at least some of these stories I saw as news stories seemed again to be stories that were basically honest and basically fair.

However, when you get to the editorial page, of course, it is a completely different question and I can't honestly say to what extent or if at all their stories when they reached the newspapers had been altered. I don't know.

Senator McElman: Many complained that they were.

Mr. Sloan: Well, they would be in a position to know.

Senator McElman: Well, like yourself I have great respect for the working press there. Let me be clear. We are not talking about an election.

Mr. Sloan: No, no, I remember the period very well.

The Chairman: I would like to ask you one or two questions in closing. I would like to have your views on the underground press in Canada. Why we have one, and what is its future?

Mr. Sloan: I am not an expert in this field I am afraid.

The Chairman: Well, we would be interested in your views even though you are not an expert.

Mr. Sloan: In Quebec City we don't have one. We don't have one at least as far as I know.

The Chairman: Do you see the underground papers at all?

Mr. Sloan: Very very occasionally. I have seen them more in the United States more than I have seen them here.

The Chairman: Would you rather not comment on that?

Mr. Sloan: Well, I could comment in a couple of sentences really by saying that the underground press, first of all because of the structures of the overground press if you like, I think they are saying that the regular press is not saying it like it is and that the regular press does not represent them. I don't know whether they have ever used the phrase "Never trust an editor" but I suspect some of them have thought this. They think that they are telling it like it is for their own generation and this is the impression that I would have certainly from having a look at it. As I say I have seen it more in the United States than I have in Canada.

The Chairman: What will happen to the underground press? Will it disappear or will it grow?

Mr. Sloan: Well, I think what will happen to the underground press depends on what happens to its clientele, which is to say the students and the younger people who are reading it. What is going to happen for the next generation of youth?

The Chairman: Well, where are the next generation of students? You mean the high school kids?

Mr. Sloan: Yes—well, I would think that the high school students already are reading the underground press.

The Chairman: Well, there are underground papers already designed specifically for high school students but you mean younger still?

Mr. Sloan: Yes. We have seen two or three different generations of students in the United States and in Canada who are having completely different problems and different ways of looking at life and the latest group has read the latest underground press. Unfortunately here I haven't studied the underground press very much. This is just a feeling I have.

The Chairman: Have you read Professor Merrill's book on the elite press?

Mr. Sloan: No.

The Chairman: Then, I won't ask you the question I was going to ask you.

Mr. Sloan: I would like to see the book.

Senator Smith: May I ask him a question, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: Senator Smith?

Senator Smith: Let me ask Mr. Sloan if he has read Donald Gordon's article which appeared in the Financial Post a month or so ago on the future of the communications world?

Mr. Sloan: No, I am sorry I haven't. I haven't read Mr. Gordon's article. You are giving me another reference.

Senator Smith: Yes, it is a good reference.

Mr. Sloan: What date was it?

Senator Smith: September the 27th or along in that area. I happened to get a copy of this from the library as I was interested in the subject.

Senator Sparrow: Mr. Sloan, Senator McElman referred to it but in reference to Western Canada and the statement I think was true, he didn't elaborate on it, but people in Western Canada, and I think it's true in every part of Canada, certainly don't get the information that they should of the other regions of Canada, particularly the Maritime Provinces as such, and Quebec basically. We don't seem to get it through radio or television either as such, or as much as we should in order to understand the basic problems, and for in-depth reporting I feel that newspapers probably are the best media.

We have a national transportation system, CNR, Air Canada, a national radio and a national TV. Is there an area open for a national newspaper?

Mr. Sloan: There is a technical problem there and that is in a place like Canada which is not like England...

Senator Sparrow: As an example...

Mr. Sloan: You mean on wire service.

Senator Sparrow: Yes, with wire photos. You could have publication in each province simultaneously daily with the wire service. When the wire services come from each province, as an example, a page or two or whatever it was from each province of news and a national portion, and an international portion, and provincial, and it could be done by teletype I would think rather inexpensively or expensively of course...

Mr. Sloan: I think really, what you are suggesting is essentially a national newspaper which would be basically a series of Canadian Press dispatches from the different regions. My worry here would be, without putting blame on the Canadian Press, but it might turn out to be rather dull. It might turn out to be rather dull because of the type of news it would be printing. In other words I think an authentic newspaper has to reflect some sort of milieu. It doesn't have to reflect it right to the bitter end; it doesn't have to pander to its prejudices but it nevertheless has to have some background, some place where it's getting not only its ideas but its feelings. I think that sort of a paper would depend upon whether we could really get some sort of a national Canadian non abstract feeling, some sort of a real Canadian sentiment and in terms of our geography I just don't know. By our very nature we are a pluralist country. We could have not only biculturalism but pluralism in every sense. Each region has its own interests and its own character and I don't think we would be much without this. We could always have some sort of a publication which would bring together the facts and figures of what is happening in the various regions of the country. It won't replace the newspaper I don't think.

Senator Sparrow: I am thinking of a study being done in a province or a region that would be for the consumption of that province. It would reflect the provincial thinking of that area or the regional thinking. We would in turn get exactly that same thing in another province where now we are not getting that. We will get in press coverages for example, the Canadian Press, a Committee may bring out a very important point but because a particular person on the Committee may be from the Maritime Provinces what is reported in the Maritime press would be what that particular person said from the Maritimes which doesn't really reflect perhaps what the Committee decided that day. This is what we are faced with continually and particularly in our region where we are not getting the sense and the feeling of the Quebec problem as an example, or the problems in the Maritimes, or the wheat problem and the poverty problems in the west, or in other areas because of this factor.

Mr. Sloan: I don't think this would be impossible but I believe it would have to be subsidized. I don't think that you are going to have enough people buying it on a mass basis to be able to make it profitable. Let us put it this way. I think it might be an excellent idea but I think you would have to realize that the cost would have to be paid. This would sort of be like the CBC in print in a sense. You would have sort of national broadcast, or national stories, then you would have local stories, but with the emphasis coming from where? You know, it is an interesting idea but the practicality of it or the financial practicality of it, certainly in terms of private media I can't see it.

Senator Prowse: In the long run isn't it true that what appears in the press or radio or TV has to be related to the interests of the receivers?

Mr. Sloan: Yes, this is quite true. This is quite true if it is going to succeed.

Senator Prowse: Whether you like it or not this is what we are faced with.

Mr. Sloan: Yes. Of course, there is another thing that is that the newspapers or all the media are in themselves a form of adult education and this could be regressive too. They can destroy peoples' tastes and help to destroy peoples' intelligence by not allowing them to use it and they can also stretch it a little bit.

Senator Prowse: They can lead a little bit or they can follow?

Mr. Sloan: Yes. The more they lead—they can't lead too far and they can't go too far away because then they won't have any influence but they can at least keep pushing and this idea of being a national newspaper or not—I believe all newspapers have this responsibility. A good many of them don't live up to it as far as I am concerned. They pander to the prejudices.

Senator Prowse: Of the local reader?

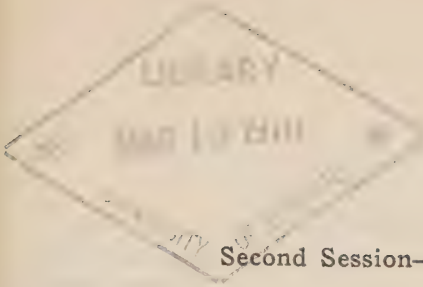

Mr. Sloan: Yes.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, I think this might be a point at which we could conclude this session unless there are any other compelling questions which must be asked.

Before we adjourn, Senators, I think on all of our behalf I would thank Professor Sloan for coming to the Committee. We have found the session as interesting as the documentation you sent along earlier which some of us have studied and which all of us will be studying and it is certainly going to help to make our hearings more meaningful. We are grateful to you and particularly so because we know you are very busy and it is perhaps an imposition to be here this evening. So on behalf of the Senators and myself thank you very much.

The committee adjourned.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Friday, December 12, 1969

The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 10 a.m.

Senator Keith Davey (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, this morning we are delighted to welcome as our witness a distinguished Canadian, Mr. John W. Holmes, who is the Director General of the Canadian Institute of International Affairs.

I think, Mr. Holmes, you might proceed as follows: If you care to make any kind of an introductory statement, do so. Then the Senators, with your permission, would like to question you on things that you say and, indeed, they may ask about things which you have not said.

We are delighted to welcome you here. We are particularly grateful you were able to find time to be here.

Mr. John W. Holmes, Director General, Canadian Institute of International Affairs: Thank you. Thank you very much. I am honoured to be asked to speak here. I, perhaps, should explain that I am speaking entirely for myself. I am the Director of an organization which is not allowed to have any opinions of its own whatsoever. Therefore, anything I say is my own.

I might also add it is not an agency of the Government and receives no funds from the Government. It is a private organization so I am under no particular pressure from any direction.

I have two special interests. One interest, of course, is in the creation of a better informed Canadian public in the field of international affairs, I suppose in a kind of blind faith that foreign policy is more likely to be intelligent and sensible if it is formed in a climate of understanding, rather than a climate of ignorance.

I would also like to speak on a second level. I think it is a major one. I would like to bring a particular concern to what is my interest in professionalism in the field of international relations for educators, leaders of opinion, research workers, academics, people of that kind, Senators, members of what sociologists call elite groups.

These are the people who are particularly interested in the press and mass media generally, for the information which is essential for those who are making a careful study of international affairs and, in particular, Canadian foreign policy.

The principal message I have, I suppose, is one which you foresee. Perhaps it is so important that someone might register this as simply a plea for more and better information on international affairs in the Canadian mass media—with heavy emphasis on better rather than more.

Now, having said that, I would like to say that I speak as someone who has lived and visited abroad a good deal, as well as in Canada. I think the general record of the Canadian press—I am using Canadian press in the lower case here—is good.

One is exceedingly critical of the press. I spend a lot of time in faculty clubs. I hear the press constantly criticized and talked about. I think one simply has to live for a little while or stay a little while in a city like Chicago or San Francisco to appreciate the quality of the coverage of international affairs in Canadian papers.

I spent a good deal of time in Geneva. Even in highly civilized international centers like that, you would be lost if you did not depend on the foreign press for the coverage of international news or, at least, the press of another language in Switzerland, itself.

I suppose what we do lack here, and the reason that comparisons that are made with foreign papers sometimes seem unfavorable, is there is a great tendency, of course, to contrast a small Canadian paper with the London Times.

I am talking about the general coverage in Canada. Perhaps what we do lack here is one "national" newspaper, if I can use that term very much in quotation marks—a London Times, New York Times, or more particularly, a superb newspaper like Le Monde of Paris, or even some of the papers of this kind which exist in smaller countries and some Latin American countries. There are some notable examples of first class national newspapers.

However, having said that, I really do think that most of our papers in Canada are good; I would rank at least a dozen Canadian papers ahead of the second newspaper in most of the world capitals. This is very subjective. They may not quite reach the standards of these single great international newspapers.

What is more, I think that so often in London, for example, by the great tradition of the British Press—if you except one or perhaps two newspapers—most of the rest, I would say, are positively bad in a way that Canadian newspapers are not because of the deliberate distortion, although they sometimes do conduct unnecessary crusades.

Now, I am saying this really for purposes of contrast. I think our Canadian newspapers, in the international field, are much less likely to do harm. They are better balanced and they have these virtues. One point I would like to make is that I think the virtues which we have—and these should not be underestimated; they are extremely important—are rather negative virtues. They are somewhat second-hand virtues. This is the point I would like to mention.

Now, I am afraid I must talk mostly about the press, and here I confess a weakness. I am still stuck in the Gutenberg syndrome. I am afraid I agree very strongly with what Walter Lippmann says in the notes which were provided here, the question with which I am sure you are familiar. "Television is adding to the irrationality of the world. It makes everything simpler or more dramatic or more immediate than it is. If you listen to television you cannot find out what is going on in the world. News on TV is very good; but you can't live on what they give you. So newspapers are here to stay."

They may not, as Marshal McLuhan thinks, be here to stay, but I think it is a pity if they are not. I am not a great watcher of television. I am afraid I am driven away by advertising and instant replays and other irritations.

Also I must say that I do not find very much on the Canadian television in my particular field and this, I think, is rather a pity.

Let me, however, say a word for the news of Canadian television, which certainly compares very, very favorably with the news one finds in the other television systems—British, French, Swiss. It is very good and I say that for a particular reason, because it is a plea to the CBC and CTV and other media of this kind to be true to themselves and not allow themselves to be distorted from the particular thing they do, which is to present the news as effectively but unsensationally as possible in the international field.

CBC radio seems rather anxious by the use of electronic noises to try to persuade us before we start that it is a third class program. In fact, as you listen to it, you find it is a first class news program. I will make that slight concession to them.

Television is here to stay. I am not talking like an old dodo. It is very important that we can compliment them on some of what has been done, but there is not nearly as much as there was in the past.

Where is the discussion program on international affairs that one used to have on Canadian television? There are some very good programs, the Thursday night programs, which have been introduced. These are more in the way of teaching than listening. I think there is something to be said for having different voices appear on television.

Also the tendency of television is to concentrate on the fashionable issues, particularly issues which are not related to Canadian needs. I am pleading for domestic rather than international coverage, but I think we could do with a little less coverage of our neighbour's domestic problems.

Now, I did raise the question or mention the fact that in Canada, there is lacking what one can call a national newspaper. That is a very debatable term, a national newspaper.

I would like to raise the question as to whether we should have such a national newspaper or probably in Canada, two such papers—one in English and one in French. It would be very nice to think of a bilingual national newspaper.

These, of course, are normally papers of small circulation and considerable influence and they are very expensive to run.

For my second purpose, the purpose of libraries, researchers, people who try to put together the news for home use, a paper like the New York Times is indispensable. It would be of enormous help to have something of this kind where you have complete coverage of, particularly, Canadian foreign policy.

That is a special interest, which I think needs to be stated. I am not at all sure that we want to create in Canada—not that one can create a New York Times, which I think is a highly over-rated newspaper, too powerful and also one of the duller newspapers in the world.

If one wants a model, I suggest again you go to Paris and look at Le Monde. You might want to ask Monsieur Beuve-Méry how he manages to run the world's best newspaper with so little advertising.

There is a real problem in Canada for people in following foreign affairs, international news, when one moves away from the major metropolis. You feel it is not easy to keep in touch with the world if you live very far away from the major centres. I am not going to name which ones.

One newspaper which I have been following with some interest—I have not had a recent report on it; but it might be looked at—is the Canberra Times. This was an attempt in Australia to create a national newspaper of small circulation which it was realized would not pay for itself very well.

It raises the question as to whether it might be possible for an organization like the Canadian Press, by pooling its resources in some way, to create some kind of national newspaper for the benefit particularly of scholars and specialists.

Such a paper would serve a very considerable use, I think, abroad. As you know, when you travel abroad it is one of the hardest things in the world to find out what is going on in Canada and particularly, of course, what Canadian attitudes are and what Canadian foreign policy is.

I think I should make it very clear that I am not putting that forward as a formal suggestion. I think it is just the kind of thing one might think about. We see all sorts of difficulties and the costs would be considerable. All I can say is if somebody could find some way of doing something like that, it would serve certain needs.

I realize also a newspaper is a sort of thing which one does not often deliberately create. It grows usually from small roots by sheer quality into having just pretensions to being a national newspaper.

Anything that could be done to assist, and I will not be too specific as you can imagine what kind of things one might have in mind, the distribution across the country of some of the major metropolitan newspapers—not so they would really compete with local newspapers, but so they would be available for the small group of people and libraries and others who want to follow what is going on in the world.

One thing that has been lacking in Canada, for example, which is important, is that it is very hard to find the texts of statements as one gets in papers like the New York Times or London Times. I know this is exceedingly expensive and crowds other things off the pages. I do not want to argue that we should crowd Mrs. Thompson off the pages of the papers. I like Mrs. Thompson. She serves a purpose.

At any rate, if it is possible, may we have more texts, not only of what our own people say, but even what other people say. I used to find that when I got Le Monde or called the local French Consulate and found out what General DeGaulle actually said, it differed considerably from what he seemed to have said as interpreted and distorted by a pretty hostile group of reporters in Paris.

May I just say a word here about the Canadian Press—now I am talking about the Canadian Press in capitals—also in the international field.

I think as far as the Canadian Press is concerned, one feels rather as one does with the United Nations. The first question you have to say to yourself is what you would do without it. I think we would be in a very bad way without the Canadian Press. I think it does its own thing exceedingly well.

It is not sensational, but it is reliable. I was very reassured to hear spokesmen for the Canadian Press before the Committee the other day say they were going to stick to their own thing. To have this kind of generally pretty reliable reporting of what is going on abroad is very reassuring and I think it compares more than favorably with some of the larger agencies, like Reuters, for example.

I hope it will stick to the factual report, rather than the interpretative story of the commentator. This is the criticism of the Canadian Press. It should be supplemented by interpretative articles by other Canadian correspondents, of which I will have a word later.

I think the only complaint against the Canadian Press in the international field is there is not enough of it. I know this costs money. More correspondents placed in more places would help a good deal.

This brings us to some consideration of foreign content in Canadian newspapers. Now, first of all, there is the question that so much of our reporting on foreign affairs comes from foreign sources, written by foreign correspondents and so many of the columnists in the field are foreigners.

First of all, as in all these cases, there are virtues as well as defects in the system. The virtues of this are considerable. Our newspapers, by carrying the reports of some of the world's best newspapers, do, in fact, bring to us high class reporting.

The perspective of the New York Times or Washington Post or the Observer, and other foreign bodies of this kind, is very valuable. I certainly would not want to be without them. I think, although you do not get as extensive daily coverage in our papers as you do in some of the large foreign papers, if one reads a newspaper consistently, it is my impression—the ones I read—that they do tend to keep you posted.

It is my impression of the papers I read that you will have an article on the Middle East, not every day, but at least one which keeps you posted on what is going on if you read it consistently. Frequently, of course, they are drawn from foreign sources.

Incidentally, although I am arguing for more international coverage, I would like to make a plea for less in some respects. It is a paradoxical argument. I think some subjects are over-covered. There is a great deal to be said particularly for our use of the thoughtful article, frequently taken from a paper like the Observer, which pulls together the threads of a situation.

Frankly I do not read the long, daily reports of the fighting in Vietnam, not because I do not think Vietnam is important, but because they are exactly the same every day—or one reads them the way I recall we read Pravda in Moscow, just to see if you can find some slight deviation.

I am going to press that analogy further, but I am not sure it would not be far better to have the report of the fighting in Vietnam once a week, rather than once a day.

The situation in the Middle East has become almost the same.

Well, just to sum what I was saying, there again is the great virtue or great value for us of having this correspondent from a foreign country. It helps give us a broad perspective. After all, if Canada is not an internationally-minded country, it has little reason for existing. That is how I feel about it. Now, there are, of course, the defects of this system—which are perhaps obvious.

Let me say first of all that I wish our editors were not quite so anglebound, if I can coin a phrase. It does seem to me we do draw from abroad and draw from a pretty narrow circle, particularly American and British—things in the English language.

If we are going to introduce articles from abroad, what is wrong with the articles in a superb newspaper like Die Zeit of Hamburg—except I suppose somebody has to translate. I can buy them in Toronto the same day they appear in Hamburg.

Le Monde publishes an English language monthly, or weekly. If you do not want to translate, why not use the Japan Times?

I think our editors tend to be unicultural. Of course, I am particularly thinking of English speaking editors. I think our French speaking editors are less so.

I was astonished last year when one of the most powerful figures expressed an opinion in Europe. Mr. Jean Jacques Servan Schreiber of L'Express published a long article in his New Year's issue in which the gist of it was there were two important events in world history in the previous year. One of them, the most important and most hopeful, was the Canadian election.

One need not agree with his point of view, but it is an interesting article for Canadian consumption from a man, who, as you know, had a powerful influence on European opinion. I saw no reference whatsoever to this in any Canadian paper, except Le Soleil which I think picked it up.

It is just a plea to spread one's ears—if one can do that—eyes and ears a little wide.

Senator Connolly (Halifax North): In what respect did he publish this?

Mr. Holmes: General survey of what had been going on in the world and well, I suppose that since the content was highly political...

Senator Connolly (Halifax North): I do not want that. Why was it more significant than any other national election in his view?

Mr. Holmes: Well, I think one of the points that he made was that in the elections in all other places, he felt that old conservatives—with a small “c”, I am treading on dangerous ground here—and I think a few reactionary people had been elected, and that in Canada, I do not think he was so much thinking of the actual people elected as the kind of mood.

I am not mentioning this because I want to suggest that Mr. Servan Schreiber was right. It is his own opinion; right or wrong. It was just...

Senator Connolly (Halifax North): That he expressed them.

Mr. Holmes: Coverage of Canada in foreign newspapers is exceedingly small and when papers of importance like L'Express, have an article about Canada in them, I would have thought that somebody would have read it.

Senator Connolly (Halifax North): Well, the only reason I mention this is that from the point of view of spectacular elections, I think the 1958 one—which did not happen to do the party I belong to to much good—was by far the most spectacular. Senator Davey will, perhaps, remember about that.

The Chairman: Mr. Holmes, will you carry on, please?

Senator Prowse: Perhaps that was because it was tragic.

The Chairman: It is all in your point of view. I am sure Senator MacDonald did not regard it as tragic.

Mr. Holmes: What is lacking in the coverage of international news is that it is being covered by foreign rather than by Canadian correspondents. The Canadian perspective and, particularly, the Canadian interest is lacking.

In most of the criticism of this, I think there is a little too much emphasis on the idea that somehow this introduces a foreign bias and, particularly, an American bias. I think this is like the debate over the Americans in our universities.

The problem is not really that they introduce an American bias. Most of them are anti-American Americans. What is lacking is Canadian content.

First of all, let me illustrate what I think is good. At least one of the newspapers which I read regularly sent a very good correspondent to the recent meeting of NATO. What he sent back was exceedingly satisfying. He told me exactly what the Canadian position was in a balanced way, what was being said about the Canadian position, this kind of thing.

I compared this with the New York Times report, which of course had nothing whatsoever about the Canadian position. This is not a criticism of the New York Times, but it does not serve our purpose.

May I cite another case? I rather hate to cite this because the particular newspaper concerned is a pretty good one. A recent report in the London Observer on the Canadian Chinese negotiations in Stockholm obviously was completely confused. I do not pretend to have the inside story of what is going on. The story obviously was confused, and I did check my impression that it was also quite incorrect.

I am not suggesting really that any Canadian newspaper, even Canadian Press, should have a resident correspondent in Stockholm, but somehow I think we could do better if we had a Canadian reporting it.

There were two other incidents this week, two stories from the United Nations. For instance, we had a report of the very interesting debate and vote in the Political Committee of the General Assembly on a motion to persuade the super powers to stop the deployment of the strategic nuclear missile systems. It was interesting because there was a new tendency for middle and other countries to begin to take a stand against the super powers.

This is very interesting. This story is from the Associated Press. We have no idea how Canada voted. I would rather like to know that.

Two days later, another story on a very interesting vote on the Middle Eastern situation, again from Associated Press, and no mention of how Canada voted. I do not expect the Associated Press to pick out Canada, but this is something very much lacking.

There have been instances, for instance, when Commonwealth Conferences in London have been covered in Canadian papers by the New York Times, which I do not think is good enough.

This situation is not as bad as often suggested and, as I say, there are virtues in it. Where one sees what is missing is when we do get a good Canadian correspondent, for instance, who spends two months in the United Nations General Assembly and the kind of interpretation you get. It is enormously helpful in trying to decide how we should press the government, what kind of positions we think our government should take.

You never will get this from a foreign correspondent. This is Canadian content that is missing, even though we need the others as well to give us balance.

This leads me to just add one word here. I would like to make a special plea for the development of a real corps or stable or whatever you want to call it of good Canadian correspondents. We have some very good ones. We have had some very good ones—a lot of them are now running the New York Times. We lost them.

I have the greatest respect for good foreign correspondents. When I was in the foreign service, I found they were enormously helpful. They were people one had to keep in close touch with. They were often much better informed than others.

In my present work, I find them even more important. The kind of a role a good Canadian foreign correspondent plays abroad or when he comes back in the life of the country is in the debate, putting forward points of view. This is a group of people it is in the national interest to develop.

The problem I see in my personal friendship with another one of them is the problem of a career. If a man is going to be a foreign correspondent, he has to build a career. This is difficult. It is difficult for the newspapers who employ him.

I fully realize he has to have postings; it is like the role of a diplomat in many ways. In terms of a career, you move from one assignment to another. Then he should come back to home base for a while, share our views, and get Canadianized. I hope some attention can be given to this aspect of it.

Foreign correspondents tend, of course, to move from one paper to another. What I do not want them to have to do is move to a foreign newspaper, not that it is a disaster, but we lose them and we need them.

There are all sorts of difficulties there. There is the great problem of the foreign correspondent, which is exactly the same as that of the diplomat—if he does not stay long enough in a place, he is not well enough informed. He does not know the language. He has not got the sources. If he stays too long in a place, he tends to become bushed and his writing becomes tendentious and too narrow in focus. These are problems that have to be dealt with.

Here I would like to say a good word for the CBC. It is one of the few institutions which has, of course, great resources and maintains a very good group of correspondents. I hope very much these can be maintained in the national interest.

I know you are particularly interested in the question of press chains. Obviously it is terribly expensive for one newspaper to maintain an office abroad. It is rather like asking it to maintain one Canadian Embassy.

It is about on the same level sometimes. Perhaps correspondents are even more expensive. There are certainly some good examples in Canada of press chains being able to maintain foreign correspondents which is not possible for others.

I do not pretend this is easy for newspapers. I just say that I hope you can find some ways of doing it.

I would like to say although I have pressed for more coverage of international news, more and better, I do not want to take a fanatical view. I find it takes me less time to read the morning paper than it used to. I think that is because there is more domestic and less international news, but I cannot honestly say as a citizen it is necessarily wrong.

The importance of urban problems, internal Canadian problems is such that there is an argument for devoting more space to domestic issues. I miss—I might say that fewer and fewer of these issues are in fact totally domestic, particularly if we are talking about things like pollution. I must make a plea I think not to take too parochial a view. We need international perspective, reporting not just international politics and foreign politics but somewhat more interest in what other countries—other than the United States, not that its examples are wrong, but there is an over-concentration there I think—what other countries are doing about specific problems and that sort of thing.

I must not talk any longer. I cannot leave this without making a strong plea also for anything that can be done to support the Canadian journals of opinion. We are very short of journals of opinion in this country. We have some very good ones, all struggling over the years.

You cannot have a good insight on foreign policy without this sort of thing.

Here one gets into the very tangled issue of foreign subsidiary journals in Canada, which I will not touch upon. I will just say—without being specific—I think it is of some value if a foreign subsidiary journal in Canada does provide us with some news about Canada because there is all too little except in the daily press.

There is all too little in our periodicals. If one compares that coverage with what one can get in a purely Canadian journal—and without making invidious comparisons, I might mention a journal in Montreal which is a very good one, much broader coverage of Canadian news and foreign policy—I think we realize what we are missing.

Finally, just a plea to the press having to do with their role in the foreign policy debate in Canada. It is terribly important that we have this debate and particularly during the past year of foreign policy review, when private organizations have been trying to stimulate debate, one important aspect of this is statements, speeches, conferences on this subject which are carried to a wider audience by the press, by the mass media generally.

May I just make a heartfelt personal plea to the press to be exceedingly careful in their reporting of these statements, not to oversimplify them and in particular, not to put out headlines which are such an embarrassment to the speaker that in some cases, many of us would really prefer not to say anything if we think we are being covered by the press. That is because we have not the foggiest idea what we are going to be accused of saying by the time it reaches the remote parts of the country.

I think the press must remain eternally vigilant about government hand-outs, about any kind of government direction or dictation.

On the other hand, I do think the press must not stand between the government and the people and it must not stand between the people and the people. This is where it has a solemn obligation to try to report what in fact was said, whether it was by the government or by another citizen. It is of great importance.

I would not agree with what a certain distinguished gentleman said, and I do think that the President of the United States has a right to speak to the people of the United States without being interpreted by other people who have a captive audience.

This is another reason why I think that it is important that texts should be given. However suspicious one might be of what the government has said, it is right of the press to criticize, to interpret in any way, but I do think it is also the right of the government to have its statements and policies conveyed to the public.

The public then can tear apart what, in fact, has been said.

I am afraid there I roamed a little away from my particular mandate, Senator. I am open for attack, gentlemen.

The Chairman: I am not sure you roamed. Indeed, if you did, we are delighted you did. I can say, even before the questions, this has been a most useful commentary.

However, you are available for our questions. I might say to the Senators that the witness has an appointment away from the building at 11:30, so will you be mindful of that fact when you are putting questions.

I think, Senator Prowse, you have some questions first.

Senator Prowse: There have been a number of comments, Mr. Holmes, and yours is the last one we have heard, on the possible desirability of having more of our international news that comes into Canada reported by Canadians.

Now, just where would be the advantage of having the Canadian news reported by a Canadian rather than, let us say, a good objective, fair reporter from either the New York Times or London Times?

Mr. Holmes: Well, if a good objective reporter of the New York Times or London Times will cover Canadian news, I am very much interested.

Senator Prowse: I don't want Canadian news—let us take the Middle East for example. Where would it be an advantage to have our reporter report on what is happening over there? What would be the advantage of having our reports that we receive on what is happening over there written by a Canadian reporter rather than, say, a good English or a good French or a good Australian reporter, for example?

Mr. Holmes: Not very much. In fact, I would be very distressed if we did not continue to have on our papers the reports of good correspondents of foreign papers. They are some of the great specialists.

This we absolutely must have. We must not be cut off from it. What I am making a plea for is that it be supplemented with some Canadian reporting. Much of it, I presume, would have to be of a roving nature.

This is primarily because there are certain aspects of Canadian policy in the Middle East we do want to understand.

When we had UNEF, we did want to know what was going on there and how the Canadians were getting on with that problem, what their attitudes were. So long as there is any problem or question of Canadians returning to the Middle East in a peace-keeping way, so long as Canada is involved in any way in the Middle East—whether one wants it to be or not—I do think that somebody has got to point out some special Canadian interest, Canadian attitude—which just happens to be ours.

They are not by definition different from others. I am glad, Senator, that you did mention this question so I can make it quite clear that I would like to see the Canadian reporting to supplement the others, but certainly not cut off the others.

Senator Prowse: What I have in mind is we get a lot of news from Vietnam, which you mentioned. It comes to us almost exclusively, I suppose, through American sources.

Now, you have some expertise in the international field. Suppose we were getting our reports from Vietnam by a Canadian reporter, whether he is sent out from a metropolitan daily and they could maybe syndicate his reports to somebody else, or whether it is coming to us from a Canadian Press reporter who was sent there; in other words a Canadian. Would you think there would be any substantial difference in the kind of information we would get?

Mr. Holmes: First of all, I do not think it is a question of Vietnam. That is a rather good case. I do not think it is a question of bias that is involved in that.

I do not think it is fair for anyone who looks over the American news from Vietnam to argue that this gives you a pro-American view. Certainly not, if you read the New York Times, which has been one of the most severe critics.

I do not think the question of having an American view exposed to us, imposed upon us is important. This may be important in other issues. It is more likely to be important in economic issues than in something like Vietnam.

I do not think it is a question of bias. We are bound to get most of our news from Vietnam from American sources. My impression is that at least many of the Canadian papers do supplement this with British reports, French reports, and others to give some different perspectives.

On the other hand, there are certain Canadian interests. Let me just cite an historic situation which I recall. I was in the foreign service and concerned with the original days of the Control Commission in Vietnam. It was a very important Commission which we had.

We were quite upset because the press reports coming from there were coming from largely American reporters. They were very much distorting the role of this Commission, criticizing it, we thought, quite unfavorably.

They did not understand what its purpose was. In that case, some quite good Canadian correspondents did go and sent back some reports. The CBC sent a man there. There was a very definite Canadian interest to be covered. I think this helped to give us somewhat a better balance.

Senator Prowse: What I am concerned with is the actual cost of getting the Canadian reporters abroad. It certainly is not practical to think in terms of the odd Podunk Journal in Canada sending its own reporter, so they are going to have to get it from a source.

The Canadian Press said to us, "We cannot put people into every place in the anticipation that something is going to happen, but we do send people to areas that do become important to Canadians."

Now, from where you sit, is this a fairly reasonable claim they make, or fairly accurate claim—let us put it that way?

Mr. Holmes: I think Canadian Press covers Washington and London.

Senator Prowse: And Paris now.

Mr. Holmes: And Paris. Probably London and Paris correspondents roam a bit. Some of them do. I know this is quite expensive. My particular plea would be to have the Canadian Press or some Canadian journal cover the United Nations which, after all, is an exceedingly important area of Canadian foreign policy.

Even during the period of the General Assembly, which is only three months a year, or even when Canada was on the Security Council, quite frequently in cases like that somebody was sent down especially. It seems to me this is a neglected area; expensive, yes.

A number of privately owned Canadian newspapers manage to have a Far Eastern correspondent, which is interesting. I would hope that perhaps Canadian Press might do something of this sort. These people have roaming commissions and they do a good deal. I think of those particular Far Eastern correspondents, they all serve that kind of purpose I was thinking about when talking about the Canadian foreign correspondent, as a contributor to the national debate.

They are people with some expertise there. They are a great asset to the country, and the community.

Senator Prowse: This is the point I was getting at. If it is not practical for us to send people into every country to report on it, would you think that we might at least adequately cover the U.N., and then gain an indication of where special attention was needed, by paying much more attention and maintaining people at the United Nations where they would have immediate contact?

Suppose we had a bureau at the United Nations. They could have immediate contact with all of the national situations. If they were doing a good job, we would have an indication of where it might be useful to ship somebody in order to get the story.

If they were having a discussion about any one of the issues—whether it is starvation or whether it is industrial development or this type of thing, could a useful purpose be served by putting a specialist in a post down here with a view to finding out where we go next?

Mr. Holmes: I am very glad you have registered this. I think you are absolutely right, Senator, and if you look at the list of newspapers represented at the United Nations, I am sure you will find a great many world newspapers have come to exactly this conclusion. Many foreign papers find it useful to have somebody in New York who does cover the New York scene as well.

I think it is possibly a very good place to cover international politics, where you can do the kind of coverage of say a C. L. Sulzberger of the New York Times. He seems to be everywhere and he covers the world because he keeps an ear to various people who know what they are talking about.

Whether he should be in New York or not, I am not quite sure; so much of the real action of the United Nations now is in Geneva. At any rate, he might find it pleasant and interesting to commute between the two places.

Senator Prowse: Well, we would be interested in a Canadian, it seems to me, in...

The Chairman: I just have a note here from the CP person in the room who says the Canadian Press has a man permanently assigned to the United Nations in New York.

Senator Prowse: Yes, a man.

The Chairman: Well, it makes the point that you were making.

Senator Prowse: Could you cover the United Nations by yourself, do you think?

Mr. Holmes: It would be very difficult. Some large newspapers, like the New York Times, have normally two or three people.

I am sorry. I was unaware the CP manned this. If so, I am not sure why we get our reports from AP of what is happening in the last few days.

The Chairman: The articles you mentioned in the course of your remarks. Senator Prowse, are you finished?

Senator Prowse: Yes; I think that is all.

The Chairman: Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: You have made passing reference to the recent uproar over Spiro Agnew's news attack upon the press. There was a somewhat emotional, hysterical—if you will—reaction to it.

Do you feel in such instances that the important elements of the press are inclined to over-kill when there is criticism of themselves? Do they go too far in trying to influence public opinion and get an opposite reaction to what they were after?

Mr. Holmes: Here I think there is a considerable difference between the American press and the Canadian press, perhaps just in the more relaxed tone of the Canadian newspapers and less shrill approach frequently.

I think it may well be true of the American press, although I would not like to express a competent opinion there in this particular issue. It does seem to me there is a tendency to band together and cry freedom of the press when there is criticism.

Having said that, I immediately find I want to qualify it. In many ways, I do not like generalized criticism of the press, although I have made some generalizations about it.

I notice when they have meetings of their own, they get into the confessional and confess their sins and they say they must do a great deal about it. I accept that as their indication.

If criticism comes from outside, they tend to band together—but perhaps we all do that.

Senator Connolly (Halifax North): We have a continuing interest in the Commonwealth. We have formed, I think, certain views through the Parliamentary Association of the countries, and the people that go there are very highly respected, and they are expected also to take initiatives and give leadership—particularly for the problems of a developing world, the Commonwealth proportion of the developing world.

Now, I find that in many respects a good many of our prominent Parliamentarians going there have some general idea of conditions in the developing world or in some parts of it. I do not say this to be critical. I think I am being objective.

What I do find is that by contrast, the British press, I think perhaps more than what you have described, is an opinion press, periodical press. As it is written it will give you a more hard-nosed analysis of what the situation is politically and economically in Tanzania or Bechuanaland, or where-have-you.

It seems to be able to write about these places assuming a background of knowledge on the part of the British public. It may be a hold-over from the days of the Empire. It makes them infinitely more knowledgeable about these problems.

Now, is there any real solution to this situation for Canada in terms of coverage and in terms of providing a public opinion that can be responsive to initiatives that Canada can take?

Mr. Holmes: Yes; this is a very important issue. I think as the Canadian interest abroad and the Canadian involvement abroad get greater, we have to have a better informed public on the subject.

In Britain, of course, you have the reflection of a very long period of involvement abroad, a consideration of many of these issues, and a tradition of coverage in the British press and periodicals.

We benefit from that by using a good many of those articles from the good British correspondents, particularly about Africa.

It will take us quite a while to build up in Canada foreign correspondents with that kind of experience. I can think of at least one of our larger newspapers which has maintained, for a time at least, a correspondent in Africa. The correspondent did very well.

Here again perhaps, there is a danger and I realize this. When I am talking about broader coverage. If you get too broad in your coverage, you get only superficial coverage and it might be better to leave it to foreign rather than have that kind of coverage.

The only suggestion I could make here, and I think there is a good deal to be said for it, is that we now have in Canada an increasing group of Canadians who have been abroad for many reasons, technical assistance, missionaries. They might have lived in the north-west corner of Pakistan or the northern part of Nigeria; young people in CUSO.

There is quite a body of those people now. I am happy to see that a good many of our newspapers ask them to write special articles on these people. This is a very good tendency. It encourages these people themselves. It makes them feel more involved in the Canadian policy and that, I think, is something to be much encouraged. Here is my impression: The Canadian papers are pretty good.

Senator Connolly (Halifax North): I wish I could agree with the last statement, but I do not. Perhaps it is because of the interest on the part of the public, but let me ask you, if I may: Would you think that reviews, say by the Foreign Relations Committee, of the work done by the members of our Foreign Service when they return periodically or at the end of their term, might have the effect of stimulating that kind of interest?

I consider the problems of the Third World to be, perhaps, the most important problems in the world today. I see an opportunity for Canada to take a lead, not necessarily in money because we have not the resources that many of the big contributors have, but if we can establish a climate of public opinion here that might induce the press to realize how important it is for the Third World and for us, I think we would be doing something. Do you think the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs talking to returning ambassadors from time to time, without asking them to talk about government policy, but to talk about conditions in the country as they saw it during their term, would have an effect of a kind that I seek to produce?

Mr. Holmes: May I just say first of all that perhaps when I was speaking, if I exaggerated what the press is doing in the way of taking advantage of expertise in Canada, it was probably just because I felt it might be more effective to encourage them for what they do than to criticize them for not doing more.

Senator Connolly (Halifax North): Yes. I do not want to be taken as criticizing them for not doing enough. I think that the law of supply and demand runs here as well as in the economic field.

Mr. Holmes: Yes. This probably would not be a popular statement. I would think there is a great deal to be said for the members of the committee on External Affairs talking to returned Canadians, foreign service officers, or foreign service officers who are back on leave.

It seems to me highly important. On the other hand, I really do think that given the kind of system of government we have, in which government policy must be decided by the government and not by its servants, such discussions should be off the record—not available to the press.

Senator Connolly (Halifax North): Do you not lose the whole value of it if it is not available to the press? You might have to put some certain wraps on a comment made by a returning foreign service person. Perhaps you might have to have some part of the hearing on camera. I am thinking only of encouraging the press to take an interest in this kind of operation, in a very detailed way, and countries where there is trouble.

I think Nigeria came to Canada as an explosion. I do not think it came to British readers as an explosion because they saw it building up. There are other places in Africa where the same thing happened, according to the British press, and Canada had similar low-ups.

Mr. Holmes: I think it would be useful to the committee to talk to the Canadian High Commissioner in Lagos. When one is involved in such an exceedingly delicate situation, I really think that if he knew that what he was saying was going to be reported, he would...

Senator Prowse: Would he say it?

Mr. Holmes: He would have to be very banal. He would become very banal.

Senator Connolly (Halifax North): That is an extreme situation. I was thinking of creating a general climate of opinion and perhaps a hunger for news about situations in these countries.

Senator Smith: Mr. Chairman, I have a question with regard to coverage of foreign events by Canadians. I think it is a very interesting subject. It has been touched on before by others who have been here before us.

I gather in the first place you are not impressed with TV as a medium. Perhaps you do not turn it on to see what it has to say about foreign affairs, for example. Perhaps you have no interest in what television is saying about foreign countries.

To me, it seems that perhaps through that popular appeal, we can get people to think about what is going on in the rest of the world through that medium. Last night, after we wound up a hard day here, I went home and got the last part of what to me was a very interesting documentary on China.

There was a film. I missed most of the film. The part that I listened to quite carefully was the commentary on the film and the commentary on the Chinese situation by a former colleague of yours, Chester Ronning. He praised the film very highly.

He said in the first place, "I want to say the film was very good. It was excellent."

I would have thought that would have been a very worthwhile program for many people to see in the country. Do you not agree that television has a place?

Mr. Holmes: It has very much a place.

Senator Smith: I know you are a very serious student and your attitudes are so different, for example, than the uninformed Canadian.

Mr. Holmes: I would not want to set myself apart that way. I just find normally I can get more by reading a couple of issues from cover to cover in a journal than watching television.

I am not advocating that for anybody. It is a personal weakness, let me say. I think what Walter Lippmann is saying is that television is very useful, and obviously supremely powerful, a powerful supplement.

I am concerned with the situations where we depend on it alone. That is the role, and a dramatic role—when I see a television program of this kind, which tends to express a point of view that I am in agreement with, I think it is just fine.

When I see one that I think has been deliberately distorted, where the facts are being manipulated by people, then I think it is pretty frightening. It does leave quite a bit of power in the hands of an editor.

Senator Smith: Then you do not have an opportunity to get on television with the audience prepared for you to answer then and there. Therefore, the other side has lost. I understand your disturbance about that.

Senator Prowse: Unless you are a commentator following the President.

Senator Smith: I think it would be pretty interesting for Canadians to have a look at Vietnam through Canadian lenses rather than being influenced by the American lenses. I think that would be useful. It is not exactly a coverage of news.

It is the same old story you make reference to; the tendency there is perhaps to over-cover or to concentrate on what seems to be a popular thing of the day.

I am just wondering whether it might be your opinion that perhaps the television coverage and the reportage that has come out by reporters on Biafra tends to dwell on Biafra too much. Perhaps they got so involved, it showed one side in a very sympathetic light to the exclusion of the balanced assessment. Perhaps that is the weakness you referred to on television.

Mr. Holmes: This is very much the kind of thing. Television has a great role and the press has a great role in exposing the situation of starving children in Biafra. It is the kind of selectivity of exposure that is worrying me.

Why such attention to the starving children in Biafra and almost complete ignorance of the starving children in southern Sudan? Why is there so much excitement about the grape pickers in California rather than the Gaspé?

Senator Smith: They are unorganized.

Mr. Holmes: Or Métis in Canada? Now I am not suggesting it is wrong to draw attention to the Biafra situation. I have not figured out the California grape picker one; at any rate, if there is a problem there, why that is interesting.

Somehow it does seem to me we have program after program on the California grape pickers or the urban and racial issue in the United States, on which there is not much we can do.

Senator Smith: Do you think it would be a useful suggestion to make to both the Canadian Press and the CBC that in the first place, the CBC tolerate some moonlighting on the part of some foreign correspondents who are obliged by the public to make a comment every day on the radio and on the television? Maybe that would be a way out of the Canadian Press dilemma, with regard to financial resources and would employ the CBC at a higher rate of pay and encourage better men to work for the CBC.

Mr. Holmes: Yes.

Senator Smith: There is one question that I would like to ask. I would like you to tell me the country in which there is an active and satisfying Latin American Press? Which country or countries were you referring to?

Mr. Holmes: I think here I am a little lost. I do not read Spanish or Portuguese. I am judging to a considerable extent on what I am told. I think Estado de Sao Paulo, when I have read translations, seems to have remarkable coverage and also a quality of courage.

Senator Smith: My question is based on the general political situation in such countries; how can you have a free press? How can you have a good press in a situation where you have near dictatorships?

Mr. Holmes: What has happened to it recently I do not know. It is quite a situation.

The Chairman: Mr. Holmes, I would like to return to television, perhaps in a round-about way. You indicated a moment or two ago that when you read the Globe and Mail every morning you are impressed by the increasing emphasis on local and urban news, etcetera.

Some of the research that we have done in preparing for these hearings would tend to confirm the Globe and Mail's judgment that this is the news that interests people most, the local issues. I am wondering if you would not agree, particularly in the area of international affairs, that perhaps television can be more useful than the daily press in developing an interest across the country in international affairs.

Mr. Holmes: This is very true. It reaches a wide public, so much more vividly. We had an example in Biafra, whatever one thinks of the coverage and the particular issue there—the fact that the Canadian people could be roused about an issue which is a very great distance from here. It is a good thing.

The Chairman: But the rousing was more through television than print.

Senator Prowse: Were they actually roused?

The Chairman: Whether they were roused or whatever verb we choose to use, there was considerable interest in the issue. There is no doubt of that.

Mr. Holmes: Certainly the extent of interest one has to accept. I assume that international affairs generally, politics particularly, are not going to interest intensely the vast majority of the population. They like to have a general idea of what is going on.

The Chairman: I do not disagree, Mr. Holmes, but I think they could be interested through television. I think television could do much more in the area.

I would like to ask a related question on the public interest in international affairs. In talking about the coverage of international affairs across Canada, you tended to relate that coverage to the newspaper facilities in a particular community.

I am wondering have you, or are you able to discern any regional variance in interest in international affairs? In other words, are people in the west less interested than people in the Atlantic? Is that an unfair question?

Mr. Holmes: No. It is a very interesting one. I am a member of an institute which has branches from St. John's to Victoria. I have traveled back and forth quite a bit.

The reason my judgment is not very good is because those branches consist of the people in all those areas who are interested in international affairs or they would not be members. So I find St. John's and Victoria rather similar that way.

The Chairman: I see.

Mr. Holmes: Inevitably, there certainly are areas of Canada—I would not like to be too specific—where coverage by the local press of international affairs is not very extensive, or by the local radio or television.

Therefore, there really is not sufficient information to rouse interest. There is bound to be more interest in the major metropolitan centers, I think, simply because they get it all of the time in their newspapers and in a variety of television and radio programs.

Senator Prowse: Where they have a concentration of more people from the various areas, maybe.

Mr. Holmes: That is a very important element.

The Chairman: I just wonder if there is not a great interest in international affairs, which media are not helping. This is the point of your paper, of course.

Mr. Holmes: Yes.

The Chairman: Does anyone have any other questions? Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: I have one other question. I gathered from your comment about the debate or discussion in Canada of international affairs that you were not overly impressed with the coverage given of speakers. You spoke of headline reporting.

I gathered the impression as well that a speaker on occasion cannot recognize his own speech. Is this a general thing or is it not?

Mr. Holmes: I think it is more—well, to be personal, it happens more to people like myself who obviously do not rate the first-class correspondents. If you make a local speech, if you have somebody who has been taken off covering curling...

Senator Prowse: Or the police beat.

Mr. Holmes: I think curling ought not to be reported at all. You make a long speech in which you expose the complexities of international situations and the correspondent has to get a story. He finds in a subordinate clause something that sounds a little snappy, and that is it.

Then, quite frequently, the correspondent will do a rather conscientious job. Then somebody puts a headline on it which bears little or no relationship to the content. Or you have been rather careful to try to make a balanced statement and Canadian Press picks it up and it goes from coast to coast and each newspaper will choose what it likes and put its own headlines on it. You get an anguished letter from a friend in Halifax who says, "You have gone over the deep end, off your head. Why are you saying such utter nonsense?"

Senator Prowse: The headline is on the qualifying phrase instead of the main statement?

Mr. Holmes: Yes.

Senator McElman: Now, what I want to get at is, it would seem we had better get our Canadians out of international capitals.

Mr. Holmes: Yes. There is one point, Senator, that might be relevant, the point I was going to make. I am speaking not so much as director of an institute, but as a Professor of International Relations in a university who has a good deal to do with students interested in this field looking for careers.

Some of them I direct towards foreign service; some towards academics. I should say I encourage. Not many of them feel there is much likelihood of their having a job as a foreign correspondent, although I think some are admirably qualified for it. How do you become a foreign correspondent?

I think most of them feel, they know perfectly well, that you have to start any business at the bottom and you have got to do the police beat. But the attraction, particularly the financial attractions, that seem to be available to young men setting out in this exceedingly important career—it is one of the great professions—are not great.

I have seen cases where young men were diverted into other things because they could not possibly exist at the level.

Now, in one case, I remember trying to say to a young man, "Well, look, if you think not of the salary, but as an apprenticeship; if you got a fellowship of this amount at the university, you probably would accept it. Think of it as a fellowship."

That probably was the only way I could persuade him. He would have been a first class correspondent.

Senator Prowse: The publisher would love you for that one.

May I ask one question? Oh, no; thank you.

The Chairman: Yes. Senator Bourque.

Senator Bourque: In the reporting of international affairs, the stuff we get from AP and the various services tends to be hard-nosed news. I do not think, from what you said, this is what you are complaining about.

Would it be helpful if the Canadian Press were to set up an international background organization? In other words, what we are lacking really, is the background of what is happening. We get the news. You know there is a coup, but we never really get the background as to why the coup happened.

Maybe if the Canadian Press were set up with people who were not there just to get it now, and what happened yesterday, but people that would provide a service on background.

Let us take a specific thing, for example. We have trouble selling wheat. One of the things I have seen once only in the papers is the fact that the general practice in the European countries today is to subsidize their wheat producers and then to heavily tax our grains so they are paying probably four to five dollars a bushel, which raises the price of wheat.

We cannot possibly compete.

Now, I think if the story were to come across here, I think it would help us to understand our problem. If it were given publicity, I think it would help those countries to get a more realistic basis in the production of food for their people.

Now, do you think it would be practical, perhaps, for Canadian Press or for a few of the bigger dailies to get together and form another type of cooperative?

Mr. Holmes: That strikes me as a very interesting idea. If you could have a staff of considerable expertise to do the summary articles from time to time and make them available to the papers. This is the kind of thing which is done frequently.

Of course, some newspapers take articles of that kind from the Observer, the Economist, some other paper. What you have in mind and what I would like to see is somebody covering items of particular interest in Canada. I do not know whether they can afford it, but I would like to see them look at it.

The Chairman: We will have a taxi for you down at the Senate door, which means I can ask you one more question and you can still keep your appointment.

You said in your remarks—and please correct me if I am not quoting you correctly—you were interested primarily in more and better coverage, "particularly better coverage."

Yet it seems to me most of your remarks deal with more coverage. I do not say this to be critical. I have two questions. In the area of better coverage specifically, the continuity of your remarks is on greater depth, and particularly you made an interesting suggestion for a national newspaper.

You carefully point out it was not a proposal; it was a suggestion. I am not sure I know what the difference is. I think it was an interesting idea.

Now, would it be fair to ask you in the moment or two left to expand upon that idea for a national newspaper, particularly as it related to international affairs, and then secondly, aside from this better coverage in terms of depth, would you care to speak in terms of the calibre of the coverage we do have?

Mr. Holmes: First of all on the question of more and better—I suppose I ought to be more specific. I would like to see more coverage in a good many newspapers, particularly the non-metropolitan newspapers. It seems to me they have less coverage than they ought to have and the citizens in those communities need; as for the metropolitan papers generally, I think I could strongly argue over the amount of space they actually devote to international affairs.

The way in which it might be better was perhaps in those various specific ways I suggested, more Canadian content in particular. That would be the thing I would suggest. Also perhaps less ad hoc daily news and more in the way of reflective articles, less attention perhaps to certain subjects like internal United States problems and more attention to other issues for the Canadian.

On the national newspaper, first of all, I certainly do not think it should be a government publication and I do not think any government has ever suggested it should be. There is no issue there.

But I wonder if a cooperative body like Canadian Press might begin by putting out a newspaper published in London, available on the stands in Europe, which would be enormously helpful to a vast number of Canadians who are either seasonably or otherwise in that part of the world.

If they were sent by air mail editions, they might be enormously helpful to Canadian missions abroad and elsewhere. I do not like to introduce what sounds like a plug, but my institute has found it necessary to produce a monthly summary of news having to do with international affairs. It is not a plug because every additional subscription we get costs us more money. If we can keep in business in spite of the Post Office, we will continue to provide that service.

It makes one aware of the difficulty of finding all of the news about Canadian foreign policy in the press.

As I was saying, if this national newspaper might start as a newspaper abroad—incidentally, I think one of the best newspapers in the world now is the Paris Herald Tribune. It seemed to have got much better since there ceased to be a Herald Tribune in New York. Well, if it did that, then it might well have some part of local circulation on a small scale and it would never make money I am sure.

The Chairman: Do you want to meet your time deadline? I must say on behalf of the members of the committee, Mr. Holmes, that we are pleased indeed that you were able to find the time to be here.

This, for us, has been a terribly worthwhile presentation. We are very grateful. Thank you very much.

Mr. Holmes: May I apologize to the Senators. I thought I would be through at 11.00 and I made another appointment. Otherwise I would never have considered anything else.

The Chairman: It is our loss. Thank you.

The committee adjourned.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA

EVIDENCE

Held in the Parliament Buildings, Ottawa,
Ontario, on the 16th day of December,
1969, at 10:00 a.m.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, I have several announcements to make before we begin the session.

First of all, I would like to reconfirm that all hearings in this study will be open unless otherwise requested by the witnesses.

Secondly, on Friday morning you will recall when Mr. Holmes was here, we got into a discussion re CP representation at the United Nations. We have now spoken with Mr. Dauphinee of Canadian Press and he has advised us that the United Nations is covered by the New York office of Canadian Press. When the General Assembly and/or Security Council are in session there is a full-time correspondent assigned to cover it. Mr. Stephen Scott has the assignment this year. When the United Nations is not in session it is covered on a part-time basis only by Mr. Scott. I just thought we should have that on the record.

Thirdly, I would like to inform you the hearing scheduled for later this morning with Mr. Louis Martin, freelance writer and television commentator has been postponed until some time into the New Year.

This means, Honourable Senators, that you will have perhaps a longer opportunity than we had expected to discuss the presentation of this morning's witness, Mr. Douglas M. Fisher.

Mr. Fisher is an active member of the New Democratic Party. He is also a graduate of the University of Toronto, 1949, graduating from that institution in that year with other New Democrats like Mr. Reid Scott, Progressive Conservatives like the late George Hogan and the Ontario Minister of Mines, Mr. Alan Lawrence and Liberals like Miss Judy LaMarsh, Paul Hellyer, and myself.

None of these are the reasons why we have asked Mr. Fisher to appear before the Committee this morning. He is in fact, or he has in fact had and continues to have practical working experience in most branches of the mass media.

Secondly, I know to my certain knowledge that he has had and retains a life-long interest in the mass media and the problems of the media. I feel certain that he will have views that will interest us greatly.

Now, Mr. Fisher was kind enough to prepare a written brief for us. I am not at all certain whether many of the senators have had an opportunity of reading the brief although some of us have, but I suspect that most haven't. Therefore, I am going to suggest that you begin by making some kind of an oral statement based on your brief, or indeed you may read from it if you wish. Following that we would like to ask you some questions on the contents of your brief, on the things you don't say. Mr. Fisher.

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Well, Honourable Senators, it was my friend and acquaintance here who brought up the Victoria class of '49. It was one of my first encounters with censorship in which your Honourable Chairman figured.

I was the editor of the literary magazine at the university, and Mr. Davey was one of the active politicians in the College at the time. We had a grant from the council of this college assembly and a group—I might say we called them Tarzans then, that will give you some idea of the date—decided that our publication was too literary, too airy-fairy, too much poetry, too much radicalism, and didn't make the common man happy, and there were arguments that a comic book might be better. And so a motion was presented in the college assembly that our budget be reduced, I think, almost by 80 per cent, and as I remember your Chairman was one of the people—I don't know as a ploy or otherwise—who seems to be on the other side.

We had to drum up quite a bit of support in order to defeat that motion.

The Chairman: I was definitely on the other side.

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Well, Honourable Senators, what I wanted to do was to read the first page or so and then elaborate on some of the main points.

The Chairman: Would you read the conclusions as well?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Yes.

Persons better known than I have expressed cynicism or skepticism about the purpose and efficacy of your enquiry. I am ambivalent towards it: attracted both by the importance of the subject and by a friendly acquaintance with your Chairman for 20 years; critical and without much hope because the Senate is dealing here with a powerful, generally rich establishment of owners and I, please forgive me, tend to identify you and your institution with this sort of establishment rather than with the ordinary people—the consumers, the objects of, the payers for the mass media.

But you don't want me badgering you and I am not deliberately seeking to be impolite. I have divided my presentation into three parts: the first and shortest covers my bonafides as a witness and the several principles or cherished ideas I hold regarding the field you are examining; the second is a list of topics on which I am not going into detail but where I would welcome questions, a chance "to take off," if you are interested in my opinion; the third section is a text containing arguments regarding several of the arguable subjects you are charged with examining and recommending upon. In the first skeleton of part 2—on the Press Gallery and Parliament—I have gone far in breaking the subject into topics but have not written a text. Why not? The subject is relatively an "insider's one." I am most ready to go into it if you wish.

The worth of my evidence may come, if at all, from the fact that I have been a Member of Parliament and that I have worked as a columnist for a daily paper and as a commentator and interviewer for several television enterprises. I would disavow any claim or accusation that I am a newspaper man or a reporter. I have had neither formal training nor apprenticeship in newspapers. Similarly, my work in television was not preceded by any formal training. I have had training and experience as a reference librarian and as a teacher of history in the secondary schools.

I will just move on to make the point that if I wanted to sum up the general ideas I have towards the media, the first one would be that our media should offer space and time and print to everyone that they possibly can who seeks to advance or attack a cause; and secondly the more diversity of outlets we have the better it is. Thirdly, my feeling—and this is something in which it seems to me, the media fall very short—the recognition that there are certain causes the people in the media business themselves don't particularly care for—and that puts an extra responsibility on them.

Another point that I hold cherished, and that is, I suppose, because of all the different groups I've ever worked with, I find politicians the pleasantest and the easiest and the most direct to deal with. This may seem surprising, but it's true. I have a very large concern about what seems to be happening in the political process, particularly to Parliament. I am concerned about the popular contempt for Parliament and the worship of executive action and bureaucratic and academic expertise.

Insofar as the media encourage the trend towards the unpopolarization, if you want, of Parliament, the contempt for it, politicians in Parliament and the Legislative Assembly, I think you and all the people who are concerned for politics have to consider what might be done to help it.

Another thing I worry about of course in connection with governments, is that they are too secretive and it's often very difficult to get information. Going through to sort of the key block, it seems to me that one encounters—you are not going to be able to escape from it and I haven't been able to escape from it and I take money from publishers—the fact that a publishing enterprise is a business, and a business designed to make a profit. It also has a very large public responsibility, if it's worth its salt, to get into the contest between the profit motives and the need to be as open as possible in terms of the kind of things that are printed and the amount of things that are printed in the news and the non-commercial time, depending on which media it is. I say in the foreseeable future we are not going to lose this split created by the different pulls of the imperative—that a business operation make a profit and the public's right to expect from the media, other contributions, which often are costly or relatively unremunerative. I make a reference here to the Canadian Newspapers Publisher's Association. Any of you can get the books. Interestingly enough, they have been keeping the history for a very long time. It is a very dull history but you can find it largely in two volumes. One published a long time ago and one, it seems to me, that was put out about ten years ago.

This is the basis for my remarks that we should give the publishers credit. They have never, according to their record, concealed the fact that they were an interested group lobbying for such things as protection of air rates and subsidies, and on tariff items and any other items that would seem to strike at the profit side and the business side of their investment.

If I have any ideal, it is the ideal that goes back, you know, to classical times, the idea of a forum and that there should be a opportunity for every kind of voice and face and pen to be heard and seen within that forum.

In part 2 where I get into the topics for questions, if you are interested, I have broken down Press Gallery and Parliament under a number of headings, some of which are obvious, and some of which may be a bit obscure. I would be glad to touch on any of them. I know—and this may be a wrong emphasis on your part, but I know senators as politicians, you are fascinated by the people who work for radio, television and newspapers, and the Press Gallery, and how they report and the reason I have so many headings here is because of this.

The next question I offer for questioning deals with the forces of metropolitanism. It seems to me that this is really shaping the media today and sort of indicating the future, and I have touched on a number of headings there—what seems to be developing and what the trends of metropolitanism seem to mean. The next section, in which I have raised a few points, has to do with the role of the school of journalism.

I have put in here two points at the end under part 2 where I would like to make some comments. One is the absolute imperative need that the CBC, CTV and the local TV stations continue to make even more of a contribution to public affairs. Finally, I wanted to suggest to you, from a couple of visits to Sweden, that you might look at two developments there that I don't think could be copied here, where the situation is different, but we might be able to come up with some alternatives fired by the Swedish example. One is the tri-party responsibility shared by publishers, editors and reporters within a press council and the other is the new development which is just taking shape now, and that is the appointment of a press ombudsman to whom people can take their complaints, the personal complaints they have, about the way they have been treated in the press.

Part 3 is my text on the concentration of economic power in Canadian newspapers and I suppose if there are any to change which I am asking you to take a look at, it's Thomson and F. P. Publications. Thomson, because of what I think that the performance of it.

If I might just digress for a moment, I always remember my first experience with the Thomson papers was in my own constituency when I was first a candidate. I was running against Mr. C. D. Howe and it was a very exciting campaign. Not just because it happened to end in an upset, but because there was a tremendous interest in it. There were dozens of people coming in from outside, the CBC, and Toronto papers, the Winnipeg papers, and a really great interest in it. During that election campaign—the only one of my meetings where I gave any kind of a performance—I always remember once I spoke at a union hall to a group of around four hundred people, a very lively meeting. There was a representative of the Liberal candidate and the Conservative candidate was there and again we got no press coverage and yet there were three Toronto reporters there.

Now, my point is, we had a Thomson paper in Port Arthur and the only meeting of mine that was covered, was covered by a young lad who the year before, when I was teaching high school, I had failed in Grade 9 English. That probably put a chip on my shoulder.

I might say in passing that after that I established a couple of contacts with Mr. Thomson and later talked to him as Lord Thomson and I have always found him one of the most genuinely likeable men I have ever encountered. He was always terribly candid and frank and I have described in here one of the examples of his candor. He just devastated me when I made the point that I thought the people in the Lakehead, because of the great interest they had in federal politics, might be interested in another column. I suggested my own and of course that might have seemed selfish but I also suggested a couple of other people who were quite well known in the column business. I remember his answer—"Frankly, what would be the point of it? It wouldn't sell one more paper in the market area." He was right in this and because there is no real competition in the market area and I suppose given the kind of circulation coverage, they have saturation, but it is a point of view.

One of the points I make here is that there is no clear standard, as a general political thought or law in Canada, about what is too much concentration in the media. From the examples I engendered—one investigation into the situation when Thomson bought the Fort William paper—it became clear there that the standards, that the Combines people were looking at, were really business standards. I mean that was or seemed to be the priority rather than the other standard that I talked to you about, about the service to the public and the values of the diversity of expression. I make the point that neither the BBG nor the CRTC have really been definitive in this area. You, it seems to me in your recommendations, will have to examine very closely what seem to be the trends of their thinking and possibly have long discussions with them about it.

I give some examples from the United States to indicate the potential power of the conglomerates or of mass-ownership and I am sure your Committee will also recommend to you to look at what is happening in West Germany with the Springer interest. This is where you have almost a crisis at the present time because of the fact of this one very large ownership of magazines, broadcasting and newspapers. I go into the question about how far Canada is away from situations like this—well, when I looked at the advance that Southam and F.P. in particular have made, and when I remember the kind of campaign that F.P. particularly—it seemed to me engendered out of the Winnipeg Free Press—seem to carry on, I wonder how much further we can allow this extension.

I happen to be associated in another way with Mr. Max Bell, who I suppose is the senior person involved in this in the F.P. business I know he has very wide business interests in Canadian Pacific, in the oil industry, and I am not suggesting here that Mr. Bell would let that effect the kind of instruction or advice or decision he would make in relation to the operation of F.P. I really do think that the very fact that the people who work under him, particularly at the executive level, are aware of those holdings would have an influence, and I certainly wouldn't like to see them extended any further.

The other thing I go into in the paper is inspired really by Mr. John Porter's chapter in the Vertical Mosaic on the mass media. The one point I make—and I may be accused of flippancy here—and I don't make it to denigrate the Brits, as I call them, but it just is a simple fact—that if you just look around you in the press, in radio and in television, particularly in television and the press, there do seem to be, both at the reporting and editing level, almost an inordinate number of people who learned their craft in the British manner. So when I use the phrase "the host of plummy-voiced Brits who work for the CBC news and public affairs", I just want to make you conscious of the fact that they are at the back of a lot of thought in the Canadian media. They are people who have not grown up within the Canadian tradition of schooling and so on, and that, I think, fits into the point that Porter makes about the British charter group and the familiar tradition in publishing.

I also touch on this lack of professionalism within journalism. I am not saying here that there aren't excellent reporters. There are a lot of them who have a code that is, in moral terms, excellent, although they would be embarrassed to have it put that way. My point is that there is really little of what I might call professionalism in the field as a whole. I try to explain why this is and some of the difficulties. I go into the question as to the amount of money newspapers spend on the news side of things. I suppose this is figured as much as any, to be definitive by the news that Mr. Charles Lynch was optimistically telling you last week, about how wonderful the amounts of money have been that have flowed from Southam in order to produce their newspapers. We can touch on that if you want to come back to the question of the Press Gallery in Parliament.

I go into the fact that very few of our papers seem to have the number of reporters and the kind of staff that will enable them to do investigative reporting. I give you the example of the Globe's handling of the drug lobby in some detail stemming, from all of things, a masters thesis at university. This is one area, in which it seems to me, although there are some honourable exceptions, in that there are some recent developments in both Windsor and Montreal for the two Stars, which indicate that there are two papers who are going to get into this investigative reporting in depth, in a much more serious way than they have before and many of the other papers have. I touch on this section around page 18 or 19 on the Thomson operation and the effect it seems to have on small town newspapers and small city newspapers and I make a suggestion that Thomson's might work with some of the community colleges and small college schools of journalism that are developing.

Then, I touch on the development in France, in particular the idea of editorial staff groups—that is journalists themselves sharing in the operation and determination of policy in newspapers. I think most of you know Servan-Schreiber as the author of a book that has caused a great deal of stir. One of the most intriguing parts in it, is a couple of very flattering pages he has about our present Prime Minister as a new and significant force. That seems to me something that I don't even see in the embryo now; but if we had a couple of magnanimous publishers, people who were real philanthropists, it might open up a very interesting development in Canada.

The conclusions that I have given, Senator Davey has asked me to read. I will quite frankly acknowledge that the conclusions in several cases are not supported in the brief by long evidence and I can just only apologize to you. I just didn't get the time to make the case.

"No. 1. Strong encouragement for the establishment of a national media council, perhaps with an establishing grant from the department of the Secretary of State, then to be financed by contributions from publishers, editors, journalists, etc. The council should be the agency to which any citizen or group which is agrieved at his or its treatment could make a complaint and have it investigated and reported upon publicly. Needless to say, the coterminus establishment of regional and local councils would support and fill in the gaps in the work of the national media council.

"2. That you draft with a view to Government action a policy setting out the limits on concentration of ownership and cross-media ownership and consolidation. At the least, this should require a public examination of all extensions of ownership by chains and conglomerates, considering the public responsibility factor as well as the economic factors before such deals are consummated. Ideally, this should block further concentration; at the minimum it should give us commitments and undertakings from the swallowers.

"3. That the Committee publish figures showing the profits of sample media enterprises, along with an analysis of the scale and percentage of spending on editorial and reporting costs, with a view to suggesting guidelines of what should be the minimum "plough-back" from revenue into the news services."

I think with the research staff that you have and along these lines that they are going if you don't come up with this I would be very disappointed.

"4. That the Committee recommend set requirements for a register of lobbyists working on the federal government and its agencies; that there should be penalties for non-registration and some formal recognition of those lobbies which register.

"5. That postal charges to newspapers and periodicals be substantially reduced as part of a conscious national policy to encourage communication in the print media. Past governments have recognized the importance of subsidizing communications with such undertakings as the CBC and there is the built-in support for passenger services which are uneconomic.

"6. That you request the government to adopt an information policy similar to that of Sweden which would place the onus on government to justify secrecy over material whereas all else should be open to the press and to the public.

"7. That the Canadian press inform the Secretary of State whenever it receives a request for its services from a new entrepreneur in the press field, and that the Secretary of State offer subsidies for a limited period to such a new operation as an incentive to encourage new ventures. Further, that the CP offer a more flexible service for weekly and semi-weekly papers at a minimal cost.

"8. That the program of the Secretary of State arising from the recommendations of the B & B Commission to encourage study and teaching in the other language be extended to support the interpretation of a French Canada by French Canadians in the English-language media and vice-versa."

I think that would be almost as important as some of the teaching programs that are envisaged under this.

"9. That the Speakers of the House and Senate, the members of the Committee on Internal Economy, and your Committee meet for a discussion on how open the use of the facilities of the Press Gallery should be ideally, in relation to present and future optimal facilities; and that when some guidelines have been established they be brought for discussion to the executives of the Press Gallery Association.

"10. That in the developing use of research staff in both the Library of Parliament and in the Parliamentary parties a place be found on a rotating basis for editors from smaller papers without their own Parliamentary correspondents.

"11. That the Committee underline the importance of the continuation and improvement of CBC news and public affairs as an essential and priority item in Ottawa and especially in the provincial capitals where, in my opinion, press coverage tends to be weaker.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Fisher.

Senator Petten: Mr. Fisher, are you a Socialist?

The Chairman: That is a good question. Do you consider yourself a Socialist?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Well, if you would let me define it, I would say yes, I consider myself a Socialist, but that doesn't mean I subscribe to the idea that everything should be nationalized as in many of the older definitions of Socialism.

Senator Petten: Well, as a Socialist, of your kind of Socialism, would you be in favour of some form of public ownership in some sections of the economy and would this extend to ownership of newspapers and magazines or are you satisfied to leave them in the hands of private owners without restrictions?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: In the main, insofar as the print media is concerned, I would be very wary about government publications of a mass kind—except to form or fulfil a specific service. I am thinking of a magazine such as North, or government publications such as that, but on the mass basis, no.

Senator Petten: On foreign ownership of newspapers and magazines—it is now restricted by a tax law. Do you consider this restriction a limitation of press freedom?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: No, I don't. I spoke enough on that when I was in the House and legislation was going through. I always felt it was the compensation Mr. Gordon made for Canadianizing Time and Readers' Digest and I was against that one, that is, Canadianizing Time and Readers' Digest, and very strongly for the other.

Senator Petten: Well, is it possible to restrict private ownership of newspapers and magazines? For example, to prevent further expansion of the chains and groups without limiting the freedom of the press.

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Certainly. I think you can do it. What it does—and I think I make the case that what it does do—is limit press profitability and give you a peculiar kind of private enterprise investment that is almost a unique kind. It seems to me that this is the choice which should be before the publishers and the entrepreneurs—that they realize that they are in a unique kind of enterprise, with a public responsibility that I don't think evolves upon most people in other private enterprises, particularly in the name of nationalism—and that is why I was so strongly for the Gordon changes. I can see if you are a publisher and you have something that looks as though it's worth five million dollars, if you were selling it and if there were American bids and American investment coming in that would increase the value, as a businessman you would want that. I don't blame the publishers for wanting that but you have to look at the value of keeping the means of communication in control of Canadians. It seems to me that's the kind of price that people who are in this form of operation have to be prepared to pay. I can only say with the success and extension of so many of the publishers or publishing enterprises that that particular limitation, I don't think has pinched or is likely to pinch, except in terms of maybe really large bonanzas.

Senator McElman: Are there extensions of the current law to disregard that you would suggest?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Well, not really. I make the point that we haven't got a definitive policy really in terms of broadcasting and broadcasting stations—that is within the Canadian framework—although the CRTC has moved in Windsor as you know and in other places to Canadianize the operations that do exist. You know the limitations that exist on the scale of foreign investment. I don't know whether specifically these need to be tightened up but I am not worried about Granada having 25 per cent say of the operation that I work for, but I wouldn't like to see Granada have the effective controlling interest.

The Chairman: Would you make a comment on Time and Readers' Digest? You say they have been Canadianized. Do you think that process has been completed?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: No. I think, Senator, you are being ironical. The canadianization was to meet—as you know, the Liberal Government back in the '50's introduced legislation and there was the fight back and forth. That was one of the great lobbies—I might point out to you one of the wonderful lobbies—and Mr. Zimmerman of the Reader's Digest is the most effective lobbyist I have ever met, with possibly the exception of Dave Golden, who as you know now again for the third time is a Deputy Minister, and Mr. Farrell who is now in Windsor; and Mr. Frank Walker of the Montreal Star did a magnificent job and occasionally, so did the Toronto Star and the executives of Maclean's, when making forays into Ottawa. That is where I first met Ralph Cowan, as a matter of fact. That was a very lively lobby and the point was, and I think it has been made very clearly by Mr. Gordon that the reason the government canadianized Time and Reader's Digest was because of fear of the influence of Henry Luce in the White House. I think you should really consider having Mr. Gordon here as a witness on this point. I think he would be much more informed on it than I am. I look upon it as one of the saddest things that has happened in the past number of years.

The Chairman: Do you read Time every week?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: No, I don't.

Senator Petten: In your opinion is the press and broadcasting doing an adequate job in informing the public of the activities of the Government and the political issues?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: That is a pretty broad question. I don't think the situation is hopeless. I think in some places it is very good. I think in some of the larger cities where a citizen has an opportunity—not all of them are going to take it, but where they have the opportunity of excellent libraries and a choice of several newspapers, a number of radio stations and a couple of television networks, I think the uninformed citizen is to a degree his own victim of inertia; but the picture isn't as good all the way across the board and right across the country. As someone who is a representative of peripheral and hinterland areas, it can sometimes be very grim. It is terribly hard to get information and a variety of information.

Senator Langlois: I didn't think you had such a high opinion of Toronto as you have?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: I think it is one of the interesting places in the country. May I make the point here that it is the one place where we have three newspapers competing fairly hard. I don't only mean competing in the market sense, but also in terms of chasing each other, watching each other, swiping each other's ploys and it is sort of a cross-fertilization which I think is very effective. I think the metropolitan area gains from this.

The Chairman: It's competition?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Yes.

Senator Everett: Mr. Fisher, Allen Drurie wrote a ponderous series on Washington in which I think he tries to make the point that there is some sort of dove hierarchy in the Washington press that by a process of osmosis is passed down to the working reporter and working commentator. I was in the United States when Mr. Nixon made his famous TV message on Viet Nam and I made a point of flipping from channel to channel. There really was sort of an eerie sameness about the comments of people like Smith and Lawrence Reynolds and Cronkite. So the question I ask you, which you have already referred to when you referred to the Dexter-Fraser tendency—I assume that was what you were talking about there—is there in Canada and especially in the Press Gallery, hierarchy that has a view and by one means or another imposes this view on the working press?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: That really requires a pretty long answer. I mentioned the Dexter-Fraser tendency because it might be invidious to mention the latter day Dexters and Frasers. When I came to Ottawa in 1957—I had followed them fairly closely before I got here—Dexter and Fraser were the big men. They had kind of a semi-official relationship somehow with the Administration, and they weren't the kind of men who somehow produced scoops for inside stories of breaking things; but they tended by their abilities and the platforms they had to be recognized as the men who somehow put forward the gist of what seemed to be the Government or the establishment view of the times. I thought, and still think, that this tends to be a tendency that is noticed in both the Conservative and present Liberal administration. The point I was trying to make here was really not along the line you are going, but it was that governments here like to have a few intelligent journalists—I almost put intelligent in quotes—responsible journalists, with whom they can communicate in sort of a semi-private way. These people will in a sense really put over to the public their influence and will also influence the other people reporting on politics who respect them for their years and their skill.

This is in a sense favourable to the Government. They are really in a sense establishment people and I think if you remember the Diefenbaker years here, there were a couple of people in the press who were tended to be looked upon—I don't mean nastily—as people who had a close relationship to the Prime Minister and the cabinet of the day, so in a way you can really find any trend of Government thinking and intentions through the kind of material that they wrote.

It seems to me that you are unlikely to get away from this. The one assurance I give you is that at least since 1957 and the new administration, these people have never had an inordinate influence, that I can see, upon their colleagues in the Press Gallery, but it seems to me the Government is always trying—or certain people in the Government, usually around the Prime Minister's office and perhaps the Prime Minister himself are usually trying—to seek a rapport, if you want, with this kind of person. That was my reference to the Dexter-Fraser tendency in the Gallery.

Usually, the people who emerge with this kind of role are just like Mr. Dexter and Mr. Fraser—extremely capable writers, extremely well versed in politics and the conditions of the country and the choices you know are usually quite understandable. I say choices—I don't mean to say that there is anything as calculated as a Prime Minister's staff sitting down and saying "Alright, now who is it that we are going to line up to make sure that our side gets well told and our directions get well expressed", but it happens and it is so.

I might also say that I haven't noticed in the Gallery and this is very much a flip opinion—I haven't noticed that there has been any—particularly since the disappearance of the Fraser magic which took place very quickly after 1957—I haven't noticed an inordinate respect amongst the other practitioners in the Press Gallery for these luminaries who seem to be au courant and popular at times.

Senator Everett: I can understand that any government would have a rapport with certain newsmen if for no other reason than to get its story across in the way it wanted to do it. My question referred more to a sinister aspect.

Mr. Douglas Fisher: I think you have to remember that newspaper men in Washington tend to act as brokers in the political process. They are almost the fourth part of the American system and they have, it seems to me, much more power and influence; and also they can perform a much greater service in a sense, to the constituents generally than you can in our more secretive and closed system.

Once for the entertainment of the Canadian managing editors, I took the membership of the Press Gallery—this was around 1962—and classified them according to my hunch as to whether they were Liberals, Conservatives, CCF'ers as it was at the time, or sort of erratic examples on either fringe. It was the Liberal group that tended to be the largest but there was a pretty good split across the way.

The one point that I would want to make here, I have never found and I don't think anybody in the Gallery can make this accusation to me, that in the ordinary relationships around the Gallery, what socializing there may tend to be, I have never heard anyone advancing or trying to force another colleague—colleague within the working sense—to choose whether they be doves or hawks.

Now, if I wanted to select one hawk, he is obvious, he writes for the same paper that I do, Mr. Lubor Zink. I have never seen Lubor trying to extend any kind of an influence as a hawk sort of personally nor have I seen other people trying in a sense to convert him the other way. I don't think this is true. I think if you wanted to define the majority of the people in the Press Gallery, I would think they would define themselves as being probably small—l liberals—that is a pretty hazy and indefinite thing. No, I can't see that policy at all as being parallel here to what you may think you see in Washington.

The Chairman: I would like to ask you a question. I quite appreciate and I made quite clear at the outset that you are not here as a representative of the New Democratic Party but I think it a natural question to ask if you think that the New Democratic Party, all factors considered, is fairly and adequately treated and covered by the press of Canada?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Not badly. It's got a better deal—I have written it so there's no use hanging back. It seems to me that when the New Democratic Party was created with the encouragement and the assistance of the Canadian Labour Congress that this had consequences in terms of the fairness and extension of treatment that it got in the media. I make this point recognizing that the majority of publishers and probably managing editors are not enthusiasts of either the Canadian Labour Congress, the Canadian trade labour movement or the New Democratic Party. It seems to me that that shadow of power that emerged as being behind the New Democratic Party, made it a little bit more respected. So as a consequence the party has had I think fairer, more diverse coverage.

I may be overemphasizing this, because there are a number of other trends taking place that are involved in this. One is, we have had a scrambling time, particularly in Federal politics, with minority government and a diversity of approach. It's quite clear that out in the country we no longer have the traditional safe seats. We have no longer the majority of contests—the simple two-party contests, and I think this explains the fact that the party is getting more coverage and better coverage than it did.

Now, if you wanted me to say from my personal examples—I mentioned the anecdotes about the Thomson newspapers—it's quite noticeable to me that in the 12 years since I first got involved in politics, the Thomson papers have—I don't know whether as a result of instructions or just say a breath of fresh air that took over—been tending to give a fairer coverage to left-wing parties than it did in 1957.

I would say at the present time, I don't think the New Democratic Party has suffered badly from the amount of space that it gets and the fairness of interpretation in the news columns. Of course, you can imagine you would have criticisms of much editorial comment.

The Chairman: You mentioned a few minutes ago, when you were talking to Senator Everett, the Dexter-Fraser type of luminaries and particularly some that tend to identify with the government party. Would it be fairer to say—and I ask that for information because I don't know what the answer is—would the opposition parties, whether it is the Liberals or Conservatives or the New Democratic Party, also have people in the Gallery with whom they tend to liaise to get their point of view across?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Liaise is almost too hard a word for it. I don't know—there is an apathy developed but I would say to a degree, there are Conservatives who operate in the House and the Senate, who know that there are a few members in the Press Gallery who have a bit of a natural sympathy for them. I would say the same thing about the New Democrats, but please don't ask me to identify them.

The Chairman: No, that wasn't my next question. We have received as a committee representations from and we are going to be, I am sure, having representations from labour generally, complaining that labour coverage in the press of Canada is inadequate. Would you care to comment on that?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Well, there is no question about it, it is inadequate. It just isn't thorough and it isn't exhaustive. We have a couple of, I think, good reporters. I think List as a labour reporter—not as an interpreter, but as a labour reporter—is thorough and he obviously has wonderful contacts. I remember a Federal Cabinet Minister swearing up and down that by God, he was going to find out who was feeding List information because his stories were so thorough and accurate. So I went over with him, the only places the stories could have come from and it boiled down to the Deputy Minister and two assistant Deputy Ministers. He said, "Yes, it has to be one of those three but which one?" I left it up to him to find out.

List is a good example. The Star has hired Ed Finn—I think on a permanent basis although I'm not sure—and he is both from within the labour movement and sympathetic to it, and very knowledgeable. The Free Press has a man by the name of Dudley Magnus who I think gives that particular paper—I know a lot of people in labour disagree with some of the interpretation that he gives—but certainly it is a paper that is better served than most in terms of covering and following labour affairs.

In the main, I would just also have to mention Evelyn Dumas who is an outstanding example of someone who is knowledgeable and informed in the field and considering some of the other things she writes, she obviously has a political attitude which is extremely fair.

I would say labour has a bit of a complaint. I think you will find if you talk to labour people that one of the things that disturbs them—this also is in connection with juvenile and other things—that the contravertial part, the strikes, the arguments, the dissension in relation to labour's role, tends to be stressed, to be made the headlines, and not enough time and detail is taken with the reasons for it, the explanations.

Senator Connolly: I would like just to go back to the question again of the Dexter-Fraser axis and ask Mr. Fraser this. I am really thinking farther back than that, even to the Depoe days, where the press, at least elements in the press, not only had very good connections with the seats of power but actually, I would think, had some influence upon the people who were exercising that power. Certainly on the policy. I think this was a high-level type of operation. Do you think that that kind of thing exists today?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: No, not nearly as much. I think, no. I can think of other examples in the past where the rapport was much closer and here I am sort of taking off. There seems to be an attitude on the part of editors. People like Claude Ryan in the French language newspapers still retain a lot of this. I think Mr. Ryan, and he acknowledged this once in a speech that he gave, it seems to me, at York University a couple of years ago, likes to be in contact with what's going on. He likes to have politicians visit him. He likes to talk over the phone with Premiers and Cabinet Ministers, and Prime Ministers as I think do most publishers. I know my publisher, as I remember, the last time I talked with him which was more than a year and a half ago, was delighted because he had an invitation along with some others to visit 24 Sussex Drive. It was quite obvious from the exuberance that he was looking forward to it. This wasn't the kind of regular thing, but it was sort of a special treat. I think probably that is the situation today.

I just haven't been able to distinguish any grave influence on the part of the great editorial writers or powerful publishers in an intimate way with the people in Federal politics and in the seats of power in the last decade. Now, maybe I am just missing it, but I don't see it there in the way that Depoe had his relationship with MacKenzie King or that Dexter had.

Senator Connolly: Or Gordon?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Yes.

Senator Connolly: Because Depoe was close to Gordon as well.

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Yes.

Senator Connolly: Well, would you say that it was a loss to the Cabinet Minister or the Prime Minister concerned or is it a loss to the newspaper people, to the writers?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Well, I think that the importance of the editorial page is diminished. Secondly, the input of expertise of the bureaucracy of the academic world is so much more important. It would be pretty hard to find an editor in Canada today who can do much more in a sense, than interpret his region compare this with the kind of knowledge and expertise that an economist or even a political scientists would bring in terms of theory and trends and so on.

I would imagine that the greatest usefulness that editors and publishers could be to Prime Ministers, for example, is just reporting on trends and feelings in their own areas as they get it. Even here I doubt whether the advice of the editor of the Winnipeg Free Press would be any more valuable than the advice of an experienced taxi driver as he trundles people around from the legislative building there.

Senator Prowse: Maybe less.

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Maybe less. That is your opinion.

Senator McElman: Mr. Fisher, you have commented on the element of fairness in reporting the CLC as well as Canadian labour movement. As one, who many of us regard as having a better than the average chance of becoming the leader of the NDP in your current capacity, do you find any difficulty in your column being quite objective and fair to representatives or philosophies of other parties?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Well, I think you have to understand that I work for two employers in a sense. Mr. Griffiths of Bushnell Television and Mr. John Bassett of the Toronto Telegram.

We have a word-of-mouth contract in each case and the understanding is I say or write what I want to say and they both know what my party politics are. Neither one has ever—Mr. Bassett killed one column I think and I have been writing for a number of years.

If you would like to know what the column was, it was a column interview I had with Mr. Jack Pickersgill back in the early '60's, when Mr. Pickersgill took off on John Diefenbaker and I took it down practically word for word. It was wonderful stuff. I didn't have to write a thing because it just wrote itself. I sent it in and at that time Mr. Bassett decided that that column shouldn't run. The understanding was that he couldn't edit and he couldn't take out any part of anything that I wrote, but he could kill the column.

He apologized to me about that a year later and since then I have only had one thing taken out that I was worked-up about. It had nothing to do with any partisan thing. It had to do about a comment I had about a prominent business figure and I settled that so they would know. That is the point.

With Mr. Griffiths and CJOH, he has sometimes told me, "What is the matter with you? You are not timid and forceful enough in expressing your party prejudices." So I assume this is part of the forum idea. I think this is what Mr. Bassett has been trying to create in the Toronto Telegram—the idea of the forum that would be taken as read, that certain people such as Mr. Ron Haggart and myself, Lubor Zink or even MacKenzie Porter, have certain views that people know and that is what they are worth.

Now, I have talked about this to people like Laurier Lapierre and Gerard Pelletier who as you know wrote a column for a time after he came into politics. There is a problem when you are a politician and a writer as to whether you are pulling punches. There is no question about it—you do have to write about some things and not write about others. Otherwise you can destroy yourself with your colleagues and associates. If you want to see the best expression of violent opinion on this, I think you should contact Mr. John Munro, who when he was a Parliamentary Secretary and I was still in the House of Commons and writing a column, delivered a long speech about this vicious weasel in our midst.

There is a problem here, but my one assumption is that you won't be read and the paper won't carry you and the other assumption is that the television station won't keep using you, if you are biased and your prejudices are expressed so outrageously and meanly that you get peoples' backs up. Particularly on television, I think more than newspapers, the public sense of fairness is very, very close to the service. It is just like a nerve end and it is one media even more than the newspapers where, if you keep hatcheting away, just following an outrageous party line or a determined party line without seeing good or worth in contributions that people in politics and other parties are making, you are dead. You don't exist. But the problem will always be there.

We tend to be fairly timid in this country, compared to Britain, in terms of the people who are active in politics and writing I think Elmore Philpott was an example before I got involved in it. Now we have Senator Nichol and I suppose you have to consider Dalton Camp a politician still. He is writing. Mr. Joe Greene took a try at it. I see a man sitting at the back of the room who took a shot at it, Mr. Frank McGee. I think one of the things we could really welcome is more writing by politicians on a regular basis for the public in the mass media.

One of the dispiriting things, if you want to think about Canadian politics in relation to both American and British politics—although there have been some recent trends that are encouraging, particularly in the book publishing area,—is, if you go into the library, go through the catalogues and try to make up a bibliography of articles written by politicians, you come up with a very, very leagre list. I think the trend to politicians or people in party politics writing regularly for popular exposition and their products being bought by the media is excellent. Of course, I have to think it is excellent I suppose because I am involved in it, but I think it is good.

Senator Connolly: Well, in Britain it has to be done to supplement the inadequate remuneration that a member gets?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Well, that is how I got into it originally. I was going in the hole.

Almost every month I am approached by members of Parliament who want to get into this field and ask me about the prospects. That is always the reason. As a matter of fact I had one approach me last night who I think, obviously from his past, would make a very successful columnist or a regular writer for a newspaper. He said "it looks to me that I am losing three or four thousand dollars a year. I have eaten up my bank account," and he said, "Before I slap another mortgage on my house I have got to find some way of getting more money."

I might also mention and I drew this across here under the topics for questioning that newspapermen I think in many cases are inadequately paid. You have to look at the Gallery and I think the top man there by my estimate makes between forty-five and fifty thousand dollars a year.

Senator Prowse: That is the total?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: That is total. He is operating in a couple of fields. I think there are quite a few down around the bottom—between seven or eight thousand dollars a year which isn't very much considering the responsibility and the intensity of the work. I would say the average income of the people in the Gallery—that the average would be somewhere between eleven and thirteen thousand dollars and most of them earning that really have to dig for it.

Quite often, if they want to get more than that, it means overtime or it means stringing for another paper or doing extra work.

Senator Connolly: May I just follow this up?

The Chairman: Well, Senator McElman, do you have any further questions?

Senator Connolly: Well, it is a supplementary question.

The Chairman: All right, go ahead please.

Senator Connolly: You talk about Members of Parliament writing. I think it might be interesting to hear a word from you about the contrast between Members of Parliament writing and Members of Parliament speaking either on radio or television or even on a public platform. I think writing requires a great deal more skill and a different type of skill and the Member of Parliament I think normally is more readily adaptable to the spoken word than he is to the written word.

Are there Members of Parliament do you think that have the capacity to write in the way the language should be used in an interesting and informative way?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Yes, sure. I wouldn't say there is a great many of them but certainly there are some. There would be more than enough if some of the newspapers would go out and look for them. You mentioned the speaking thing. This is another point I wanted to raise because I am involved in it and I suppose it is a concession in a way. We have a rule about the CBC not paying politicians. They will send you a cheque when you do something for them but then they will tell you that they are not really sure whether you should cash it or not because it may be illegal. Well, I received a number of cheques when I was a Member of Parliament and quite frankly I told Miss LaMarsh when she was a Minister, and the thing blew up in the House, that I had cashed them. But I think it is a small thing that you should look at.

Senator Connolly: I will tell the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Douglas Fisher: No, I told my party colleagues what I was doing just in case the thing suddenly bounced I kept needing a couple of the Ministers privately to see whether they wanted to release this and I almost placed a question on the order paper that would have revealed it. I want to make the point to you that I wrote a scrip for example, for a programme on education for the CBC and the fee was five hundred dollars. I worked very hard at it for a time and then when I got the cheque with the little note saying maybe I better not cash it, well, I just decided right there that it was unfair. I think it is an unfair rule; but you could ask another former MP that has opinions on this and it might be useful if you want to take up this point.

Senator Connolly: Well, the whole question is the Senate and the House of Commons.

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Yes. Well, it is Miss Pauline Jewett. She has some opinions and experiences from the past in relation to this.

Senator Prowse: It is kind of the case where the Lord giveth and the Lord taketh away.

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Exactly.

Senator McElman: As one who has sat in the seat of an MP and also in the Gallery and with your intimate knowledge of what a trial it is for an MP on the remuneration he receives, can you give an opinion on why so many of the press, editors in particular, each time there is a reference to an increase in remuneration, get on their white charger and ridicule the proposition for an increase even though they know what the situation is?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Well, I think it is partly their own low income. A man who is a pretty good hardworking reporter, who makes twelve of fifteen thousand dollars, sees a lot of MP's. As you know there are some good ones and some bad ones and he looks at the bad ones. A member of the Press Gallery just told me a week ago that he was outraged by this move that seems to be on now. You know, there is a lot of work going, ground work being done, to try and do something about the MP's. This particular reporter mentioned to me this particular horrible example of an MP who has been around here for ten or twelve years. For a number of reasons he does very little and he is very rarely here. He thought that this was just disgusting and of course I tend to prefer to think of the many other MP's who work very, very hard and who take their constituency duties and their party duties and their regional responsibilities very seriously. But you always have this.

I would say that much of this antipathy stems from the fact that they are in many ways not adequately paid themselves. Here you have to look at some of the reasons. You have the failure of the Guild to penetrate as widely and as deeply as they might have or could have if we had a more enlightened approach on the part of publishers.

You know Mr. Gilles Purcell retired last week and received accolades from editors and publishers right across the country. And I keep thinking of the way he put back Canadian journalism when he broke the organizational effort in the Canadian press away back in the early '50's. I think that was a crucial move.

There is a great tendency as I see it, and I am being very prejudiced and opinionated here, on the part of a lot of publishers who look at unions almost the way Noranda management has. For a number of reasons they have, in a sense, kept unions out and I think in some ways they pay the consequences. You have a tremendous flow out of reporting into other things. This is another thing I think you should look at. The tremendous turnover there in the Press Gallery is because people are going out to other jobs.

I met a man last night whose writing I admire in one of the Toronto papers. I hadn't seen him before because he hadn't operated out of the Press Gallery. I said, "I haven't seen your copy lately," and he said, "Well, I am working in the Civil Service now in the Department of Communications". So we said, "Why" and he shrugged his shoulders and said, "Why else?"

This money, this income thing is I think very serious. The remuneration is not top-notch from many of the papers. I have the bit on the forces of metropolitanism in the metropolitan areas, where the union is in and has set the pace. In some case, as locally here between the Citizen and the Journal. The Journal always operates right under the umbrella of or parallel to the Guild contract over at the Citizen. That is fine in this kind of a competitive situation, but out in the smaller places, where you haven't got this kind of competition and the Guild is not there, you have a pretty low salary.

Senator MacDonald: How do you account for the fact that the Guild has such a difficulty in many respects? Practically all of these papers have a craft union.

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Well, first of all, a craft union got in very early. If you know the history, they were extremely well organized, they had a militancy and it seems to me that they genuinely were a craft union. The Guild moved into a field that is much looser and which publishers and editors considered much, much more theirs.

Senator MacDonald: Well, the individuals were more individualistically inclined.

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Well, that may be part of it, but I don't know a group of people say working in the Star, the Telegram or the Globe in Toronto who contain a greater amount of individualism. Yet the Guild is in there and the effects of its negotiations and contracts filter out across the country—although it certainly doesn't go very deep into a lot of places.

The other point I want to make to you is that the people in the Gallery, particularly the ones who work for the bigger papers, work extremely hard. Their hours are very long. They are always working under the pressure of the phone call from the home office—the wisdom of the man there at the desk. It is a tough business and I don't think they get nearly the income that they should. This is one of the explanations that I have for the fact that so many of them disappear from here and go into other fields.

Senator MacDonald: Well, if they do, why don't they organize?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Well, here again, I was referring to the Gallery. I should think there is a special intense situation here. I think the pace of the Gallery for many of the reporters from the bigger papers is far more intense than they are likely to get at home in their home offices.

Senator McElman: The reason I raised this matter about the editorial treatment of remuneration—The adversary system extends itself too in Parliament. So do you not think that what Parliamentarians often regard as unfair and perhaps tongue-in-cheek attacks of this type, on the times and remunerations suggested, that this leads to almost an adversary system between Parliament and the Press Gallery and reporters and so on generally, which has a serious effect perhaps on the free flow of information and sets up some of the attitudes as between Government, Parliament and the media that we all complain about and deplore. Is this not a contributing factor?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: I would think so. There is often a quiet desperation on the part of MP's and politicians, and Senators too for that matter, about the way they are treated and the attitude that so many people in the press and the editorial writers take towards them and their work. This is one of the things that concerns me very much, the tremendous drop in MP's prestige and the tendency to revere the senior official and the executive. I don't want you to think by this that I am terribly critical of the changes in structure and the build-up that Mr. Trudeau has made in changing his Cabinet, his party office and his own office. I think it was about time that was beefed up, but what I am worried about is that there isn't going to be a compensating build-up on the Parliamentary side of it to enable Parliamentarians both in committees and through an extension of committee power, but also with more facilities and more resources to, in a sense, compensate for this. I suppose there is a tendency to be more respectful on the part of reporters and editors towards people who exercise power and have sort of a sign behind them—I mean a line of departmental officials and so on—then there is for the individual Member of Parliament or the Members of Parliament in a group, in a committee.

Senator MacDonald: On page 3, where you say you deplore that tendency to downgrade Parliament and further on down the page, in point number 3, you mention that “no institution, especially the newspapers and broadcasting stations, is above the most searching or irreverent or ridiculing criticism.”

Well, you ridicule us and isn't that downgrading in the long run?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Yes, but I think at times the majesty and let us say the majestic nature of some of pronouncements that we get, particularly editorially, need a bit of ridicule but unfortunately there has been this tradition.

I know that I once wanted to make fun—because I disagreed with it—of a column that Mr. Peter Newman wrote in the Toronto Star. I had one hell of a time getting that column in because I had an argument with Mr. MacFarlane, who was then with the Telegram, about the fact that you didn't write about the other guy. You didn't mention him. That is putting it in its most simplest way. The point and the fact of the matter is we have very few forums of criticism of the press that are expressed in the press. I am thinking of the press in particular and one of the people who is sitting here, I suppose reporting on this hearing, Mr. Bain. I had a salutary experience when we went to a political party meeting here in Ottawa to talk about the press and we were just bowled over by the bitterness that came rolling—these were party workers—about the way his paper or my paper or other papers treated the politicians. Their point really was made repeatedly that you people are not above criticism and that there should be more criticism and assessments of the work that you do, that the papers do.

My point is really that we have very little of this in the press.

Senator MacDonald: Well, you mentioned this about the press, but wouldn't the same thing apply to Parliament? If you ridicule Parliament aren't you bound to downgrade Parliament?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Well, it seems to me that the one has been carried too far. I don't think any politician, including myself if I am in politics, is above criticism, needling, satire and ridicule. I think Canadian politicians have been pretty thick skinned; but I think you very rarely hear of a libel suit being initiated by Canadian politicians which it seems to me indicates either their thickness of skin...

Senator MacDonald: I was talking about Parliament as a whole, not of a specific politician, but I was speaking of Parliament as an institution.

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Yes, I would say that ridicule is occasionally useful to let the people within an institution know that it is not behaving well, that their standards are low.

Senator MacDonald: I don't want to belabour the point too much but it seems to me that in many, many cases you read "why doesn't Parliament get down to business and get home and stop doing this talking", and all this type of thing which I would think would have a tendency to downgrade Parliament.

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Yes, I think it does. I have been guilty of this myself. I can remember—I did a piece that led to a few speeches in the Senate about party bagmen in the Senate. It probably went too far in terms of fairness—but what I was trying to do was to highlight what I think maybe we should examine—the role that some Senators play that may not be good for the political process.

The Chairman: Senator McElman, were you through your line of questioning at this point?

Senator McElman: I wanted to ask a couple more questions.

The Chairman: Well, Senator McElman, with your permission, would you allow Senator Everett to ask a few questions? I know he has an appointment, and then we will come back to you.

Senator Everett: I do have several questions, Mr. Fisher, but I will confine myself to one area because of the time limitation, and that is to your reference on page 19 regarding journalist associations. Before I deal with that I would like to say, on page 13 in light of the fact that you may be a candidate in the federal by-election in Selkirk, how much I admire your disdain for your own sense of political survival when you call a Southern Irish Nationalist like Shaun Herron a plummy-voiced Brit.

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Well, I was quite aware of this, but I really don't make that much distinction. He is a Brit in my terms. I would have liked to work in here my dismay at his plan to merge the Liberal and Conservative parties in Western Canada, but I can take that up again on the scene, some day.

Senator Everett: I am sure you will hear from him. These journalist associations seem to me to have two possibilities. One is in reference to the participation that Claude Ryan talked about. He said that in chain ownership the chain should be required to involve the community in an ownership participation up to fifty per cent.

I noticed that the journalist associations seem to require a participation up to thirty-five per cent of the journalists that are involved. I would like you to comment, since I think you are opposed to chains, whether either of these methods would tend to solve the situation of the chain ownership as you see it, and if so, which one would do the better job?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Well, except in French Canada, it seems to me we are a long way away from this. It looks much more possible there. There you have the unity of closely-knit people charged by nationalism and a developing sense of professionalism I suppose, because of the intimacy that has led to the moves that have taken place in Quebec.

The other thing is that in France where I have drawn the example, getting in and out of publishing seems to be so much more easy. Advertising isn't so important. The other great thing you need to launch a successful enterprise is the distribution system which isn't so costly or so difficult to introduce and sustain. So I really have to be fairly pessimistic unless, as I said, we have the kind of philanthropist approach that say created the New York Times.

Suppose Mr. Bell, just as an example, could in his sunset years get a golden vision in a sense, and turn over the opportunity to the people who worked—you know, the writers, and the editors of his papers, an opportunity, almost as a foundation, with a participation of this kind. I think it would be grand. It might be possible with the Toronto Star Foundation to make this kind of a move, because of its particular structure. I don't know. I would tend to think that from our Canadian examples, we can see, that if this kind of thing develops, it almost has to be a form of altruism sparked by one or two wealthy men, rather than it emerging from a conscious man and a co-ordinated effort on the part of journalists themselves. It just seems to me a very long way away from that. And the other thing is...

Senator Everett: Let us deal with the question on a theoretical basis. Let us assume that there were publishers or chain owners or conglomerate owners who were willing to do something like this. Would it be a good thing generally and secondly, which would be better, the staff participation concept or the community participation concept?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: I would say the staff participation concept would be better to my mind because the community participation thing would be—oh, I think it would be just too difficult. Just too many pressures.

Senator Everett: We have had the Guild before us and they have talked about professionalism of the editorial writer or reporters. These journalist associations seem to be—as a matter of fact, they refer to a special professional status for journalists. One of the problems I see with the Guild is that it not only represents reporters but it also represents truck-drivers—anybody with a craft. So it is pretty hard to talk with them about professionalism; and yet they do talk about professionalism. Would we better off with a professional association like this journalist association?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: I would prefer that myself. I am a member of the Guild and of ACTRA. The Guild just organized two small units out at CJOH where I am working. They have not only organized the people in the newsroom—their certification is waiting and I hope they get it naturally—but they have also organized the script assistants. The role of the script assistant is distinct from that of the news writer or the reporter and I think it does make it awkward in terms of developing professionalism.

There is one other group I hope comes before you: that is this fraternity—I always forget their name.

The Chairman: They are coming.

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Well, they will give you some ideas. Now, mind you it is something stemming from the United States and Canadian nationalism, and that almost makes two strikes against them. I don't really know too much about them but that kind of an association—the professional journalist association is very worthwhile.

The Chairman: I might mention that tomorrow night we have the Association of English Media Journalists.

Senator Everett: I don't want to take up any more of your time, but just one last question. By your own rather refreshing admission you are not a properly trained journalist?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: That is right.

Senator Everett: Yet you have gone, I suppose, almost as close to the top in your profession as one can go. Is there a case, where we are talking about professional associations, for some sort of entry qualification or educational qualifications,—self policing by an association such as there is a legal profession, medical profession?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: I wouldn't like to see it in the foreseeable future, but it might emerge. The simple reality is that more and more, the people who are getting the jobs are coming out of the schools of journalism. That seems to be the trend and in the main I think you have to talk to editors and some of the people from those schools to really get an appreciation and it seems to me that this has resulted in some improvements in quality.

I have a hard time defining it, but at the same time I can think of examples of colleagues in the Press Gallery who haven't got much in the way of formal education. They are terrific. They are terrific reporters and also I can think of people, who have had no journalism training but have a good education in the arts or in economics, who are very good. I have thought about this a great deal because I was a librarian and it is one of the most difficult groups of people in which to develop a sense of professionalism. I worked very hard in lobbying and I had a private member's public bill to require that the Librarian of Parliament be a professional. Partly as a result of my lobby, at least I like to hope that, the Government did put in charge of the Library of Parliament a professional librarian. I think the consequences, in terms of the vertical file, the greater services, definite attempts to go out and to be less passive and to offer Members of Parliament and Senators much more in the way or services, was the result of getting somebody with that kind of background, trained in the field. Yet, I am still not absolutely sure that librarianship is a profession in the sense that doctors and lawyers are.

There is a kind of—I hate to use the corny word brotherhood, but a fellow feeling, a fellowship on the part of reporters and editors as a result of the common conditions and the common pressures. That, it seems to me, could be much more developed and nipped and worked out to make—whether it be a profession or craft—a much greater contribution towards higher standards both of the people within the business and higher standards of the products which are produced.

I have to recognize that the ambition to write or the drive to write is a very wide one; it is very widely held. If you have ever taught High School as I have, you discover that around Grade 11 or 12 if you ask young people what they want to be and an enormous number of them—I would say usually the largest single block wants to get into writing, reporting, and journalism of some sort. With the kind of specialization that is appearing now let's suppose a newspaper—and it is a good news service—wants to offer a column on how you take care of your car. Well, I think it would be pretty sensible to start on the basis that what you want to do is find someone who knows a hell of a lot about cars who can write. If you get the combination from someone who is a trained—you might call it a professional journalist—fine; but it would be terrible—I think it would be almost wrong—if that was the limiting factor.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Yves Fortier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Fisher you spoke earlier of the objectivity of members of the Press Gallery in recent years. I wonder if you would go back with me to 1957 when then, as now, you were on the outside looking in. Would you agree that during the great pipeline debate of that year that most gallerymen lost their cool?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: They tended to get committed and take sides. I have seen them do this a couple of times.

Mr. Yves Fortier: What other instances are there that you can remember?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Well, I thought they were taking sides at the time of the Favreau-Rivard period. We went through a series there and I thought they had a tendency to take sides.

In two general election campaigns I think the appeal, the charisma, the personality if you want of first Mr. Diefenbaker and later Mr. Trudeau, just a year and a half ago took over I suppose there was a bit of a herd instinct there. I think very quickly there is an appropriate readjustment.

Mr. Yves Fortier: Without any need for a body such as a press council to rectify it?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: I think a press council might be salutary particularly in reviewing some of the, what you might call, the over-enthusiasm. I also think the press council might be very useful on the issue that emerged during the scandal of the Pearson years and was highlighted by the Prime Minister in his address to the assembled reporters in London last January—about this whole question of privacy of politicians and the rights and expectations there. I think a couple of cases as they happened might be examined.

I have a bit of concern as a politician who has sat in the House about this because maybe it can't stand public examination; but there is a code in the House of Commons and in the Senate as well, that you are living intimately here and you get to know the aberrations, the enthusiasms of your colleagues.

Let's take two examples. There are always in any large group of men, those who drink too much and those who womanize extensively. There is always this kind of thing. I really have worried at the time of the scandal and subsequently, and subsequently perhaps because of the pressures that have been put upon Mr. Trudeau's private life. A tendency for this wall, which I suppose was a wall of silence—it was actually a code of decency, it seems to me—develops among politicians.

Mr. Yves Fortier: To what extent is a public man's private life really private? To what extent should a public man's private life be private?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: I haven't any ready answer to this but it seems to me it should be left completely as private as possible until he becomes or begins to expose or exploit that himself.

Mr. Yves Fortier: Would you agree that the disclosure by Mr. Cardin in the House of the involvement of one Pierre Sevigny with one Gerda Munsinger was a disclosure that was in the public interest? How would that fit into your analysis?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: I thought it was a terrible thing and I regretted that he did it. I just think it was very bad.

Mr. Yves Fortier: Could we apply your reasoning then to the disclosure of Mr. Trudeau's luncheon engagement in London last January? How would you compare the two?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: I didn't like that either, but there is a certain irony in that it was actually—if I could just be descriptive for a minute or two. I happened to be in the lobby of the hotel where most of the Canadian journalists were staying and a number of the Canadian press came in and said, "Well, boys, look at this." It was the first edition of the Daily Mail with a picture of this gorgeous girl with rather gushing suggestion. The question confronted almost everybody there immediately, "What are we going to do about it?" I think to their credit there was a distaste but as one man said to another, "What in hell do we do, it is there, it is out, and Canadians are going to be interested in this and we have to follow it out."

There was an interlude of about 15 or 20 minutes of discussion and then all of a sudden people began to zoom out to phones and taxis and so on. It was a very difficult thing.

Mr. Yves Fortier: Could you define some guidelines for journalists in this context?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Well,...

Mr. Yves Fortier: I think it is most important that there be at least some self-imposed guidelines.

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Well, I don't know. I always like the example of Mr. Diefenbaker squelching the Frank Howard file because he said that was a man's past. It seems to me one should leave a man's past alone unless there is mal-feasance or something like that that has still not been assessed or judged in the courts. Of course, it seems to me that would be fair but otherwise you would leave a man's past alone.

Secondly, you don't write anything on his family—particularly his wife and children—unless you have your information that he has an understanding of what is involved or unless the members of the family have been out in the open associating with him in a political way. It seems to me that those are a couple of things to start with.

Also it seems to me, if a man behaves in a bad tempered way in the House of Commons or in a public place, such as striking a reporter or something of that nature, alright, you have to cover that; but if, as a result of the Christmas party such as the one taking place tonight, a man makes a fool of himself at the Press Gallery dinner—I have seen on occasion people do that—obviously you don't touch that, you don't cover that.

Mr. Yves Fortier: That is not in the public interest to disclose?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: No, that is right.

Mr. Yves Fortier: On another topic, what in your opinion are the components of a good newspaper in Canada?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Blair Fraser and Peter Stursburg for some years did the programme "Looking Through The Papers" which was started here by a producer by the name of Jean Smith about 6 or 7 years ago. It developed into a format and I talked with both of them at length at various times about it. They used to survey the newspapers right across the country. They both said they felt that the must reading—perhaps I am being unfair since Mr. Fraser is dead, but I remember from both of them that they had to read the three Toronto papers, usually the Montreal Star and Le Devoir and perhaps one paper from the west that had southern coverage.

They felt in the main that was it. I would have to put forward any one newspaper. There is no national newspaper; there is no newspaper of record yet in Canada.

Mr. Yves Fortier: Their mandatory reading did not extend as far as the Maritimes?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: I'm sure a lot of mandatory reading for people in politics tends to exclude the French language papers as well. Both those men used to read the maritime papers. They took their job on the programme seriously but they felt in the main this is where the best comment and the major and extensive news coverage existed.

Now, it has been quite clear that the Toronto Star and I think your analysis if you do it will show, tends to cover American affairs a little more than most other Canadian papers. The Montreal Star tends to run more foreign news stories. And then there are specialties. If I wanted to know about shipping and transport, obviously I have to look at the Montreal Gazette and the Montreal Star more than most other papers—or the Vancouver Sun—to keep up with it.

There are specialties according to region and interest but I suppose the ideal paper is the one that has the money of the Toronto Star, the forum idea of the Toronto Telegram and the news services and the ratio of news to advertising that the Globe and Mail has.

Mr. Yves Fortier: That covers all of Toronto.

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Well, you know, there are weekly—

Mr. Yves Fortier: Anyone who wants to buy the three papers has on any given day—

Mr. Douglas Fisher: I recognize that. I said that there is no national newspaper. They are not national newspapers. I am assuming that you want in a sense, the best possible coverage.

Mr. Yves Fortier: That was going to be my next question. The second next question was going to be what are your—as you are fluently bilingual—what are the...

Mr. Douglas Fisher: No, I am not. I can read French but I am certainly not bilingual.

Mr. Yves Fortier: Well, I have heard you described as such, Mr. Fisher. What are the inherent differences—Maybe it was an ill-informed reporter that told me. What are the inherent differences between French-Canadian and English-Canadian journalism in Canada today?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: It is very hard to judge just from the Press Gallery because it seems to me that Federal affairs are covered competently I think, by the people who are here but I think there aren't that many of them. They form a fairly small group and particularly the press. There really aren't that many French-language papers represented in the Gallery. The distinction—well, they have been changing enormously I think, particularly in La Presse. When I first came down here every time I opened it, it seemed to me that every other picture was a cardinal or a bishop or a monsignor of some kind.

Mr. Yves Fortier: You still get one Cardinal—Jean Guy.

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Well, I am sure there are a few but the ratio or the balance has changed. It is quite clear that there is more of what you might call conceptual abstract writing in the French-Canadian papers than I find in most of the English-Canadian papers. They were earlier in the tradition of using the intellectuals and the academics. Although, as you probably have noticed, the big English-language papers are getting into the academic business like gangbusters.

It is getting to the stage—I know one professor in Toronto—I won't mention his name—who told me about eight years ago that he found a great deal of sniping from his colleagues because he had feature articles in the Globe and the CBC had him on almost as a regular. He was just telling me a couple of months ago how the situation has changed. That you almost cannot be a self-respecting professor any more, particularly in the Toronto or Montreal areas, if you haven't got a couple of pieces a year in the daily press. But I make that distinction. The other thing is that you have to look at the Montreal French-language tabloids, it seems to me, as examples of the kind of journalism that we don't have in English-speaking Canada. It tends to be ghoulish, extremely colourful, emotional, mockish, with extraordinary emphasis upon sports, accidents, murders, and so forth.

Secondly,—

Mr. Yves Fortier: And it sells like hot-cakes?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Well, it may. We have Hush and Flash, and so on, but it doesn't seem to me that the circulation is—

Mr. Yves Fortier: That is a very important difference and I have often wondered about the parallel between this emphasis in French-Canada which you also encounter in England. You have that sort of print in England which caters to the British people and you have this sort of press in Quebec which caters to the average French-Canadian.

I am sure there is an interesting study which could be made here.

Mr. Douglas Fisher: In terms of the fact that the English-language press in Canada hasn't really seen much of it.

Mr. Yves Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Well, I think you should talk to Professor Rowat on this. Years ago he went on about this. He went on about the puritan bit and I suppose Porter touches on it—the British charter group the sense of responsibility and decency and so on.

Working for the Telegram and knowing people who work for the Toronto Star, it seems to me that both the Star and the Telegram for the last decade have been trying to get out from under a label of being sensational and concentrating too much on the lurid. Take the Sharon Tate case which you can see being reported now. It is getting coverage but I almost feel that almost every managing editor across the country is trying to weigh the sort of avid interest that probably exists for thousands of inches on that case, because of all its bizarre qualities, against their sense of responsibility that this shouldn't be done. It isn't decent and respectable.

I hope you take a look at the circulations of Hush and Flash and so on and have some idea of their penetration. I think there is another factor you have to consider. The development in the English-language press, if you want to call it that, or the underground press in Canada, has just amazed me. I think of the Lakehead as just a small place of one hundred thousand people and yet there is not one but sometimes two or three underground papers going there, well printed, well turned out and full of all the right four-letter words and the psychedelic design and so on.

This indicates that the press that we have isn't filling a certain need.

Mr. Yves Fortier: It would seem to indicate that there is a need for that sort of journalism in Canada?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Yes. Mind you, I am with the managing editor with the problem. I find, for example, the Georgia Strait and some of these other papers I've seen, very hard to take. You can be fascinated a few times by their scurrilous nature. I think the McGill paper a year or two ago hit wonderful highs in just being scurrilous and with marvelous invectives.

Senator McElman: What do you see as to the future role of the underground? Is it going to continue to exist? Is it going to influence the major dailies to move into some of these areas? I don't mean of the four-letter word type of thing, but some areas that are being covered by the underground press today and largely not covered by the respectable press.

Mr. Douglas Fisher: I would think—I don't see how the dailies can handle much more in the way of diversity than they are doing now. It seems to me that a periodical press of a kind, or a weekly press, is more likely to come along. With the new techniques, young people or old people for that matter can start something and print something very quickly. It is really a playback I suppose back to the days of Milton and that period. Also you saw a lot of it in England in the 18th Century. It opens up a new dimension but it doesn't seem to me that it is one that the daily press can really follow very far. It tends to begin and there is almost a sub-culture there. I don't see how it can have any advertising or revenue base of merit. I don't know whether it is going to creep up and penetrate high enough into the middle class people, that there will be the kind of purchasing audience or general interest in it, but I am too much influenced by the shock I feel.

The Chairman: I would like to terminate the session reasonably soon in fairness to the witness, so would you please, Senators, organize your final questions?

Senator Prowse: One of my first questions would be to follow up on what Senator Everett was asking you about ownership, particularly on the ownership of the chains. Would there be any useful purpose to be served by requiring that chains would have to be owned by public companies with widely dispersed shares—with the same kind of a prohibition against the concentration of holdings in anyone's hands, as we have in the Bank Act?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: First of all, I don't think you should have retroactive legislation. That is, I don't think you should consider recommending legislation that goes back...

Senator Prowse: No, but we are dealing with the closely-held family groups here. We are going to have a problem one of these days.

Mr. Douglas Fisher: I think—and I know there will be strong objections to this, but I like the idea of the public company and the filing of annual reports and the analysis and breakdown. Because of the public responsibility, it seems to me, that papers, television stations and radio stations should be required to do this.

Now, it seems to me, what you need to hear here is a rebuttal or an analysis of this point of view from say the three papers in Toronto where there is a competitive situation.

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Mr. Douglas Fisher: It seems to me they know a hell of a lot about each other so that their protest that this kind of revelation would hurt them competitively, is probably exaggerated but I think they should be heard.

Senator Prowse: What I have in mind is this: going on to professionalism. In our banks, for example, the management of the banks is pretty well in the hands of the professionals.

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Yes.

Senator Prowse: The banking professionals.

Mr. Douglas Fisher: That is one of the things that...

Senator Prowse: This would happen with the chains in the same situation I would think.

Mr. Douglas Fisher: I think you brought out what is behind the point that Porter makes and what I have quoted here. In the odd way publishing has tended to remain familiar and personal. In so many other corporate enterprises it is the managing expert who comes in and the ownership—you know, the weight and bearing in the ownership direction doesn't exist. Now, why has the family thing persisted so long? Well, I think it may be part of the—I suppose there is a certain glamour and so on in holding onto it.

Senator Prowse: Isn't one of the reasons that it is held onto because of the increasing costs of putting out a newspaper; that the person, who already has one, has such a running start. He is not like the contractor who is coming into business. If you are going to start a newspaper you have to start at full speed and you have to start as big as your competitor or you are not going to get going. Isn't this perhaps the biggest factor there?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Well, I recommend that you do a strong analysis of Le Nouveau Journal and what happened there. I have heard that figures as high as five million dollars went down the drain in that enterprise. I don't know how good the product was, but certainly it was attractive in terms of layout and they had a tremendous array of able people. I thought that the enterprise which started in Vancouver—I have forgotten the name of it...

Senator Prowse: The Times?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Yes, the Times.

Here again, from talking to people about both those operations, I understand that one of the great inhibiting factors was the difficulty in getting news services and wire services and something that was reasonable. I don't know.

Senator Prowse: Well, this has been denied pretty well.

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Now, following on from that to the question of professionalism—the question of professionalism with the press. Obviously, everybody seems to think that we are going to get able editorial writers, and by that I mean people working in the news departments, fully armed out of journalistic schools. They think this can't be done.

We usually talk about doctors and lawyers and chartered accountants for example—those are the people that we talk about. But is there a recognition that after a person who has completed his formal education in any one of those accepted professions, he puts in from five to ten years of on-the-job training before he comes to be accepted—except for the odd individual with special talent—before he really becomes accepted as a true professional.

Now, the newspaper business really ought to have no more trouble in being professional than anybody else?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Well, there are two factors which I don't know whether you have considered. Unlike so many other professions there is always a waiting list of people trying to get into it. But then over on the other side there is a waiting list of organizations, companies and governments that are anxious to pluck people out of it. This, it seems to me then, unsettles the thing.

The other thing is the conditions of work. They are often unstable. A new editor comes in and suddenly there is a whole new power situation within a paper.

Here again, I can only go from conversations with editors and managing editors—there is in some of them—particularly the larger papers, there is a developing concern about what you are talking about. They are always talking about the losses that they have. I think if you just look at what has happened to the Globe and Mail in recent years. It must be disheartening; it must be forcing the managerial people there, and in other papers, to accept that there is something seriously wrong with both the training process and the kind of incentive and salary and other things that leads to this.

Senator Prowse: Well, I think this can almost be taken for granted. The final question would be this. Looking at your sixth recommendation:

“That you request the government to adopt an information policy similar to that of Sweden which would place the onus on government to justify secrecy over material whereas all else should be open to the press and the public”.

Now, the thing that I wanted to ask you is this. What kind of steps could we take aside from that recommendation in order to ensure that the material would be available, that they could physically get hold of the information that they wanted. How much trouble do you have in getting material at the present time, getting answers to questions or interviews or other things you require?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Well, I think there are considerable sensitive areas. You have this enormous list of questions—I am talking about political questions on the order paper by M.P.'s and requests for production of papers—and this reflects this. I can think for example that there was a paper tabled just the other day at the request of an M.P.—Frank Howard. Immediately, zoom, to my knowledge there were a dozen reporters down there because this was something relating to both a current and very important interest. Yet, until the process of digging it out on the part of an M.P., has taken place, there was nothing there.

Now, it seems to me that it is that kind of a document and information that shouldn't have any protection other than the fact that it is there and someone has to go and dig it out and ferret it out.

Senator Prowse: Well, ordinarily when there is a question asked on the order paper like that, it is very seldom that the government refuses to produce or to answer it. Is this not correct?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: In the main, as an M.P. and I am sure as a senator, you know that the answers aren't particularly satisfactory. There is a general tendency to stonewall or to give the minimum. My point is why not turn it around? I think Professor Rowat summed up the case beautifully in a number of papers and articles on how so often this kind of wall is unnecessary.

Senator Prowse: Well, what I am trying to get at is the physical problems involved. For example, most of these questions that appear in the order paper are put on for particular reasons which have nothing to do with getting the information.

My experience as an MLA and I imagine yours as an M.P. was that any time that you really wanted information from the department you could go and ask for it.

Mr. Douglas Fisher: No, I never found it that simple.

Senator Prowse: You didn't?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: No. some departments vary as you know. You take D.O.T. under Baldwin—it was like pulling teeth to ever get anything there. He had a beautiful contempt for the ordinary M.P. and that was the situation. Yet Mr. Dave Sim over at National Revenue would invite you in and say “What do you want”. I remember another retired civil servant whom I could mention—Major-General Young of Public Works, who would say, “What do you want to know”, what field is it okay, we will send you over to the director”.

My point is that the attitude of Sim and Young—and I can take these two people because they are retired—that should not only be the general attitude right across the board but it should be recognized as policy.

Senator Prowse: This is what you ought to be doing?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Yes.

Senator Prowse: As a working member...

Mr. Douglas Fisher: May I give you an example?

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Right now, we have a controversy about the electronic workers and the air traffic controllers. Now, a number of reporters listening have gotten in and gotten a fair amount of detail. My point is that Finkleman, Drury and Reisman have always been in the position all the way through that any journalist or reporter, at any time, could have gone down there and gotten the latest report on what was going on except that information which was closed within the privacy of the conciliation board.

Senator Prowse: Agreed by both parties?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Yes.

The Chairman: Mr. Fisher, we don't want to detain you much longer but I have just a couple of questions perhaps we may conclude with.

First of all, you have discussed the various media in your presentation but you have made no comment anywhere on private radio. I know that could open up a series of questions that would take us all afternoon, but I am wondering if you could state—do you listen to private radio?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Oh, a great deal.

The Chairman: What is your opinion of it?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Well, I often think the hotline programs which are in vogue are a great therapy for a certain kind of listener, the housewife and to a degree in a most unsatisfactory way they perform a function as a forum.

I am sometimes appalled at the listenership, the extent of it and the kind of comments that come forward but I think they are very useful.

I don't know what the hell Vancouver would be without Jack Webster and Pat Burns or people like that in terms of giving another dimension to public opinion.

Mr. Yves Fortier: Montreal may have an answer to that question.

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Well, Montreal had for Mr. Pat Burns.

The Chairman: What aside from the open line programs. For example, in Toronto, I think we only have one hot-line program.

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Well, as you know, the radio reporter, it seems to me, has revolutionized coverage and the attitude of politicians on Parliament Hill more than even the television camera has. As you know the microphone has become ubiquitous and now most of the print fellows have to run around with a tape recorder as well.

This has had, in a way, some good consequences for politicians who prefer their face and their voice to be there rather than any way some reporters get it down with his introduction and closing.

It also opens up of course opportunities—which I haven't seen too often—of being unfair because you know what you can do with a tape—sort of a partial selection which can be vicious. But it is also clear what is happening. You can see it with Contemporary News and Standard Radio—the development, in effect, of a kind of national news service supplementary to Broadcast News; providing you have a community with a couple of stations competing, it does give you an added bit of variety. It gives you an added bit of variety of what comes out. I suppose you tend to worry when you have a radio reporter with an august voice such as say, Paul Akehurst—you know at times he sounds like a bishop in an echoing cathedral. It may give an unnecessary weight or value to what he is saying that goes beyond that particular gentleman's style of interpretation. But it seems to me that that is something that you just have to live with.

The Chairman: Another subject just briefly. You were making a speech in July of 1959—July 18th and you referred to the Thomson Newspapers as putting out and I quote you “a daily dose of poison against the CBC”. From your reading of the Thompson papers would that still be a valid observation?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Well, I have been pretty fortunate since I moved out of the Port Arthur ambit where the Thomson papers are. I don't read Thomson papers much any more. I want to say that I have a respect, sort of a personal respect, for Farmer Tisington and Pat Nicholson in what they do here—but I just think the challenge Mr. Nicholson has as a columnist, and Mr. Tisington, as a reporter, in view of the number of outlets, just isn't much.

The Chairman: Rather than the Thomson papers I was more interested that back 10, 12, 15 years ago, you seemed to be preoccupied with people criticizing the CBC.

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Well, I still think in a way there tends to be too much of it. The worst offender it seems to me was always the Winnipeg Free Press which as you know screamed and roared for a generation. I have been reading the Free Press since I was four years old and it seems to me that it has been hip on this broadcasting thing for a great length of time. The reasons for it, it seems to me, are obvious.

The CBC is a competitor for revenue. It represents a kind of, if you want, a socialist enterprise which is alien and disliked by people who publish papers. I would hate to think what it would be like without it. I don't think we have ever really measured the contribution the national news and the public affairs programs have made in knitting the country. It is easy to be critical about it, and lord knows or as anybody in the CBC knows—I enjoy putting the needle in as much as anybody; That has been a national forum a national line and it still seems to me to be pretty important.

The Chairman: My last question. You said, when you were speaking earlier on the invasion of privacy, that we should leave a politician's past alone. If I may refer to your past just very briefly, you made a comment in your introductory statement referring to the literary magazine of which you were editor during your stint at the University of Toronto. People will be interested to know that as well as being editor of the literary magazine you were also a lineman on the Victoria College football team—as I recall, a particularly dirty lineman—but you have always had, Mr. Fisher, to my certain personal knowledge a great interest in sports. You have written a great deal about sports and I can't think of many people who will be coming before these hearings to whom I can put this question.

Would you care to assess the calibre of sports writing in the newspapers across Canada? I know you read them and are interested.

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Well, sports gets more coverage in proportion than any other field, particularly in terms of statistics and topicality. I think the people who are interested in sports don't suffer very much at all. I suppose the gravest weakness is that it tends to develop a relationship that is often sycophancy and is often sort of a mutual scratching of backs and sometimes even closer than that, between the entrepreneur of sports and the person covering and reporting it. I suppose that is the thing to be most concerned about.

You get pretty sickened at the way Scott Young was knocked about by Maple Leaf Gardens and if you remember the work of Andy Lytle—with the dominant professional interest. I think this is something to be concerned about—that the sports page doesn't become in a sense a promotion for the Toronto Maple Leafs and the Montreal Canadiens and so on. There is no question about it, the task force report on sports felt that there was obsession with the professional to the detriment of amateur sports. But the sports writers in a sense haven't answered this. I helped write the task force report on sports so my views are there on this topic.

There tends to be, of course, another aspect of which we haven't really met yet and that is that professional sports is concentrated in the United States—I don't mind acknowledging this since Mr. Pearson acknowledged it—in such a graphic way in the “Mr. Pearson” film. It is unfortunate in that it never got out to a wider audience.

So many of us are interested in American baseball, football, and so to a natural degree—and I think a pretty good case could be made—it is one of the things that is pulling the interest of a lot of the people to the south, but it gets in the way of the east and west lines for greater unity.

The Chairman: Including yourself, you are a great baseball fan?

Mr. Douglas Fisher: Yes. I have to acknowledge that. But in a nutshell—I would say that the level of sports journalism, particularly in the larger papers, is comparable to the levels of political journalism. Neither one is consistently excellent but it is fair.

I suppose the real question is whether in balance there may not be too much on sports and not enough on some of the other issues that we should have.

Education costs us an enormous amount of money, much more than sports and it involves, in a practical way, many more people. There is no comparison between the coverage given sport and education in newspapers, radio, or television.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Fisher, on behalf of the Committee, I certainly want to thank you for a presentation which was both worthwhile and interesting. I think you have covered a great amount of material. We are most grateful to have your recommendations and your brief. They will be an important part of our records. We have kept you much longer than we had intended and we want to thank you for staying as long as you have this morning.

The committee adjourned at 12:25 p.m. until 2:30 p.m. this day.

THE SENATE SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Tuesday, December 16, 1969.

The committee resumed at 2:30 p.m.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, this afternoon we are to receive three briefs from several witnesses. The briefs are from K. C. Irving Ltd., the St. John Telegraph-Journal, and the Fredericton Gleaner.

We will deal first of all with the brief from K. C. Irving Ltd. Then following that presentation and question period, we will have the brief from the Telegraph-Journal. We will have the presentation on behalf of that paper; then a question period.

Finally, at the end of the afternoon, we will receive the brief, comments and questioning as they relate to the Fredericton Gleaner.

We shall proceed to the K. C. Irving brief. Mr. Kenneth Charles Irving is sitting on my immediate right. He is the President of K. C. Irving Ltd. He is accompanied by L. McC. Ritchie who is here as a friend of Mr. Irving in a personal capacity.

Mr. Irving, in compliance with our request, you were kind enough to forward to us a brief in keeping with the guidelines. We received the brief three weeks in advance as requested. It has been circulated to the members of the committee. Presumably it has been read. We shall therefore take it as read.

The procedure this afternoon shall be as follows: I will now allow you a preliminary statement. You may summarize your brief. You may expand upon it, explain it, or indeed, you may talk about anything else you wish to for 15 minutes. Perhaps I can notify you when it is the 10-minute mark.

Following that 15-minute oral presentation, the Senators will be free to question you on the contents of your brief, on things you say this afternoon, and anything else they may wish to ask you.

KENNETH C. IRVING: President,
K. C. Irving, Ltd.

Mr. Irving: Mr. Chairman, Honourable Senators, perhaps I should make one correction; it is Kenneth Colin Irving.

In the terms of reference submitted to K. C. Irving Ltd., in respect to this hearing, it was suggested that I would have the opportunity to summarize the brief, to elaborate orally on the company's brief, and to submit arguments.

You have received the brief from K. C. Irving Ltd. I trust it is self-explanatory. It is not my intention to elaborate extensively or to present any great amount of argument.

Officers of the several media companies, shares of which companies are owned or controlled by K. C. Irving Ltd., will make presentations to this committee.

There is, however, one section of your questionnaire which called for an answer from me. At this point I wish to state that I received a letter marked personal from Senator McElman, dated February 16, 1968, to which he attached a copy of his remarks made in the Senate previous day, February 15, 1968.

My reply, dated February 19, 1968, not designated personal or private, reads as follows:

"February 19, 1968

"The Honourable Charles McElman,
The Senate, Ottawa, Ontario

"Dear Senator McElman:

"This will acknowledge your letter of February 16, the copy of which is attached.

"Your plan is quite clear and your intentions obvious. Yours very truly, K. C. Irving"

As indicated in that letter, I believe Senator McElman was embarking on a definite plan and subsequent events and statements by the Senator have simply added to my original feeling.

However, I did not come here to make accusations. I did not come here of my own volition, but rather at the request of the Chairman of this committee. I have been asked a direct question about pressure groups.

The question is, "Are pressure groups, commercial, political, professional, social or other, a significant problem to the media? How do you deal with them?"

In New Brunswick, we have seen pressure brought to bear on certain sections of the press in the form of direct retaliation by a government leader when he was not supported editorially by a newspaper. Senator McElman is aware that this has taken place. He witnessed it and can confirm what I have to say.

The pressure to which I refer was direct pressure on Brigadier Wardell, Michael Wardell, the publisher of the Fredericton Daily Gleaner and the Atlantic Advocate. It took the form of economic reprisal. Government printing and advertising were taken away from his plant in Fredericton, and that in my mind—and I am sure in the mind of Brigadier Wardell—was an effort to banish him financially.

The pressure was exerted by Premier Robichaud because Brigadier Wardell's publications had supported former Progressive Conservative Premier Hugh John Flemming and former Progressive Conservative Prime Minister Diefenbaker.

I have knowledge of the Premier's determination to cause Brigadier Wardell harm in this manner. What I have said can be confirmed by Senator McElman, who was then Executive Assistant to the Premier. The Premier said he would do everything that he could to destroy Brigadier Wardell.

He failed in his effort, but not because he did not try.

We have seen other forms of political pressure in New Brunswick. Senator McElman has made various statements about the press in New Brunswick. You are familiar with these statements. He called for an investigation of the press of New Brunswick under the Combines Investigation Act. This, of course, he has every right to do, and again you are familiar with his public statements.

You may not be familiar with other statements he has made outside the Senate about CHSJ-TV. He indicated to people in New Brunswick that CHSJ-TV will lose its license.

During the Christmas holiday season last year in Fredericton, he stated at a gathering that this license would be available within a year. He also indicated that he could be of assistance in Ottawa should someone be interested in obtaining the television license.

The Senator made his statement within the hearing of several people. There were witnesses who heard the statement, including of course the person to whom he was speaking. That person does not wish to be involved and I have no desire to name him. But he has assured me he will stand behind his recollection of the event because it is the truth.

I, therefore, hope the Senator will have the good grace to acknowledge that he made the statement. Otherwise it will be his decision that a third party has to be named and perhaps called as a witness.

You have asked whether the pressure groups are a significant problem to the media. Do the statements of Senator McElman constitute political pressure? You, gentlemen, are quite capable of answering that question. To me, the answer is obvious.

There is one other point I should make. In the formal brief submitted to the Special Senate Committee by K. C. Irving Ltd., I outlined my feelings about New Brunswick ownership.

While I believe in New Brunswick ownership, I have never contended nor do I contend now, that it is essential for all English language newspapers to be owned by K. C. Irving Ltd. I believe they should be owned by New Brunswickers or Maritimers. I also believe that newspapers should be judged on their performance, not their ownership.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Irving.

Now, I think we can proceed to questions from the Senators. I think, Mr. Irving, Senator Prowse will be the first Senator to question you.

Senator McElman: Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: Mr. Chairman, before the questioning begins, I think it would be appropriate to make two comments. First, the letter which I directed to Mr. Irving on February 16, 1968 was directed to him out of courtesy and he should feel free to read it into the record.

Secondly, the statements which he attributes to me from some unnamed source with respect to CHSJ-TV, I state categorically are patently false.

The Chairman: Do you wish to comment on that, Mr. Irving?

Mr. Irving: I have nothing further to add to what I have said.

The Chairman: Senator Prowse.

Senator Prowse: A propos of the statement that claims that there has been an attempt to pressure Brigadier Wardell—and perhaps Brigadier Wardell can answer this and perhaps Mr. Irving can—the Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association have a section, a subcommittee which deals with freedom of the press. It is their business to investigate and go into any incursions on freedom of the press by anyone.

Can you tell me whether these complaints have been laid in front of them for action?

Mr. Irving: No; I think...

The Chairman: Do you wish to put that to Mr. Wardell?

We will put that question to Mr. Wardell. I think Mr. Irving would prefer that question be put to Mr. Wardell. I think we will do that after Senator Prowse rather than at this time.

Senator Prowse: Referring to your brief, Mr. Irving, I notice that on page 2...

The Chairman: Just a moment...

Mr. Irving: I have one here now.

I do not know whether I marked that one p or not. I may have.

The Chairman: Senator.

Senator Prowse: In paragraph 7, you say, Page 2:

"I do not participate in the operation of the newspapers or the radio and television stations. I am not consulted and at no time have I interfered, or attempted to interfere, with news or editorial policies."

This is your firm practice; is it?

Mr. Irving: Yes; that is correct.

Senator Prowse: And the statement is as true today as when it was written?

Mr. Irving: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Have you at any time had to interfere at all?

Mr. Irving: Editorial policies or what?

Senator Prowse: Well, I am going to come to that in the next question. With the editorial policies or news or the operation of things.

Mr. Irving: Well, you understand...

Senator Prowse: You say "I do not participate in the operation of the newspapers or the radio and television stations. I am not consulted and at no time have I interfered, or attempted to interfere, with news or editorial policies".

Now the consultation and interference applies only to news and editorial policies; is that it?

Mr. Irving: That is correct. With buildings or machinery or property or investment or whatever it may be, I would be consulted on that.

Senator Prowse: On senior appointments?

Mr. Irving: Oh, yes; yes.

Senator Prowse: So that you look after the businesses...

Mr. Irving: Well, excuse me; just top senior. I have only appointed one man in any of the newspapers I am interested in.

Senator Prowse: Can you tell us at what level he was appointed or what job?

Mr. Irving: He is President of New Brunswick Publishing, Mr. Costello.

Senator Prowse: Oh, yes.

Now, as far as the news and editorial, then following on to paragraph eight, you leave that entirely to the publishers, your publishers?

Mr. Irving: That is correct.

Senator Prowse: Then in 10, you say:

"No salary, remuneration, or expenses in any form have ever been paid to me or any member of my family by any of the newspapers, the radio or television stations."

In 11, "No dividends have been declared by New Brunswick Publishing Company Limited during the twenty-five years which have elapsed since its incorporation."

Those are both statements of fact?

Mr. Irving: Oh, yes.

Senator Prowse: Now, I get a little confused at this point. Would you mind telling me why you would bother to own newspapers, radio and television stations, when you don't participate in the operation of them and you take no money out of them?

Mr. Irving: Well, you understand, the opportunities in New Brunswick are quite limited compared to other parts of Canada.

We have our own problems. We have great difficulty in getting capital into New Brunswick. The chartered banks are our best friends.

So we have to build up our own resources in order to have money to do things when we want to as a rule—to a great extent, not entirely, but to a great extent.

That necessity is the basis possibly for the policies which we have adopted in respect to most of our companies.

Senator Prowse: You purchased a newspaper company; you did not start any one of them.

Mr. Irving: No; that is correct.

Senator Prowse: They were in operation.

Mr. Irving: That is right.

Senator Prowse: I am not trying to get into the business end of it, but I am just wondering why you would bother to purchase a newspaper business when you were not going to make a profit out of it and you were not going to take any real interest in what it was doing.

Mr. Irving: Well, I can understand that it would look a little peculiar to people living in some other parts of Canada, but it is the only way how I know to get along in New Brunswick and in the Maritimes, and to retain control of some part of our activities.

Senator Prowse: The only way you could maintain control of some part of the activity.

Mr. Irving: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Then you, I think, initiated one of the radio stations or television stations. Is this correct, or did you purchase them also?

Mr. Irving: No. The TV I think, came after, yes, after I acquired—after 1944, I believe that is correct; it was quite awhile ago—I acquired the Telegraph-Journal and the New Brunswick Publishing Company in 1944. They had radio at the time, but not television.

That was developed by a company at a later date.

Senator Prowse: I see. In paragraph 12 you state that:

"All profits and cash throw-off resulting from the operation of the newspapers and the radio and television stations controlled by New Brunswick Publishing Company, Limited have been reinvested in New Brunswick endeavours. That is not a policy which generally prevails when the head office and control of a New Brunswick company is located outside the Maritimes."

That would be everything except the Gleaner, would it not? Your interest there is as K. C. Irving, I believe.

Mr. Irving: Yes; The Gleaner has no part of the New Brunswick Publishing Company.

Senator Prowse: But as far as New Brunswick Publishing, that covers all the other publishing and broadcasting?

Mr. Irving: Yes; that is correct, and the television.

Senator Prowse: And they have not declared any dividends, but apparently they have had some profits and some cash—cash throw-off as you put it.

Mr. Irving: Yes; they have cash throw-off. That is correct. They have had borrowing power which they have used.

Senator Prowse: Well, it says here that the cash throw-off, which I take it would involve money they had borrowed. Profits are clear. Cash throw-off would include money that they had borrowed.

Mr. Irving: Yes. Cash throw-off includes earnings after income tax, and depreciation less what moneys were expended during the year on capital expenditure.

Senator Prowse: It would be disposable money at the end of a year, then?

Mr. Irving: That is correct.

Senator Prowse: Available for some other purposes?

Mr. Irving: Yes; pay off indebtedness or investment or something.

Senator Prowse: This is what I am getting at. You say this would be reinvested in New Brunswick endeavours. Would you tell us what those endeavours were?

Mr. Irving: Yes, well, when we acquired—when K. C. Irving Limited acquired shares in the publishing company and the paper was in an old building and so was the radio and television; they have built new properties, both the newspaper in Saint John and the radio and television station, built their new properties.

The papers in Moncton also built new premises. They purchased new machinery, new printing presses and supporting equipment and so forth.

Does that answer your question completely or would you like to know other things?

Senator Prowse: Well, I think perhaps I can make it easier for you, for both of us and everybody listening, too, if I just say, has this money been plowed back into enterprises that are operated by New Brunswick Publishing or has the money gone out into other investments which were then held by them?

The Chairman: Mr. Costello.

Mr. Costello: Mr. Irving may wish to answer this completely and fully, but there is a great deal of private information submitted to the committee on the understanding that it is private and if we wish to open this up, then we would proceed and all would become public knowledge.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Costello, I am prepared to do one of two things. I think Mr. Irving wishes to answer the question. I think he may, if he wishes to answer.

As I have made clear at the outset of most of our hearings and I would certainly make clear today, if there are questions you would prefer to answer in camera, we would be delighted to do that at your request.

Mr. Irving: Well, there are no secrets about what we are doing in a way.

Senator Prowse: I was not trying to uncover secrets.

Mr. Costello: I do not think it is necessary to tell our business.

The Chairman: I take Mr. Costello's point. At the same time, I do not think, in my opinion, the question really was of such specific nature that—I would be interested in what Mr. Irving has to say. Would you rephrase the question?

Senator Prowse: Has the money all gone back into New Brunswick to the publications and the TV and radio stations, the communication media that generated it, or has it gone to acquire interests for New Brunswick in other Quebec properties? Now that is the question.

Mr. Irving: Well, that would take a little bookkeeping to answer your question in detail.

21413—3½

Senator Prowse: I do not need the detail. Maybe you could say yes or no.

The Chairman: If you prefer to answer that question in confidence, you could perhaps send your reply in writing.

Mr. Irving: Yes. It is not that I do not know, but I doubt if anybody else outside of the accountant knows exactly and could answer your question correctly without taking a look at the figures and determining just where did this money go and so forth.

But it is all in New Brunswick, as I said. A lot of it is in buildings and new equipment and one thing and another and so forth. I think perhaps I would like to just tell you what is on my mind, but the whole works, I am not sure.

I think perhaps it would be better not to answer that question at the moment.

The Chairman: Would you send us your answer?

Mr. Irving: Yes; we will do that.

Senator Prowse: That is fine.

Skipping back to Paragraph 8: "I believe the people who direct the newspapers, the radio and television stations, are doing a good job. I have confidence in them."

I would assume that you still have, or they would not be there.

Mr. Irving: That is correct.

Senator Prowse: Then Paragraph nine: "If, however, the newspapers and the radio and television stations were not being operated properly, K. C. Irving, Limited would not shirk nor in any way attempt to evade its responsibility."

Suppose you came to the conclusion that one of the publishers or editors of the papers was not operating properly, what would you do?

Mr. Irving: That gets right back to the President of the company. He is my only contact.

Senator Prowse: You and he at that point would have a conversation?

Mr. Irving: Correct.

Senator Prowse: And you would point out to him what you thought was improper?

Mr. Irving: So far as business management, maybe, but not as far as editorial policy. That is something I do not know anything about.

Senator Prowse: Let us take a hypothetical situation. Suppose that one of your editors—and this has happened to people who owned papers before—suddenly decided that he was going to run a campaign suggesting that they could solve all of New Brunswick's problems by nationalizing a few of the more profitable industries, and he started to use his news columns and editorial columns for the purpose of promoting this kind of activity.

Suppose the publisher, who would have to be agreeable and I am thinking of it at this moment as if he would be directing this. Now would you consider this to be an improper operation?

Mr. Irving: I can think of incidents right now where it may be the lesser of two evils.

The Chairman: Could you explain that answer?

Mr. Irving: I do not want to get too specific.

Senator Prowse: Well, perhaps you could be specific as you have been definite.

Mr. Irving: Well, you asked me; I gave you my answer. I might agree with them. I might very well agree with them. I could not say right here that I would object to his editorial on that basis.

Senator Prowse: Suppose you did feel that this was going to hurt anybody—for him to take this course of action. Suppose it might hurt New Brunswick.

Mr. Irving: Then I would step in.

Senator Prowse: If you thought that any action he was taking would be inimicable to the interests of New Brunswick, you would step in?

Mr. Irving: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Then that power is always there and all of your employees are aware of that power?

Mr. Irving: I would like to step into more than the newspapers, if that was about to happen.

Senator Prowse: Well, unfortunately, we are just dealing with newspapers and radios and TV here today, sir.

Now then, in our research, we got a lot of detail and I find that the K. C. Irving group have interest in the major financial interest in oil refinery, some 3,000 retail outlets for gas, oil, and auto accessories; fuel oil and fuel oil retail distribution; residential propane gas distribution; shipbuilding and repair; a fleet of deep sea vessels; tug boat company; fishing vessels; a major pulp mill saw mills; approximately two million acres of forest land, some in free hold and a little less in forest management licenses, I believe, then with more in Quebec and in the State of Maine; aircraft; plumbing and heating, electrical and industry supporting and building supplies and equipment, manufacturing of light and heavy industrial equipment and machinery.

The point I want to make is that your economic activities, Mr. Irving, must constitute a pretty substantial portion of the total economic activities in that Province.

Mr. Irving: Of the locally owned; yes.

Senator Prowse: The big majority of the locally owned, but I think one of the figures that I had was that you have something like 13,000 employees that you provide work for altogether.

Mr. Irving: I would say that is probably correct.

Senator Prowse: So that anything that hurts New Brunswick is going to, in one way or another, hurt K. C. Irving interests?

Mr. Irving: Yes. Would you repeat that statement?

Senator Prowse: Anything that would hurt New Brunswick in any way, that would depress the level of activity, confidence in New Brunswick, or hurt it in any way, would have an adverse effect on the Irving interests.

Mr. Irving: Yes. That would be a natural assumption.

Senator Prowse: And would the converse also equally be true?

Mr. Irving: Yes.

The Chairman: May I suggest you carry on Senator Prowse?

Senator Prowse: The lights went out for a few minutes.

The Chairman: You asked a question about the converse. Did Mr. Irving answer that?

Senator Prowse: He said yes.

In effect, if anything hurt—it could be because you have your eggs in the one basket—if anything were to happen which was going to, or was going to appear to happen, which was going to hurt the Irving interests, this would be a threat to New Brunswick economy and to New Brunswick?

Mr. Irving: I am not sure of your reasoning. I think we are kind of grasping at straws. We have prosperity in New Brunswick, all kinds of prosperity. That would be a natural conclusion and we are interested in other provinces to a degree, Quebec and the other Atlantic Provinces.

Senator Prowse: All right. We will leave that for now.

Paragraph 13, "It is my firm belief that regional disparities now handicapping New Brunswick would be substantially reduced if a sizeable segment of the industries operating in the area were locally owned. Local owners then would have the right to decide how and where the earnings and cash throw-off resulting from the operations of those industries would be used."

Now, I am interested in that statement because I am wondering why it is that where you own all of the newspapers, that the salaries in the media—to the extent to which you own the media in the neighborhood—the salaries in the media are lower in New Brunswick than they are on the national average.

Mr. Irving: Well, I...

Mr. Costello: I think...

The Chairman: Do you have objection to this?

Mr. Irving: I would think that gets right into the operation of the papers.

The Chairman: Do you want to answer it now or later?

Mr. Irving: Later.

The Chairman: Fine.

Senator Prowse: Have you ever...

Mr. Irving: I am not familiar with the newspapers; Mr. Costello is.

Senator Prowse: Fine. Mr. Irving. Have you ever considered the possibility of a public share offering of your various media to New Brunswickers?

Mr. Irving: Oh, yes.

Senator Prowse: Did you like the idea or not?

Mr. Irving: We just did not see how we could do it successfully.

The Chairman: Senator Bourque.

Senator Bourque: Would you tell us who Mr. Costello is?

The Chairman: Mr. Costello is the Publisher of the Saint John Telegraph-Journal and will be the next witness following Mr. Irving.

Mr. Irving: He is President of New Brunswick Publishing Company.

Senator Prowse: Was your most recent acquisition the Daily Gleaner; when, on what date did you acquire the Gleaner?

Mr. Irving: What do you mean by acquired?

Senator Prowse: Control, complete your arrangements with Brigadier Wardell that you acquired the interests you now have there?

Mr. Irving: I am going to answer your question the only way possible. The date that you are referring to is May 15, 1958, I believe.

Senator Prowse: I do not know what the date is.

Mr. Irving: Yes. Well that is when I made a certain arrangement with Brigadier Wardell.

The Chairman: May 15?

Mr. Irving: 1968; I am sorry; that is correct; 1968.

Senator Prowse: When was there any announcement made by anybody as to when that had happened?

Mr. Irving: I am not too sure, but you understand I might mention this with details—certain things are not complete yet with Brigadier Wardell. I do not think that anything, that I should go out talking about things that have taken place and possibly not completely dealt with.

Senator Prowse: Your transaction is not completed? You do not have the full right to exercise the 51 percent or whatever it is you hold now?

Mr. Irving: I have not exercised any voting rights or anything and—you are asking me to disclose my arrangements with Brigadier Wardell.

Senator Prowse: No, sir; I have not.

Mr. Irving: All right. Please do not ask me that question.

Senator Prowse: What I was asking you was if you are saying that you have not completed your arrangements with him yet.

Mr. Irving: We have completed them, yes, to a point, but now I would prefer not to go beyond that unless I am required to, and I am not trying to mislead you, but I have access...

The Chairman: We will accept that.

Senator Prowse: Mr. Wardell...

The Chairman: Mr. Wardell said he would like to discuss this in due course.

Senator Prowse: That is fine; certainly.

The Chairman: Perhaps, Senator Prowse, I could move on and then return to you. Do you have another question?

Senator Prowse: Yes. The magazine Canadian Dimension in the issue of August, September of 1969, at Page 12, states that one of your companies is a minority shareholder in CKCW-TV, Moncton's only English television outlet. Is that an accurate report?

The Chairman: Would you repeat the quotation again please?

Senator Prowse: It says that one of the Irving Companies is a minority shareholder in CKCW-TV, Moncton's only English television outlet.

Mr. Irving: There are two there now, but at that time, there was, I presume, only one station in Moncton and I am not a shareholder of that station.

Senator Prowse: Do you have any interest or any claim on any part of any of the shares of that station that are held by anybody else?

Mr. Irving: Not on the shares; no. You are getting into perhaps a situation there, but I don't own any of the shares.

Senator Prowse: Do you exercise any control over any of the shares?

Mr. Irving: No.

Senator Prowse: Do you have a financial interest in any part of any interest in the station?

Mr. Irving: Well, no; I have no financial interest in the station.

Senator Prowse: As collateral or otherwise?

Mr. Irving: Well, now, that is a different matter. I don't hold any shares as collateral myself.

Senator Prowse: Does any one of your companies or your sons?

Mr. Irving: My companies do not hold any shares of collateral, but there was an obligation of a party that did own those shares. However, I do not hold those shares as collateral.

Senator Prowse: Thank you.

The Chairman: If you wish to come back, Senator Prowse, I am sure you can. Senator Everett.

Senator Everett: Mr. Irving, according to your brief, if I understand it correctly, New Brunswick Publishing Company, which is 100 percent owned by K. C. Irving Limited, owns the Saint John Times Globe, the Saint John Telegram and the Moncton Publishing Company which, in turn, owns the Moncton Times and the Moncton Transcript and also owns New Brunswick Broadcasting which owns TV stations and radio stations. Is that correct?

Mr. Irving: Well, correct, with the exception of the name of the papers in Saint John.

Senator Everett: Did I misname them?

Mr. Irving: I think so.

Senator Everett: I am sorry. The Telegraph-Journal and the Evening Times Globe. Does New Brunswick Publishing Company own any other companies or control any other companies or hold substantial interests in any other companies or undertakings?

Mr. Irving: That is the N.B. Publishing Company. They may have a real estate company; I am not sure. I think if you ask the President of that company, Mr. Costello when he is on, he could tell you.

Senator Everett: The University Press Company of New Brunswick is owned according to your brief, by K. C. Irving Limited and Brigadier Wardell.

Mr. Irving: And others.

Senator Everett: And others?

Mr. Irving: Yes.

Senator Everett: It in turn publishes the Fredericton Gleaner. Does it have any other undertakings?

Mr. Irving: Yes. It publishes the Advocate, Moncton Magazine, and also has a printing business.

Senator Everett: That would be a job printing?

Mr. Irving: Yes; I think Brigadier Wardell could answer more completely than I can.

Senator Everett: I think you have probably answered them as well as they have to be for this purpose.

It has been suggested in our hearings that this problem of concentration of ownership of the news media could be solved if there was some form of community participation in the ownership—suggestions have been made of up to 50 percent. I gather those suggestions are something of this nature, that the conglomerate or chain would continue to have share control, but would involve the community up to, as I say, 49 percent.

Could I have your views on that, Mr. Irving?

Mr. Irving: Well, you have suggested something that possibly could be quite possible. However, if you lived in New Brunswick and wanted to do certain things down there, you might have very good reasons why that would not be desirable.

Senator Everett: Would you care to give me those reasons?

Mr. Irving: Well, I have had 55 years of schooling on it and these things come sort of to you after a while as second nature and it would take quite a long time to tell you my feelings on these things and experiences that I have had, et cetera.

Senator Everett: I shall not press you on that point since I do not understand...

The Chairman: Senator Everett.

Senator Everett: Since Mr. Irving chooses not to explain...

Mr. Irving: Well, I am not saying that, but it is not as simple as though you are dealing with shares on the stock market: one of these thriving areas where money flows freely and one thing and another. We have more problems down there.

We have to pay a high interest rate when we have no inflation and we have a lot of things. We have great problems.

Senator Everett: Would you think in principle that it might not be a bad idea?

Mr. Irving: Well...

Senator Everett: Let me put it another way. It is not fair for me to try and pin you down because you have enumerated the facts that being in New Brunswick has put you in a peculiar position as a newspaper owner and a man of considerable wealth. Could you tell me whether it is your feeling that chain-owned newspapers and conglomerate-owned newspapers might well better serve the public by allowing some form of community participation?

Mr. Irving: Well, now, I can answer you generally from a business standpoint, and again it depends where you are and what is your pattern of operation and how are you going to remain to live in a certain area, and one thing and another, and so on.

If it gets right down to newspapers, I think you could ask Mr. Costello, but when it comes down to a matter of business, I have developed a pattern and for a very good reason. If I change it, why then I would have to wait to see what the outcome would be or what it would be in some cases, and other cases it would be all right; so why change something that works all right. Leave it alone.

Senator Everett: You are speaking from a financial point of view?

Mr. Irving: I am speaking from a business standpoint; financial and general business and that sort of thing. It is easy to come up with ideas, but oftentimes unless you are sure of yourself, they do not work.

Senator Everett: Mr. Irving, could you tell me whether you would have any objection to the publication of the financial statements of the individual newspaper and radio properties that you have?

Mr. Irving: Oh, I have not any great objection, if it is considered by everyone that it should be. I have never objected to issuing statements. However if there is no reason to issue them, why issue them? But I have never objected to that.

Senator Everett: One might put the case that newspapers, for example, are a public trust and that the public does have a right to see the financial side of the operation of a newspaper.

Mr. Irving: I do not see why newspapers should be singled out. You have many other businesses that are just as much a public trust as a newspaper; perhaps more so—but anyway, just as much as a newspaper.

Senator Everett: Do you think that you have been of service to New Brunswick in any way by buying newspapers, radio stations, by owning this conglomerate of press interest?

Can you make a case that New Brunswick would have been worse off in this regard if you had not stepped in?

Mr. Irving: Oh, maybe somebody better than I would have stepped in—so how could I say that?

Senator Everett: One last question, Mr. Irving. Have you any comments on the estate tax act?

Mr. Irving: I beg your pardon.

Senator Everett: Have you any comments on the estate tax act as it refers to your newspaper interests?

Mr. Irving: Well, who would not have rewritten it if he had had the opportunity?

The Chairman: That is his comment, I think. Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Irving, as I read your brief and listen to you here today, I am driven to ask this question: Do you advocate economic separatism?

The Chairman: Would you like him to explain what he means?

Mr. Irving: No; I think maybe I understand what he means, but that is quite a subject. We know where we lost our money, where it went to, and perhaps where it is still going. It is a little better deal now than we had for 90 years. I do not know whether it is the proper time to consider it or not, but I would certainly consider some changes necessary.

Mr. Fortier: Your favoritism or preference for local ownership, which permeates your brief and, indeed, your presentation today, is it of such a nature that if the occasion arose, you would prefer to step in rather than have a company controlled by people in Toronto or Montreal coming into New Brunswick?

Mr. Irving: Would you mind repeating the question, please?

Mr. Fortier: You say here, for example, Article 14 of your brief, that you have “no objection to the investment of outside capital in any enterprise located in New Brunswick. Such investment is necessary and welcome, but I favour local ownership.”

Mr. Irving: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Now, my question to you, sir, is to what extent do you favour local ownership or how far would you go in order to insure local ownership in New Brunswick?

Mr. Irving: How far would I go or should others go?

Mr. Fortier: How far would you go?

Mr. Irving: How far would I go. I can only go so far, but I am not sure why you should ask that question.

The Chairman: Do you want to phrase the question differently?

Mr. Fortier: Earlier, in answer to questions from Senator Prowse, you acknowledged that you were an industrialist, a businessman, and I presume that when you acquire companies you acquired companies to make money, and indeed, you say it in your brief—that you have never derived any financial advantage, personally, or any member of your family, from the ownership of these media, these companies involved in the media.

Now, I thought I noted a reference, an allusion to the fact that when you purchased papers in New Brunswick, you did this in order to prevent non-New Brunswickers from purchasing the newspaper. Would that be a fair statement?

Mr. Irving: Well, now, I will have to go back to the early part of your question. You said when I purchase companies or start companies, it is for the purpose of making money.

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Irving: I think that is what you said.

Mr. Fortier: That is what I said; yes.

Mr. Irving: Yes; well, I have purchased companies and started companies to create activity, not necessarily to make money. They might never make money but they would create a certain amount of activity. I would have invested the money far better if I had invested it just straight to make money directly in the stock market, perhaps, or something else.

I have invested to create activity and with new money created, why, it is all grist to the mill.

Mr. Fortier: Would you apply that statement to your acquisition of newspapers also in New Brunswick? Did you acquire them in order to create activity?

Mr. Irving: Well, none of the earnings of newspapers, if they have had earnings—sometimes they have and sometimes they have not—same thing applies to the radio, I think, and TV. I would have to look at the records of that, but they have invested, as we said, money in New Brunswick.

Mr. Fortier: Is that your explanation for acquiring newspapers?

I am genuinely curious about your reasons for acquiring newspapers in New Brunswick. I do not think you answered Senator Prowse earlier and he kept his question in abeyance and I would like to return. Why do you acquire newspapers?

Mr. Irving: Well, I think that—why do I. I would have to ask myself the same question.

Mr. Fortier: Someone once said about mountain climbing, because they are there.

Mr. Irving: Perhaps.

The Chairman: Would you like to answer that question?

Mr. Irving: You know, that is pretty hard to answer.

The Chairman: I think it is a fair question.

Mr. Irving: All right, could you say, "Why do you buy something else?" Why do you buy a ship or something else? I suppose there is a very good reason; there is the opportunity of creating earnings and that sort of thing, rounding out your—increasing your activity and in the province and your interest, I would say. But it is not the answer you are looking for; I do not think.

Mr. Fortier: I am looking for any answer, Mr. Irving, any specific answer. I am looking for your answer.

Mr. Irving: Well, you know, it is kind of hard to tell you that.

Mr. Fortier: Well, your acquisition of the Saint John papers goes back 20 or 30 years. Let us go back to the acquisition of the majority interest in the University Press of New Brunswick. Why did you acquire a majority interest at that time?

Mr. Irving: Well, it was for sale and I bought it.

Mr. Fortier: Do you buy anything that is for sale?

Mr. Irving: If it is a reasonable buy and providing I have the money.

Mr. Fortier: When you are dealing, do you treat the acquisition of newspapers any differently than you treat the acquisition of any other commodities?

Mr. Irving: Well, I don't. You have to select your commodities.

Mr. Fortier: Well, I think it is for you to do that.

Mr. Irving: All right. So far as a good commodity itself, I deal with all good commodities and I put the newspaper business in the same category.

Mr. Fortier: Would the fact that the newspaper in New Brunswick could conceivably have been purchased by a non-Maritimer influence your decision to acquire it?

Mr. Irving: Oh, we have seen so many things go out of the area to the Maritimes that I would say I would rather buy it than have it go out; yes.

Mr. Fortier: Now we are back to my original question of economic separatism. Do you consider that by purchasing assets in New Brunswick, such as newspapers in order to prevent them from being purchased by non-New Brunswickers, you are in fact advocating economic separatism in Canada?

Mr. Irving: No; not necessarily, but I would say to a great degree, a greater degree than what exists at the present time.

Mr. Fortier: Senator Everett asked you some questions or established for the record, the concentration of the ownership in your hands of the written and electronic media in New Brunswick.

Do you have any interest, and financial interest in the written or electronic media outside of New Brunswick?

Mr. Irving: Not that I am aware of.

Mr. Fortier: Am I to interpret that answer as I understand it? In other words, if you did, it would be a pure accident and you would not know about it?

Mr. Irving: That is correct.

You may have a little overlapping of provinces, you know, but based in New Brunswick; that is correct.

Mr. Fortier: Would it be in the interest of Canadians generally, Mr. Irving, if in all other provinces of Canada there was a locally controlled corporation with the same concentration of ownership of the media as there is in New Brunswick?

Mr. Irving: Well, now, I think I should leave that to Mr. Costello.

Mr. Fortier: I would rather you answer the question.

The Chairman: I think, Mr. Irving, in fairness, the questions you want to leave Mr. Costello so far I have agreed on. I think on this one, it is a fair question to ask you.

Mr. Irving: Would you mind repeating the question?

The Chairman: Repeat the question, Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: Would it be in the interest of Canadians to have in all other provinces corporations, similar to the one which Mr. K. C. Irving owns and controls in New Brunswick, which would own to the same degree or controlled to the same degree, the mass media, written and electronic?

Mr. Irving: Well, this is Canada, you know, and we are dealing with Canada as a whole. We have about 620,000 people down there, roughly 400,000 of them are English speaking and our papers cover—the combined circulation of all five papers which you are referring to today is only about 102,000. That is not a great amount of circulation in the hands—well, say, if you get right back to the one company such as K. C. Irving Limited.

Mr. Fortier: What amount of circulation and penetration would become too much, Mr. Irving?

Mr. Irving: Oh, you should not confine us in New Brunswick, you know, to being too mousy in size. Let us get off the ground. That is something which is worthwhile talking about.

Mr. Fortier: Would you care to answer my question, how much would be too much?

Mr. Irving: On that, I would not know. I would not know.

The Chairman: May I perhaps put the question another way? Would you be concerned, Mr. Irving, to what extent are you concerned about a concentration of ownership in media field generally? Is it a problem which worries you?

Mr. Irving: No; it does not worry me at all.

The Chairman: Aside from New Brunswick.

Mr. Irving: But if it was all owned in Ontario, I would be very much concerned.

The Chairman: I think that is the point that Mr. Fortier was asking you. If one person owned all of the newspapers in Ontario, you would be concerned?

Mr. Irving: Yes.

The Chairman: That is fine. I think that is it.

Mr. Irving: I am not concerned, but you put a hypothetical question, you see, and so I suppose...

The Chairman: Quite. I think that is the question he was asking you.

Mr. Fortier: If one person controls all of the English newspapers in Ontario, you would be concerned?

Mr. Irving: Not in Ontario.

Mr. Fortier: No?

Mr. Irving: If I lived in Ontario and had head office in Ontario and had all of the newspapers of Canada; isn't that what you are asking?

Mr. Fortier: I must not have expressed myself well. I meant to suggest, there is someone in Toronto, Mr. Irving, who with respect to Ontario is in the same position as you are with respect to New Brunswick and someone in Manitoba who is in the same position in Manitoba as you are in New Brunswick and so on across Canada. Would that be in the public interest?

Mr. Irving: Oh, well...

Mr. Fortier: To have 10 K. C. Irvings?

Mr. Irving: It all depends on individuals and companies and I think you judge by performance.

Mr. Fortier: So it is not inherently—concentration of ownership is not inherently against the public interest?

Mr. Irving: No.

Mr. Fortier: And is there a point where you envisage that it could become against the public interest or is it always a question of administration?

The Chairman: I think the witness answered by saying if one person in Toronto owned all of the newspapers in Canada, he would be concerned, so obviously there is a point, I think.

Mr. Fortier: You envisage the point could arise; this point of, this degree of ownership?

The Chairman: You said that a moment ago.

Mr. Irving: Yes; yes, I did on that one point, but it doesn't take a newspaper...

The Chairman: I do not mean to put words in your mouth, Mr. Irving. I think you did say that.

Mr. Irving: Oh, yes. I did.

I did say if all of the newspapers of Canada were controlled by one person or a company that had its head office in Ontario...

The Chairman: Or New Brunswick.

Mr. Irving: Oh, yes. It would be wonderful.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Irving, if the suggestion was made to you that in the event of an editorial in one of your newspapers in New Brunswick, in the event that this editorial affects, directly or indirectly, a company which K. C. Irving has an interest in, if the suggestion was made to you that disclosure of such an interest should be made, let us say, at the bottom of the editorial page where the editorial appears, would you favour that policy in your newspapers?

Mr. Irving: Excuse me. I missed your question there, but I would like to just correct one thing, that when I said wonderful, it was facetious, a facetious remark.

The Chairman: We understood that. My suggestion of one person in New Brunswick was also facetious.

Would you rephrase your last question, Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: In an editorial in any one of your newspapers, if it affects directly or indirectly a company in which you have an interest, would you favour the suggestion that such interest should be disclosed in the newspaper?

Mr. Irving: I would have no objection. I am talking now not as a newspaper person, but...

Mr. Fortier: As owner.

Mr. Irving: All right, or a business person, but I have nothing to hide. So far as editorials saying that, sure; it would suit me fine if it made sense.

Mr. Fortier: Have you ever considered recommending to your publishers that they adopt that policy?

Mr. Irving: No; I have never considered that and do you know that would be quite an undertaking to police.

Mr. Fortier: That is an understatement.

The Chairman: May I say to the Senators that we do have two newspapers to hear from two publishers this afternoon. While I do not want to terminate this most interesting questioning of Mr. Irving, we particularly appreciate his cooperativeness, I would ask now if we could perhaps terminate the questions.

Would you, before you close your file, Mr. Irving, there may be several more questions. I am saying to the Senators that I would like to proceed with the next publishing company or publisher. Could we see if there are any other questions before you step down now?

Senator Bourque, may I let Mr. Fortier finish?

Senator Bourque: Fine.

The Chairman: Then Senator Bourque, Senator Prowse.

Mr. Fortier: Could you turn to Page 5 of your brief, Paragraph 16? I will read the second sentence of this paragraph: "It is my contention that no individual or company or group of companies should be denied the right to publish a newspaper or a group of newspapers in a free society."

If I substitute the word "own" for the word "publish" in that sentence, would you still endorse it?

Mr. Irving: Company or group of companies should be denied the right to own—no; I would say own and publish, so far as I am concerned. Yes.

Mr. Fortier: You do not publish your newspapers. Mistert Costello, Wardell, and—Moncton, publish your newspapers?

Mr. Irving: Yes; that is correct.

Mr. Fortier: Am I right in saying that we should read as your own statement here, the word "own" rather than publish?

Mr. Irving: Well, I think own or own or publish, and own and publish.

Mr. Fortier: You would make no distinction between the two?

Mr. Irving: That is right.

Senator Bourque: There is one paragraph here on Article 13, Article 14, Page 4, which appears to be very strange to me. I do not quite understand this article 14.

I think Mr. Irving evidently is a man of great wealth with many financial interests in New Brunswick. He must, therefore, be a very influential man in that province. Does Article 14 mean that he is not in favour of outside capital coming into New Brunswick to avoid competition?

Mr. Irving: What is that?

The Chairman: I think the question is are you worried about outside capital coming into New Brunswick because it would be competition?

Mr. Irving: I meant what I wrote here and I said "I have no objection to the investment of outside capital in any enterprise located in New Brunswick. Such investment is necessary and welcome, but I favour local ownership."

Senator Bourque: Well, would not the fact that you have many controlling interests in most of the newspapers in New Brunswick, this might be very helpful in keeping competition away?

Mr. Irving: Now, well, I think you have to—if you do not live in New Brunswick, but if you lived there or in the Maritimes, I think you would know exactly what I am talking about here. We like to have ownership in New Brunswick. We like to have head offices in the Maritimes.

We do not like to see our companies acquired and head offices moved out of that area, that sort of thing. But we need know-how and you have to go abroad for that. We need markets, and by association and that sort of thing, you get markets.

You need capital and by association, you get capital and that sort of thing. So I have no objection whatsoever to people investing in there, but it is great to have local companies to as great an extent as is reasonable, in the province, with their head offices there and personnel.

If we had more such local companies, I think we would be exporting, as I said here in my brief in one place, less of our people each year. A lot of our people are getting that one-way ticket that was advocated for Cape Breton a few years ago.

Now, Canada Manpower, you know, well a lot of people are going out. Tremendous numbers are leaving and what we need is activity there to—and head offices there—hold those people and keep them there. That is what I mean.

Senator Bourque: Thank you.

The Chairman: Senator Prowse.

Senator Prowse: Would we perhaps understand that a little more easily if we were to read "control" for "ownership" where you say that, or do you mean actual ownership as opposed to control in New Brunswick, or are you concerned about the flow of capital?

Mr. Irving: Both. Control directs the future expansion and activities and investment and that sort of thing and then the cash throw-off gives you the necessary money to do certain things and you invest your money at home.

So many people like to see wheels turn and so they establish these things.

Senator Prowse: The other question has to do with—there are two things. One is a suggestion in the Fourth Estate published in Halifax, November 13, 1969. It raises the question that there is "speculation that the Halifax outlet, CHNS, has passed into the hands of New Brunswick press, radio baron, K. C. Irving."

The Chairman: I think that question, in fairness was put by Mr. Fortier. He asked about outside New Brunswick enterprises.

Mr. Irving: That is Mr. Bagnell's; is it?

Senator Prowse: No; it is just the paper; it is the Halifax paper.

Mr. Irving: Oh, I see.

The Chairman: I think the question was put by Mr. Fortier.

Senator Prowse: Was the question also put, it was Mr. Bagnell's suggestion, that you have...

Mr. Irving: I beg your pardon.

Senator Prowse: I was going to ask the question, I did not hear Mr. Fortier ask the question. Perhaps it was not put as directly as this. There also is a suggestion that you now have an interest in the Chronicle Herald.

The Chairman: I think in fairness, the question about outside New Brunswick interests, was put by Mr. Fortier and Mr. Irving said he did not have such interest or that he was 'unaware' was the actual quote.

Senator Prowse: This gives Mr. Irving a chance to publicly state specifically the things that have been said.

The Chairman: Well, I think he stated specifically.

Senator Prowse: I am not trying to badger him.

The Chairman: I know you are not. I am just saying in fairness to Mr. Irving, the question was put by Mr. Fortier and related to all extra-New Brunswick activities.

Senator Prowse: Then I do not want to bother.

The Chairman: Unless, Mr. Irving, you want to add something.

Mr. Irving: Please do not ask me to answer that or all of the other articles that have been published.

The Chairman: I think before you leave, Senator Everett had a further question.

Senator Everett: I just wanted to get part of the philosophy before we question Mr. Irving's publishers. As I understand it, he does not buy newspapers, radio stations or television stations for financial return. He does not believe in community participation in his undertakings. He does not believe that he should have to publish or does not want to publish any financial information regarding his media undertakings.

And he does not believe that it would be possible for the media under his direction and control to disclose to the people of New Brunswick his vast holdings when they are dealing with those holdings.

Mr. Irving: Excuse me, those answers...

The Chairman: I think Senator Everett regards those as answers.

Senator Everett: I think those are answers you gave to questions asked.

Mr. Irving: Deal with them again, the first one. Would you mind asking it, please?

Senator Everett: The first one is that I gathered you don't buy for financial return.

Mr. Irving: I did not say that.

Senator Everett: I say I gather that.

Mr. Irving: Well, that is up to you, Senator, if you form that opinion, but I did not say that.

Senator Everett: What did you say?

Mr. Irving: I did not say anything, I don't think, on that.

The Chairman: Well, I do not want to start the hearing all over again because the information, of course, is on record. I think it is Senator Everett's understanding, Mr. Irving, that you said you do not buy newspapers to make money.

Mr. Irving: Oh, I did not say that. I did not so far up to now. I did not buy them for the purpose of acquiring dividends. I will say that immediately. Dividends are dividends. But I did not say I did not buy them for the purpose of them being profitable.

Senator Everett: No; I did not say that either. I said "financial return". You know, whether you get your return today, tomorrow, or five years from now, why you might be quite satisfied to see it remain where it is.

Mr. Irving: That is quite true.

Senator Everett: If you are interested in return, then I think you say you are interested. If you are not interested in immediate dividends, one can understand. One can say, "I will plow back my earnings into this enterprise and I am prepared to wait 20, 30, 40, 50 years, but I cannot understand why you are hesitant about clear statements."

There is nothing loaded in somebody saying to you, "Mr. Irving, are you interested in financial return on these newspapers that you buy?" That answers the question.

Mr. Irving: Now, you are asking K. C. Irving Limited.

Senator Everett: I am asking you, sir.

Mr. Irving: All right. I am President of K. C. Irving Limited. They have received no dividends. Now, did they then—you tell me, if you will please—receive any financial return? That is K. C. Irving Limited.

Senator Everett: I think that you already have answered that question. If the net value of those assets has increased, they might well have. I am asking whether you are interested in that or whether you, in fact, buy these papers for social reason.

Mr. Irving: A social reason?

Senator Everett: A social reason.

Mr. Irving: Most everything you do has a certain amount of social reason in it, but I bought those papers, very well, to make businesses out of them and what is a business.

Senator Everett: The question is simple. I just say, "Do you buy for financial return?"

Mr. Irving: Nobody has got any financial return yet out of those papers. Is that clear?

Senator Everett: That is right.

Mr. Irving: So K. C. Irving did not buy them for immediate financial return.

Senator Everett: In the form of dividends, we agree on that.

Mr. Irving: Right.

Senator Everett: Right.

Mr. Irving: Now, do you go farther than that?

Senator Everett: Yes; I do because I think it is very germane, before we question your publishers, to know your reason in owning newspapers and television and radio stations, if it is a financial reason or whether there is another reason that we have not been able to probe that has to do with your big, vast holdings in New Brunswick, or your feelings as to how New Brunswick should run.

That is what is important to us in committee. If you say that it is financial return...

Mr. Irving: I believe that the newspaper business and newspapers, if well run, are good business. So I am interested in them from that standpoint, and, too, seeing that good people are in charge.

Senator Everett: So then, we can say that you are interested, albeit it the long range, in the long range financial return?

Mr. Irving: Yes; I am.

Senator Everett: That is all I wanted to know, Mr. Irving.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, on your behalf, I would like to thank Mr. Irving. Mr. Irving, I would suggest, if you possibly can, we would be grateful if you could stay while we are questioning your publishers. It may be there are just questions we referred to Mr. Costello and there may be questions arising when we are speaking to Mr. Costello and Brigadier Wardell which we may wish to refer to you.

I think, Honourable Senators, we will adjourn. We will reconvene at ten minutes past four and we will hear from Mr. Costello.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, we will call the meeting to order, please.

Our second brief this afternoon is a brief submitted by the Saint John Telegraph-Journal. The chief witness is Mr. Ralph Costello, who is the President and Publisher of the Saint John Telegraph-Journal, sitting on my immediate right. The Honourable Senators will recognize Mr. Costello. He is returning to us. He was here the other day in his capacity as President of the Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association.

He is accompanied by Mr. Thomas Crowther, on his immediate right, who is the Vice President and General Manager of the Telegraph-Journal.

On Mr. Crowther's right is Mr. Fred Hazel who is the Managing Editor of the Saint John Telegraph-Journal.

I am sure, Mr. Costello, you are now familiar with our procedure so I do not think I need to go through the usual announcements about briefs, etc. Your briefs have been received, distributed and read. You are now free to make a preliminary 15 minute statement if you wish and following that, we will have a question period.

Mr. Ralph Costello: President and Publisher, Saint John Telegraph-Journal.

Mr. Costello: Mr. Chairman, Honourable Senators, you have received the written submission of the Telegraph-Journal.

Now, under the terms of these public hearings, I propose to summarize our position.

I have conclusions and recommendations. I have been asked to do this in 15 minutes. It is with regret that I must inform you that I have found this impossible.

In the interest of justice—and I do not think that is too strong a word in the existing circumstances—I therefore am requesting the opportunity to give a summary of our position, to present our conclusions and recommendations—and, most important, an opportunity to defend myself and the newspapers I publish.

I do not have to tell you that the Telegraph-Journal and for that matter, the press...

The Chairman: May I interrupt you. You say you cannot do it in 15 minutes' time. How many minutes would you need?

Mr. Costello: I think 20 minutes.

The Chairman: All right; fine.

Mr. Costello: I do not have to tell you that the Telegraph-Journal and for that matter, the press of New Brunswick stands accused. And it is with regret—a regret I am sure the Honourable Senators will share—but it is with regret that I must tell you today I do not feel that I am here as a witness. Last week I appeared in another capacity and certainly as a witness. This week I feel like an accused.

Our newspapers have been accused of many things—direct accusations and thinly veiled accusations by inference or the use of hypothetical questions which have been about as hypothetical as a sledgehammer on the head.

Among other things—and practically on the eve of the opening of these hearings—our newspapers were accused of indecently burying a report on pollution when, in fact, the story had appeared as a prominent part of a full page, Page 1 display in the city where the story originated and where the pollution problem existed.

It has been suggested on several occasions that we have failed in our public responsibility because we have not campaigned editorially against the danger of pollution in New Brunswick.

It has been suggested that "balanced news coverage might suffer in a labour dispute in New Brunswick."

And the Honourable Senator from New Brunswick—Senator McElman—who sits as a member of this committee has publicly pledged to do everything possible to bring about the creation of what he terms an independent press in his home province. The inference is that such a press does not exist.

He has gone farther. He has called not only on the Senate to investigate the press of New Brunswick—as well as the press of all Canada—but he has called for an investigation under the Combines Act and he has suggested to regulatory bodies that consideration be given to directing the owner of the newspaper to divest himself of interests in radio and television.

My references to Senator McElman should not be misinterpreted. I make them without malice and with no ill will—I am not here to argue his right to make these statements—but I do ask the right to state and state fully the case of The Telegraph-Journal.

Let me start by posing a purely hypothetical question.

In a situation of conglomerate ownership where the owner happened to be involved in shipbuilding, and shipping, pulp and paper, transportation, construction, woods operation, bus lines, mining, hardware—to name but a few—would publishers and editors of a newspaper owned by the conglomerate be able to report fairly about their employer's other enterprises?

While this, as I have indicated, is a purely hypothetical case, let us assume that it could happen and that the question is a valid one.

My answer is: "It is hard enough for a newspaper man to do a good job and all those things you cite would make it harder."

That answer may have a familiar ring.

It is the one given earlier in these hearings when a similar question was put by Senator McElman.

I am not able to improve on Mr. Farrel's answer.

It is harder. But that is not to suggest that it cannot be done, that it is not our objective and that we are not achieving our objective.

But it is harder. It is more difficult.

Now, in New Brunswick we have difficulty in publishing newspapers—and holding the public confidence—not because of any interference or direction from the owner, but mostly because of questioning and criticism by people such as Senator McElman.

This in all honesty has a tendency to keep us off balance.

If an Honourable Senator suggests that a newspaper is giving a story a wide berth because of its owner's interests—or that labour might not get a fair shake in a labour dispute—and if the Senator makes the statement often enough, like the relentless drip-drip of the Chinese water treatment, then some people are going to believe him.

But the public—Senator McElman included—is entitled to criticize, so we live with it.

It is harder. It is more difficult.

But Honourable Senators, newspaper publishing is made up of difficulties. We live with them every day. We do not expect to see them go away.

I do not recall a day in the publishing business that has not been difficult.

So, Honourable Senators, what are you searching for in these questions and in this inquiry?

Are you searching for the ideal?

Because if you are, you are in for a disappointment. You are not going to find it on this earth. You certainly will not create it by any form of government legislation or regulation.

I believe you were impressed by the brief submitted by the Windsor Star, by the publisher and his philosophy about newspaper publishing. I know I was.

Here was an independent newspaper and an independent publisher with no interest in radio and television, speaking only for the community interest and the Canadian interest and, incidentally, campaigning against pollution.

An ideal situation? Yes. Or at least close to it.

I happen to believe the Windsor Star is a fine newspaper and that it will become a great one under its present publisher, if it is not a great one already.

But that does not mean that an independent newspaper—with absolutely no other involvement—will always be in a position to do a better job in its own community, or that its publishing principles will be higher or more professional than those of a newspaper owned by a group or even a conglomerate.

You Senators heard the editor of the Windsor Star—a fine and respected editor—say they are so concerned about court cases that they will keep a young person's conviction out of the newspaper if someone shows enough interest in the youth to come to the newspaper and plead his case and promise to take an interest in the youth in the future.

I noted that several Senators nodded approval of this high principle—this act of Christian charity and understanding.

Gentlemen, I could also tell you and convince you, I think, that this very practice could also be described as an act of discrimination—an extension of one of society's great failings, the problem, which I sincerely believe does exist in our country, of one law for the rich and one law for the poor.

Because it is as simple as this—which youth, the son of an affluent family or the boy from the other side of the tracks—is likely to have someone come to the newspaper to plead that the boy's good name not be ruined by publication of a conviction?

I do not make this point, Honourable Senators, to criticize the Windsor Star, but merely to illustrate that even on a newspaper which in many ways appears ideal—a crusading, independent newspaper and an independent publisher—there are problems, there are difficulties and some policies, which in my view, do not stand up well under close scrutiny.

Senator McElman has raised the point of labour coverage in New Brunswick. He has expressed concern that in a labour dispute balanced news coverage might suffer.

Honourable Senators, it has suffered.

There is no need for Senator McElman to speculate on this subject. We have found it very difficult—an experience not uncommon across Canada and indeed in North America—to obtain and report management's position in labour disputes.

And there is no need for Senator McElman—who has identified himself as an avid reader of the Telegraph-Journal—to speculate on how labour disputes might be covered. He has seen coverage of labour disputes.

The most notable example, I expect, was the strike at Irving Refinery. That strike took place in late 1963 and early 1964 and in February a tabulation showed that the newspaper had published 99 reports—two of which originated with the company.

This indicates it is difficult to obtain a balance in reporting labour situations, but I do not think it is exactly the point Senator McElman was attempting to make.

Incidentally, on reflection, in the same circumstances, would we report the strike of 1963 and 1964 now as we did then? I doubt it. I think we would do a better job—a better job for labour and hopefully, a better job for management.

We are six years older and, like many newspapers in Canada, six years better.

I think it is important for this Senate Committee to understand that the Telegraph-Journal is in a period of change. We are not leveling on the scale of the metropolitan newspapers, but we are developing and the newspaper of 10 years ago would hardly be recognized. Certainly it would not be accepted by our readers.

The development of the newspaper is taking place under the present owner but not under his direction. That happens to be my job. There is never a day when I feel that I do it well enough, but if the newspaper does not stand up under public examination, then that is my problem, and my responsibility. Whatever our failures, they do not occur because K. C. Irving Ltd. is the owner.

In fact, any improvement in the Telegraph-Journal in recent years has taken place because the owner said he felt a better newspaper should be produced. He felt New Brunswick was entitled to a better newspaper.

He asked me if I could do it and I said yes. He said go ahead. That was in 1961 and I believe that was the last directive I had from him in connection with the newspaper.

How good are our newspapers?

Well, they do not satisfy Senator McElman—and they certainly do not satisfy me. But they do improve. The newspapers being published today are better than the previous year and one day we may produce a newspaper which will satisfy the public, but I doubt if The Telegraph-Journal will ever satisfy Senator McElman or its present publisher.

In Exhibit No. 1, I am submitting samples of The Telegraph-Journal's editorial page and op-editorial page. These samples will demonstrate, I believe, the type of newspaper which is being produced in New Brunswick. I also am submitting, as Exhibit No. 2, a breakdown of a comparison of editorials appearing in The Telegraph-Journal during the period December 1 to 11 in 1969 and for the same period in 1959. They tell their own story.

I expect someone somewhere is examining or has examined our newspapers and will report to this committee, but I hope the Honourable Senator on this committee will also examine the samples submitted today.

In Exhibit No. 3, there are samples of editorial pages of a few years ago. At the time we suffered from what is known in the trade as an acute case of Afghanism. We are often bold editorially on solving border troubles in Afghanistan and Pakistan, but many a local problem, including pollution, got little more than Nelson's blind eye.

The Telegraph-Journal was not the only newspaper suffering from this ailment. Many newspapers in Canada and the United States were similarly afflicted.

But if we have improved, if we do purport to be a daily newspaper, where is the evidence of our editorial campaigns against pollution of the Saint John River—a subject the Honourable Senators have heard so much about in recent months?

Why has The Telegraph-Journal failed to stop pollution of the Saint John River when newspapers all over North America have been so successful in halting pollution? Or has pollution been stopped everywhere but in New Brunswick?

First let me make one thing clear. The Telegraph-Journal has not campaigned against the Fraser Companies mill at Edmundston, the McCain Plant at Florenceville, the provincial government which built the dam at Mactaquac and the Irving Mill at Saint John. And all have contributed to pollution of the Saint John River.

Secondly, I should make the point that pollution is not confined in North America to the Saint John River, though I believe most Honourable Senators would know that.

So pollution does exist all over North America—and the U.S. Senate has just voted one billion dollars to fight water pollution, while in Canada we are familiar with the steps being taken by the federal government in its fight against pollution.

But does the fact that pollution exists elsewhere excuse The Telegraph-Journal if it has been negligent in campaigning against this international problem? No; The Telegraph-Journal is not to be excused any more than the newspapers and the governments and the people all over North America who waited too long before becoming aware of the great problem which has been created by our shortsightedness.

But neither, in my view, should The Telegraph-Journal be singled out and condemned as a lone criminal when so many others have shared in the crime.

But regardless of whether we stand alone or in the company of others, is there some specific reason why The Telegraph-Journal has not lead a campaign against pollution? Is there some reason, for instance, why we did not see the problem more clearly and report it to the public when the Mactaquac Power Development was being built? Why did we not demand that this multi-million dollar power development be stopped?

A few years ago I think Senator McElman could have given you an answer to that question. At that time he was widely acknowledged to be one of the most powerful and influential men in the province as Premier Robichaud's executive assistant. At that time he thought as a New Brunswicker.

I may have missed something along the line, but there is no public evidence to my knowledge that Senator McElman had this great concern about pollution when he was active in New Brunswick as the premier's right hand man.

I therefore have no way of knowing what he thought at that time, but I suspect he thought as a New Brunswicker and that he and many others were so concerned with finding industry that the dangers of pollution were ignored.

And possibly this has been a subconscious influence on The Telegraph-Journal as well. But if we have failed, we have plenty of company. The whole North American continent is plagued with pollution.

That is not an excuse for any failure on our part.

It is a bit of public soul baring.

This answer may not satisfy you, but it should be understood by Senator McElman who knows that until very recently New Brunswick would all but sell its soul for a new industry.

Honourable Senators, I have several recommendations to place before this committee.

1. That this Special Senate Committee on the Mass Media take no action which would encourage the government of Canada to have any direct involvement in the creation of a Press Council.

2. That this Special Senate Committee on the Mass Media recognize that there are its natural course. If a Windsor experiment is Star, which strongly favour a Press Council and undoubtedly will proceed on their own, and that any such program be allowed to take its natural course. If Windsor experiment is successful newspapers will be hard pressed to ignore it.

If it is not as successful as some publishers believe it will be, then it should be permitted to gracefully die a natural death, at which time the report of its demise could be given an indecent burial on Page 27 of the farm edition.

3. That this Special Committee on the Mass Media recognize it is in an excellent position to test the Press Council theory by performing just as a Press Council would do—by reporting the strengths, weaknesses and failures, if any, of the press of Canada to the people of Canada.

By doing this—and no more—you will give everyone an opportunity to determine the potential value of a Press Council. If the Press of Canada has sinned and is exposed, will it correct its sins? In other words, will the Press Council concept work in Canada?

4. That Senator McElman withdraw completely from this committee. I make this recommendation in our mutual interest and again I stress it is made without ill will.

I believe this committee is handicapped by his presence. I look on him as an accuser and a prosecutor, and I do not suggest that he should be anything else, or anything less. But the validity of these hearings surely is open to question if our accuser and prosecutor is also to sit in judgment.

Honourable Senators, surely it is recognized that Senator McElman does sit as a prosecutor, day-by-day building his case, quietly and meticulously making his subtle points—ar expert in the use of the Chinese water torture treatment.

In a letter which appeared in The Daily Gleaner of Fredericton on October 23, 1969, over the signature of Senator McElman, the Honourable Senator wrote:

"I intend to continue my efforts against pollution and to achieve an independent press in New Brunswick."

We know that Senator McElman does not consider that the press of New Brunswick is independent as it now exists—and a month in advance of the opening of these hearings, he clearly defined his position. It was not to hear evidence and then give judgment. His mind was made up about the press and he would continue his efforts even while sitting as a member of this committee.

Mr. Chairman and Honourable Senators, to me, such a situation is intolerable. The question I put, Mr. Chairman, is: Will the Honourable Senator from New Brunswick withdraw in the overall interest of this committee so that it will not be impaired—either in fact or in public opinion—in the service it is attempting to perform for the press of Canada and the people of Canada?

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Costello.

In view of the fact that your statement ran some five minutes longer than is prescribed in the guidelines, I am sure you will allow me just 30 seconds to reply to one aspect of your comments. That is to say that personally, and I know I speak for all the members of the committee, I very much regret that you feel that you are being persecuted or that you feel accused.

I can only assure you, as I have on several occasions, that certainly this is just simply not the case. No one is on trial here—not Mr. Irving, not you, Mr. Costello, and indeed not Senator McElman.

He is one member of a 15-man committee. I think the committee is graced by his presence. He is a valuable member of the committee.

While we appreciate your recommendation, and we will again re-examine it because you have made it here today, I must say that this is a matter which, of course, has been considered because it has been brought to our attention before in your editorial comment in your newspaper.

We are aware of your opinion and I can only reassert and underline and stress that no one is on trial, not you, Mr. Costello, not Mr.

Irving, but I must add in fairness, not Senator McElman.

Therefore, having said that, I think we will proceed to the questioning. I think Senator Prowse is first.

Senator Prowse: I gathered from your statement, Mr. Costello, Senator McElman actually is doing you a great favour by helping you to do a better job.

Mr. Costello: Well, I think that I will be very unhappy if the press of Canada does not benefit from the hearings and if we all do not do a better job. Frankly, I think we could do a better—I think we could do better without the help of Senator McElman. However, perhaps he is really a friend in disguise.

Senator Prowse: It sometimes happens. One question I wanted to ask, a hang-over from the other, it looked like you took a personal interest in the answer.

That was, did you receive a complaint from Brigadier Wardell regarding the pressure that Mr. Irving referred to had been put on Brigadier Wardell by the Provincial Government?

Mr. Costello: No. There was no such complaint. This is something going back a number of years. You are talking about CDNPA. There was no such complaint to my knowledge. I do not think this would be the normal course of events.

I think that an individual newspaper would fight endure this situation in its own circumstance. I do not think that it would normally go to CDNPA.

Of course, it would have an opportunity, but I do not think that it would be brought. It is very rare that a newspaper feels persecuted.

Senator Prowse: As a matter of fact, it is not at all unusual anywhere in Canada, when governments change, for printing contracts, to move from one plant to another; is it?

Mr. Costello: I am not involved in that aspect of that.

Senator Prowse: The other question was brought up by Paragraph 13 in Mr. Irving's brief, about salary. The general effect is that the—our research figures indicated that the general median average was some 25 percent lower.

Mr. Costello: Yes. I would be familiar with the research figures and these figures were submitted as part of confidential financial material. If it is the wish of this Committee, Senate Committee, we will be pleased to discuss fully our internal financial operations, exactly how we do things with the committee, but I would be most reluctant.

The Chairman: You would like to do it in camera; is that right?

Mr. Costello: Yes, of course.

Senator Prowse: That is fine.

You told us that it makes it more difficult for you to do a job ... being a member of a conglomerate group. What benefits accrue to the operation of the papers as the result, and to the readers of the papers, as the result of this group ownership, in your own experience? Let us not deal with theory.

Mr. Costello: I think in Canada, there have been great benefits in certain newspapers. I do not think that we frankly have experienced the benefits of any type of mutual cooperation. There still is a competitive situation in New Brunswick and we have operated.

There may be some minor benefits of exchange of knowledge, but there are no great financial benefits.

Senator Prowse: Although there is in effect, control of the company, you are still fighting individual platoons of individual fighters?

Mr. Costello: That is right.

Senator Prowse: So there have been no benefits that are obvious?

Mr. Costello: No.

Senator Prowse: You do not have a common...

Mr. Costello: Purchasing power and things of that nature?

Senator Prowse: No; or stringers in Ottawa or things like that?

Mr. Costello: No.

Senator Prowse: What is your objection to a Press Council?

Mr. Costello: What is my personal objection? I do not have a personal one. I think perhaps my greatest objections at this moment are that I do not think it would work.

Senator Prowse: You mean on a national basis?

Mr. Costello: I do not think it would work on a national basis and I think it would have much less success on a committee or provincial basis, in some areas.

I think it will work in Windsor. I think the people in Windsor would want it and I think the newspaper wants it and I think this is going to work. It may or may not accomplish very much, but I think this is something they are going to have.

I do not see it working in New Brunswick. I do not see it working in Nova Scotia papers. Perhaps a Nova Scotia paper would like to have it; I do not know.

Senator Prowse: Would you feel that—and this is a hypothetical question because I do not want to—

Mr. Costello: It is the kind that we get.

Senator Prowse: But suppose that, I gather that if we were...

The Chairman: Do you find hypothetical questions unacceptable?

Mr. Costello: Not a bit.

The Chairman: Carry on, senator Prowse.

Mr. Costello: They are more difficult to answer.

Senator Prowse: This is not going to be that tough. If the Senate were to initiate in the Senate, legislation to establish Press Council, would you object to that? You would, would you not, as a matter of principle?

Mr. Costello: Yes; I think so. I am also, trying to keep an open mind such as the Windsor situation.

Senator Prowse: What I was doing was this: Would you feel, at all, any objection in the report, the committee happened to come to the conclusion that it would be advantageous for the press if they were to set up their own Press Council, would you feel that that kind of an item in a report would be any kind of infringement?

Mr. Costello: No.

Senator Prowse: Because I gathered from one or two things that you might object ever to that.

How bad have postal rates hurt you?

Mr. Costello: Well...

Senator Prowse: In your circulation.

Mr. Costello: In our circulation, I believe we are down about 800, out of a round figure of 12,000. The postal rates remove the daily newspaper from a great many homes in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

Senator Prowse: If we wanted to suggest some kind of subsidy to make it easier to get wider circulation so that overlapping could occur with papers, which in your opinion would be preferable—lower postal rates or direct subsidy to the papers?

Mr. Costello: I would not favour any type of subsidy and if you are suggesting to me that the postal rates were in fact a subsidy to the newspaper, it has always been my opinion and I presume I must be wrong, that this was a subsidy to the reader in the rural area who could not afford a newspaper. This is the position which I have taken, the basis of it being that we have never made any money on those, on that circulation, so if it was a subsidy, it was not to our benefit.

Senator Prowse: I did not make clear what I am doing. I am thinking in terms of interest of the public and not the interests of the papers, at this point. But I am saying that if you, as the person who would be the immediate beneficiary, would you think it would be more generally satisfactory to have an indirect subsidy in the way of lower and easier postal rates to facilitate delivery to the customer, or a straight cash subsidy to the paper based on the number of outlying customers they had?

Mr. Costello: If either one were going to take place, the subsidy should be not—the subsidy should be to the direct benefit of the rural reader, if it is a subsidy.

Senator Prowse: Are you sure which way it would be better? You did not answer my question. It would be for the benefit of the reader, but...

Mr. Costello: We do not want the money in our newspaper, a subsidy.

Senator Prowse: But you would accept a lower rate? Because then it would be for everybody.

Mr. Costello: Well, we objected to the increase.

Senator Prowse: How do you handle dissent in your paper?

Mr. Costello: Very prominently. We—sometimes—when Senator McElman writes to us, we handle it on the front page and sometimes the major page 5, which is the opp-editorial page.

He is not the only one who disagrees with us, but we value dissent very much.

Senator Prowse: This is a problem with a great many papers in Canada. Is there any way there could be set up some regular page of dissent or something like that?

Mr. Costello: A good number of newspapers have done this. It may not go to the extent of a regular page, but there are newspapers which have certain philosophies and some which may even give token support or editorial support to one party or one political form of thinking, but will encourage people of other parties. We now have columnists writing in the strangest places and I think there has been a great advance in Canada in that area.

Senator Prowse: I think, Mr. Chairman, those are all my questions.

The Chairman: Senator Everett.

Senator Everett: Mr. Costello, am I correct in saying you are president of New Brunswick Publishing Company?

Mr. Costello: That is correct.

Senator Everett: And you are Publisher of the Saint John Evening Times Globe and the Saint John Telegraph-Journal?

Mr. Costello: Correct.

Senator Everett: Are you also the President of Moncton Publishing?

Mr. Costello: No; the New Brunswick Publishing Company is the owner.

Senator Everett: I realize that.

Mr. Costello: No; I am not President. I am Chairman of the Board.

Senator Everett: Chairman of the Board. Are you the publisher of the two Moncton papers that are owned by the Moncton Publishing Company?

Mr. Costello: No.

Senator Everett: Are you involved with New Brunswick Broadcasting as either Chairman or President?

Mr. Costello: Yes; I am, as President.

Senator Everett: You are President?

Mr. Costello: Correct.

Senator Everett: I gather that the Evening Times Globe is an evening paper and the Telegraph-Journal is a morning paper in the same city; is that correct?

Mr. Costello: Correct.

Senator Everett: Could you tell me if there is a separate advertising rate? Let us talk about retail advertising for a moment. Is there a separate retail advertising rate for each paper?

Mr. Costello: Yes; yes; there is.

Senator Everett: Could you tell me what that rate is?

Mr. Costello: Well, we can give you—I think we can give you the rate cards or Mr. Crowther might read off the rates.

The Chairman: I think we have the rates. I think it is adequate for him to read them in answer to the question.

Mr. Thomas Crowther, Vice president, General Manager, The Telegraph-Journal: Transient, it would be the evening paper, would be 15.3 cents a line and the transient rate for the Telegraph-Journal is 9.28 cents a line.

Senator Everett: What lineage is that?

Mr. Crowther: That is transient. In other words, a casual advertiser coming in.

Senator Everett: What is your minimum contract?

Mr. Crowther: The minimum contract, we go down in the evening papers, down to 9.5 cents per agate line which is the lowest contract. It is the highest contract but the lowest rate.

Senator Everett: What is the annual lineage it gives to 7.5 cents rate?

Mr. Crowther: The average lineage would be a million lines.

Senator Everett: Let us take 25,000 lines. Is there a 25,000 line contract?

Mr. Crowther: Well, you see, Senator, we have two classes of rates. We have a frequency rate which is based on three insertions per week.

Senator Everett: No; I am talking about contract.

Mr. Crowther: Yes; well, these are contracts.

Senator Everett: All right. I am talking a lineage contract, not the frequency.

Mr. Crowther: All right. If you want to talk about bulk, you are talking 25,000 lines, because I should tell you that we have two classes of rates for retail. We have frequency rates and we have bulk rates.

Senator Everett: Then I am talking bulk rates.

Mr. Crowther: You are talking bulk rates. I should point out that that low rate that I gave you is for frequency rates. That is a frequency. But the bulk, if you are talking 25,000 lines, the rates would be 12.8 cents per x lines in the evening papers.

Senator Everett: In the Evening Times and what would the same bulk contract be in the Telegraph-Journal?

Mr. Crowther: We do have that same bulk contract in the Telegraph-Journal; I should say we do not have that same contract in the Telegraph-Journal. There is a contract in the Telegraph-Journal which calls for the use of 60 inches per month in the Telegraph-Journal by a local retailer and that rate is a dollar per column inch.

Senator Everett: You have no agate lines in retail?

Mr. Crowther: In retail you mainly talk inch rates because this is what the retailer understands. When you are talking to national, you talk line rates because this is what national advertisers understand. I have given you in the majority the line rates.

Senator Everett: Let us talk inch rates then, if you want to.

Mr. Crowther: It doesn't matter.

Senator Everett: Do you have an inch rate for the Evening Times Globe?

Mr. Crowther: Yes; we have. The transient is $2.15.

Senator Everett: I am talking for 25,000.

Mr. Crowther: You are talking 25,000 lines. On 25,000, the inch rate is $1.80 per column inch.

Senator Everett: Is there a comparable 25,000 rate in the other papers?

Mr. Crowther: No, sir; there is not.

There is one contract available in the Telegraph-Journal.

Senator Everett: Just one?

Mr. Crowther: One, and that calls for the use of 60 inches per month and that rate is six dollars per column inch.

Senator Everett: I see.

60 inches per month would be 840 agate lines?

Mr. Crowther: About 830, 840.

Senator Everett: And what would 840 lines be roughly, 10,000 agate lines a year?

Mr. Crowther: Yes.

Senator Everett: What is the 10,000 rate then in the other papers?

Mr. Crowther: Well, we have a rate at 8400 lines and that is $1.90. Then we have a rate at 16,000 lines and that is $1.85.

I believe you have all these rates.

Senator Everett: No doubt we have now. Is there a combined rate if the advertiser goes to you and wants to advertise in both papers?

Mr. Crowther: Are you talking retail or national?

Senator Everett: Retail. I think I have been talking retail all along.

Mr. Crowther: Yes, you used the terminology combined.

Senator Everett: By combined I meant advertising in both papers.

Mr. Crowther: We have on the Telegraph-Journal a lift rate. Now if an advertiser places an ad in the evening paper, he would pay his contract rate that applies to the evening paper. If he lifts that ad to the Telegraph-Journal, he will pay 91 cents per column inch. In other words, this is nine cents under the contract rate.

Senator Everett: Nine cents less?

Mr. Crowther: Right.

Senator Everett: That seems very fair.

Mr. Crowther: I would think so. We never have had any complaints.

Senator Everett: No.

Could you tell me what depreciation, Mr. Costello, rate you apply to your equipment in the New Brunswick Publishing Company?

Mr. Costello: It is probably in the figures.

Mr. Crowther: Well, the depreciation rate, for example, on the building came under that classification. I do not know, but it would be the existing depreciation right out of the set up by the government.

Senator Everett: Would you use full rates allowable by the tax department?

Mr. Crowther: Yes; yes we would.

Senator Everett: Do you know what that rate is?

Mr. Costello: I have not got it.

Mr. Crowther: I have not got it. I could get it.

Senator Everett: I am sure your answer is in your replies.

Mr. Crowther: Whatever the government allows in a separate rate. We apply whatever rate is applicable under the government regulations.

Senator Everett: Just one last—maybe two last questions. Are you in job printing?

Mr. Crowther: No; we are not.

Senator Everett: Is New Brunswick Publishing? Are we talking about the same company here?

Mr. Costello: Yes.

Senator Everett: They are not in the job printing business?

Mr. Costello: No.

Senator Everett: This is probably impossible to answer, but I would just be interested to know, what is the life of press equipment on the average?

Mr. Costello: The major press?

Senator Everett: Yes.

Mr. Costello: Well, it is impossible to answer, but we have—

Mr. Crowther: 20, 30, 40 years.

Senator Prowse: 50?

Mr. Costello: It used to be 50.

Senator Everett: There is one question I overlooked when we were dealing with rates. Could you tell me what your classified rate would be?

Mr. Tom Crowther: Yes. Well, offhand it is four cents per word. It is four cents per word for the regular classified.

Senator Everett: What about a contract rate?

Mr. Crowther: We do not have contract rates. On straight classified, we have four cents a word for the one or two day insertion. We drop to three-and-a-half cents per word for three days, four days or five days. If it goes six days, it goes to three cents a word.

Senator Everett: That is casual insertion?

Mr. Crowther: Yes.

Senator Everett: What about someone advertising consistently?

Mr. Crowther: We do not have—this same rate applies and we do not have contracts for year around advertisers as such.

Senator Everett: What would your average income on a frequency basis be per agate line?

Mr. Crowther: I think that is a little difficult because you see, first of all, your straight classified operates per word charged.

Senator Everett: That is right, per so many words per line.

Mr. Crowther: Yes; but again, it is not something that we set up this way. We set it up on the basis of words and that is the way it operates. I can give you the lineage, if you want, of our classified, in lines, our total lineage, but I do not have it here.

I can give it to you, but I do not have here the breakdown between straight classified and classified display.

Senator Everett: No; that is all right. We are talking roughly $1.90 on retail rate?

Mr. Crowther: Right.

Senator Everett: On the contract we supposed, what would the national rate be, or do you just have one rate?

Mr. Crowther: This is on display?

Senator Everett: That is right.

Mr. Crowther: On national, it is 29 cents per agate line.

Senator Everett: 29 cents per agate line?

Mr. Crowther: That is right.

Senator Everett: What did we say the per agate line charge was in retail on that contract?

Mr. Crowther: On the contract, we were talking—and I think we were talking 25,000; were we not?

Senator Everett: I think so; yes.

Mr. Crowther: On 25,000, the rate in the evening paper would be 12.8 and you have to include the morning paper, and the morning paper would be a transient—well, let me give it to you in inches; is that all right?

On 25,000 you will be paying $1.80 in the Times, and if the ad was going in the morning paper, you would be paying the lift rate of 91 cents per column inch. Therefore, you would gross at $2.70.

Senator Everett: Just under 20 cents a line?

Mr. Crowther: Yes.

Senator Everett: Against 29 cents.

Mr. Crowther: Right.

Senator Everett: Your national rate requires that the national advertiser then, I gather, advertise in both papers?

Mr. Crowther: Well, I think you should also understand, Senator, that our newspaper gross, the gross of 52,000 circulation, there is a minimum of duplication in our circulation.

Mr. Costello: Right.

Mr. Crowther: And, therefore, we offer the advertiser, the national advertiser, 100 percent coverage in Saint John, which is the largest market in New Brunswick, plus effective coverage in all 15 counties of the province.

Mr. Costello: We must not be defensive.

Mr. Crowther: I already have said—I am just giving the facts.

Senator Everett: I have already said that your lift rate of 91 cents is very reasonable, but I am asking you a question. Is the national advertiser required to advertise in both papers?

Mr. Crowther: That rate that is quoted includes an insertion.

Senator Everett: Thank you very much.

The Chairman: Mr. Costello, does the Telegraph-Journal, in your opinion, have a public responsibility beyond the ordinary business enterprise?

Mr. Costello: Yes.

The Chairman: How would you define that public responsibility?

Mr. Costello: There is a responsibility to the people of the province; there is a responsibility held by any newspaper.

The Chairman: So that newspapers have special responsibilities over and beyond business enterprise?

Mr. Costello: Yes; and certainly any publisher would say so.

The Chairman: But you believe, I gathered, judging by your comments on press councils and other comments you have made, that—I do not want to put words into your mouth—the publishers are ends unto themselves in seeing to this public responsibility?

Mr. Costello: Of course, I believe there is a press council and I believe that it is our readers. I believe a press council does, in effect, exist in Canada, and that it is the public of Canada.

The Chairman: Thank you. Senator Smith.

Senator Smith: Could I just ask a couple of questions? I would like to clarify as to the effect of the increase in postal rates on your circulation. You made an answer to that question and I got lost when you mentioned a figure of 800. I was going to write it down, but then I heard something else. Would you mind going over that again?

Mr. Costello: We are down, I believe, 800 mail subscribers. They have stopped subscribing since the postal rate increase.

Senator Smith: That is out of how many mail subscribers?

Mr. Costello: I believe about 12,000.

Senator Smith: You had 12,000 mail subscribers and the balance would be delivered by other means.

Mr. Costello: Correct.

Senator Smith: Are these 12,000 mail subscribers all outside the City of Saint John or that metropolitan area and how far would the great bulk of them extend? Where does your circulation stop in the direction of going into Moncton and going up towards the Daily Gleaner?

Mr. Costello: It doesn't stop. We do not want it to stop. No; it covers the province. It goes to every section of the province Edmundston, Bathurst, etc.

Mr. Crowther: There is a very strong competitive situation for circulation with Moncton on the north shore and with Fredericton in the central section of the province.

Senator Smith: Have you ever had a system of doing your own delivery even long before the advent of the new postal rates?

Mr. Costello: Yes. We have been doing our own delivery.

Senator Smith: I do not mean in the city.

Mr. Costello: Yes. We truck to every section of the province. We truck direct to Bathurst with changes every day so that newspaper is there at 7:30 in the morning.

Senator Smith: What happens to them now that they are proceeded through the Post Office? Are they processed through the Post Office?

Mr. Costello: No. We are in good shape until we hit the Post Office.

Senator Smith: I am rather surprised that you would have that rather substantial proportion of your daily, your newspaper still delivered by the postal system.

Is there some special circumstances?

Mr. Costello: Yes. There is no other way that we have been able—no other system that we have been able to devise. Otherwise we would have.

Senator Smith: My comparison is always what I know best and that is what happens in the Province of Nova Scotia. The paper boy is at my door at eight o'clock in the morning. He beats me to it lots of mornings.

Mr. Costello: We get there at or about 7:30.

Senator Smith: It has nothing to do with mail at all. It has been that way for some years past.

Mr. Costello: That is by far the best way.

Senator Smith: I suppose this was done in the first instance in Nova Scotia because it must have been the economical way to do it; combined with good service, of course.

Mr. Costello: Yes.

Senator Smith: I think perhaps you have a special circumstance in which there might be a lot more people who are feeling the pinch, or you would have lost more than the 800 of circulation.

Mr. Costello: That is right. I will be surprised if you do not know the number that Halifax lost. You will hear about that.

Senator Smith: We will be getting those figures too. I have no knowledge of that because they are evening papers.

I asked you a question when you were up before. No. I did not ask you a question on the subject. I opened my remarks to you when I led off the discussion we had, and indicated that I read your newspaper on quite a number of occasions, particularly when visiting those grandchildren I mentioned out in the Saint John area.

I did say to you that I always found your paper very attractive and very readable and now by reading the brief, I think you have the answer to that; and that is that your news is 70 percent of the newspaper content and 30 percent is advertising.

I think that is perhaps what struck me. I am not used to reading newspapers with that high a percentage of news in relation to advertising.

Mr. Costello: You do not know how proud I am of it.

Senator Smith: Well, I know you are.

Mr. Costello, you certainly protected yourself to the extreme when you suggested that 45 percent news and 55 percent advertising would be an acceptable business standard. Do you really mean that? I mean is that what you would require to make a profitable organization?

Mr. Costello: Yes. In the morning newspaper; yes. It is absolutely necessary to have that.

Senator Smith: Do you know—this is not a fair question, perhaps—do you know what the average comparison between the contents of news and advertising in the average daily newspaper would be?

Mr. Costello: No; I do not.

Senator Smith: What would be the editor's standard of what would be a really acceptable thing so far as he is concerned, if he wants to put out a real good newspaper that his readers find attractive as I have found yours?

Mr. Costello: I think every editor would love to have a 70 percent news hole to fill, but the newspaper would not stay in business very long. The editor likes to have as much space as he possibly can get.

Senator Smith: Mr. Costello, is this because the extra cost of putting those extra couple of pages of news is beyond any return that you can get from the increased reader interest?

Mr. Costello: Well, it is really your advertising content has to balance off and news-print is a very major part of your expenses, a major factor in your expenses.

Senator Smith: Of course. The point I thought I was trying to make was that if there is a maximum of advertising that your people can sell, then in order to make a more readable newspaper, would you be rather afraid to put in a couple of extra pages of news to balance that up?

Mr. Costello: We do it every day in the Telegraph-Journal. That is why we have that 70-30 breakdown. We put in more pages in the Telegraph-Journal than we actually can afford.

Senator Smith: Thank you.

The Chairman: Senator Macdonald?

Senator Macdonald: You mention the 800 in circulation lost because of a postal increase. What would be the increase to the subscriber? How much would it cost him extra?

Mr. Costello: Six dollars per year.

Senator Macdonald: Six dollars per year.

Senator Smith: Have you already made that increase to your people?

Mr. Costello: Yes.

Senator Bourque: My question is if an advertising agency sent in a contract for say 500,000 agate lines, would this agency be entitled to use the space for, say 10 or 12 national advertisers, or would they be limited to one national advertiser, only one?

Mr. Crowther: One national advertiser.

Senator Bourque: Thank you.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

On this question of advertising rates, Mr. Crowther, to your knowledge, is there meaningful competition for advertising rates between Saint John and the Moncton papers?

Mr. Crowther: I would say that there is competition. We serve different markets, but certainly there is competition.

Mr. Fortier: What about the rates? Are the rates offered by Moncton papers similar to those offered by your newspaper?

Mr. Crowther: Well, number one, the contract rates are not similar, as a matter of fact. Number two, their rates would be in line with their circulation, which is fundamentally the standard for any newspaper. Therefore, our rates would be higher because we have a higher circulation.

Mr. Fortier: What about small retail advertising? I am not talking about national advertising rates.

Mr. Crowther: Retail advertising?

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Crowther: Yes. Well, retail advertising, they have a completely different, as I understand it, a completely different contract set up to us.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Costello, again on the question of this aspect of competition, but again on the editorial aspect of competition—my first question is this: Have your two newspapers in Saint John ever editorialized on any topic in opposition to one another?

Mr. Costello: I think not; no.

Mr. Fortier: My second question is have your newspapers in Saint John ever editorialized in opposition to any other newspaper in New Brunswick owned by Mr. Irving?

Mr. Costello: Yes; often.

Mr. Fortier: Could you give us an instance?

Mr. Costello: Yes. Let me try to pin down a few. I think the Moncton newspaper feels very strongly on Maritime union, for instance, and has proposed, promoted this without reservation.

The position taken by the Saint John newspapers has been that it is too early. We have approached it very cautiously and believe it should be approached cautiously.

The regional items perhaps are a little easier to understand to misunderstand. Moncton believes that there should be a medical school and it should be in Moncton for some reason. We believe it should be in Saint John.

Mr. Fortier: Why would that be?

Mr. Costello: I have not the slightest idea. On a more serious point, that of a regional airport for Brunswick, the Saint John newspapers believe again without reservation that there should be a regional, a major regional airport to serve Saint John and Fredericton and Moncton.

Moncton feels equally strongly that any expansion of airport should be in the Moncton area.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you.

At the time of federal or provincial elections, to your knowledge, have the Irving papers ever editorialized in favour of different candidates, that is of opposing candidates?

Mr. Costello: I do not think it is a matter of practice during the election campaign that the newspapers have been that active in supporting one party or another party.

Mr. Fortier: You say that has not been the practice?

Mr. Costello: No; no.

Mr. Fortier: Is it not the fact that in the last provincial election in New Brunswick, all Irving newspapers were overtly against the election of Mr. Robichaud?

Mr. Costello: No. What gave you that impression.

Mr. Fortier: Perfunctory reading.

Mr. Costello: Well, the newspapers had opposed many aspects of the Liberal Party's so-called program of equal opportunity and had done this and had commented as legislation was produced during the period that it was being introduced and carried on, I believe, a strong campaign.

The Saint John Telegraph-Journal popposed many things in the legislation. The Moncton newspaper, I believe, took a somewhat different position, but was not supporting the legislation. At the time of the election, the newspapers were not editorially supporting either party.

Mr. Fortier: Why is it that a chain of newspapers such as yours, of your importance, does not have a correspondent in Ottawa? Have you ever, as a publisher, Mr. Costello, considered the need for having a correspondent right here on the scene in Ottawa?

Mr. Costello: Is there a background for this question?

The Chairman: I do not think there is a need for background. I think the question stands by itself.

Mr. Costello: Yes; well, it does. You don't mind if I ask a question occasionally?

The Chairman: I do not mind if you ask a question at all, but I think that Mr. Fortier's question stands by itself.

Mr. Costello: It was a valid question. Have we ever considered having a correspondent in Ottawa? We do have a representative in Ottawa and we think a good representative in Ottawa and we also make use of the columns written by various people who are located in Ottawa.

Mr. Fortier: You say you have someone in Ottawa?

Mr. Costello: Yes; we have a representative.

Mr. Fortier: You have a correspondent in Ottawa.

Mr. Costello: Yes.

Senator Smith: Who is he?

Mr. Costello: Mr. Jackson who writes about three times a week and covers on hard news stories.

The Chairman: Does he report exclusively for the Irving newspaper?

Mr. Costello: No; as a matter of fact...

The Chairman: Does he report exclusively out of Ottawa for your paper?

Mr. Costello: No.

Mr. Fortier: Is this one of your priorities for your newspaper, to have a full time correspondent for your newspaper here, stationed in Ottawa?

Mr. Costello: I think it is not an established priority. It is something that certainly warrants consideration.

The Chairman: Do you think it is desirable?

Mr. Costello: I think we are getting very good coverage out of Ottawa at the moment. It would be very difficult to argue that it is not desirable but we have improved our Ottawa coverage very much in the last two or three years. We think we are getting good coverage from Ottawa.

Mr. Fortier: You were here most of last week, so you probably have heard this question before. If the owner of your newspaper gave you the funds necessary to have another correspondent, where would you send him? Where would you feel, speaking as a New Brunswicker from Saint John, that it would be most important for your readers to have on-hand knowledge?

Mr. Costello: Yes. Well, the owner of the newspaper is not involved in this in any way. This happens to be my responsibility and perhaps I should have answered in another way.

Our priority at the moment is the expansion of our coverage in New Brunswick and this is what we are involved in at the moment.

Mr. Fortier: In New Brunswick?

Mr. Costello: Right.

Mr. Fortier: Are we to read into your answer that you do not have enough reporters on the staff of your newspaper to do the spot inquiries as well as in-depth studies of small newspapers?

Mr. Costello: No. I would like you to read some of the samples I have submitted today. I think we are doing more of this.

Mr. Fortier: I am asking a question, Mr. Costello. You said in answer to an earlier question of mine you felt, did you not, that you did not have enough people in New Brunswick.

Mr. Costello: I said a priority at the moment was expansion of and locating people around the province.

Mr. Fortier: Where specifically is the weakness? Is it your access to people who can do in-depth reporting or is it your access to people who can be delegated to wherever they might be needed?

Mr. Costello: Right. There is always a weakness in finding people who can do in-depth reporting. We do not think that we are that weak, at the present time. We are improving. That is our aim.

Mr. Fortier: You said earlier, speaking about the Windsor Star in your original statement, you felt that they may well, the people of Windsor may well wish for a press council.

Mr. Costello: I believe that is the feeling of the publisher of that newspaper.

Mr. Fortier: What reason have you to believe the people of Saint John, New Brunswick do not wish to have a press council?

Mr. Costello: The point I made was that the Windsor newspaper itself wanted a press council and believe strongly in this. At this moment, I do not happen to share that feeling.

Mr. Fortier: My question...

Mr. Costello: I do not know what the people of New Brunswick want.

Mr. Fortier: You do not know?

Mr. Costello: I do not know if they want a press council.

Mr. Fortier: If you were told that the people of New Brunswick, people of Saint John, were in favour of a press council, would you withdraw your opposition to the institution of such a council?

Mr. Costello: I doubt it very much. I think it is difficult enough to publish a newspaper and I think the responsibility of publishing that newspaper rests with the publisher.

I think he should stand on what goes into the newspaper and stand behind it. Again, this may not stand up six months or a year or five years from now. I may feel very strongly that we should have a press council, but this is my feeling at the moment.

Mr. Fortier: At the moment, prior to making such a blanket statement, have you not felt it your duty to inquire around Saint John, New Brunswick?

Mr. Costello: No; I have not felt that my duty. My duty is to publish the best newspaper that I can publish.

Mr. Fortier: Did I hear you say earlier that insofar as the increase in postal rates was concerned, the practice which prevailed before was interpreted by you as a subsidy, not to the newspaper, but as a subsidy to the far-out people.

Mr. Costello: If, in fact, any subsidy existed and if, in fact, it should be called a subsidy, that was my only personal interpretation.

Mr. Fortier: I had understood you properly. My question to you is, would you as a newspaper accept any form of government subsidy?

Mr. Costello: I doubt it very much.

Mr. Fortier: In your preliminary remarks, you spoke about the alleged burial of a pollution story in your newspaper. I have here a press release, dated May 27, 1969, which starts as follows—and I will only read the first paragraph:

"Excavation work will begin this week on a million dollar pollution control system, being built as part of the St. Ann Mactaquac Pulp and Paper complex at Mactaquac, New Brunswick."

Do you recall the story?

Mr. Costello: Yes; I recall it.

Mr. Fortier: I also have before me a copy of Page 21 of the Telegraph-Journal, Saint John, New Brunswick, Wednesday, May 28, 1969. Under the heading "Obituaries", I read "Beginning work on pollution control system" and then I find two paragraphs of a 15-paragraph press release. Would you explain why this particular story was given the coverage that it was?

Mr. Costello: Yes. I think it was a horrible misjudgment on the part of the person who handled it.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Chairman, would you file as an exhibit, subject, of course to Mr. Costello's explanation, the press release, and Pages 20 and 21 of the newspaper?

The Chairman: Fine.

Do any Senators have any other questions? Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: I might ask Mr. Costello, in what particular position in the newspaper was that Mactaquac story buried?

The Chairman: Well, I think, in fairness, Senator McElman, Mr. Fortier indicated where it was.

Senator McElman: I am sorry. I was reading something else.

The Chairman: Senator Macdonald, I think you have some questions.

Senator Macdonald: I wonder if Mr. Costello would give us his comments on the idea of the freedom of the press. You deal with it in Item 15 of your brief.

The Chairman: Senator Macdonald, you would agree that Mr. Costello dealt with freedom of the press extensively the other morning. If he does not mind answering the question...

Senator Macdonald: I am just trying to get his definition which is acceptable. You say "Freedom of the press is an extension of the right of free speech", Paragraph 15, Page 4.

I do not think, if I may make a comment first, that that is the traditional and perhaps legal definition. It would perhaps go a little further, and I quote from a speech given by Gratton O'Leary, who is a man of some knowledge in these matters, where he said "All that freedom of the press means is that the right of free speech has been extended to the printing press."

In other words, it is not only the newspapers which were given the extension of the freedom of the speech, but any printed matter.

Some of the witnesses who have been here have given a very much wider idea of freedom of the press in that they said it extends to freedom of the news media to go to the sources of news and to get news from such sources.

Senator Prowse: Right of access to news sources.

Mr. Costello: I do not know if that is a right. I think it is an obligation on the part of newspapers to do everything possible and to fight for the right of access.

Senator Macdonald: But do you agree with me there are two separate things? One is a right of access and the other is the extension of the freedom of speech?

Mr. Costello: I do not know if I agree with you. I think it is terribly complicated. I believe that freedom of the press is the right to express yourself.

Senator Macdonald: There is just one other thing I would like your comment on. The protection given to a reporter to protect his sources of news if he is asked, say in a court of law, if he is asked where he got a certain information—do you believe that there should be legislation to give him a privilege so that he would not have to reveal such sources?

Mr. Costello: I think that any such legislation should be very carefully considered. I think a newspaper does have to have protection. I think the great danger is that this protection, and if there is legislation, might be abused, that a person might hide behind this, might conceivably damage someone and then hide behind this.

I think it is worthy of very careful consideration but I have not got a firm opinion.

Senator Macdonald: Just one further thing regarding this freedom of speech or freedom of the press. You take the same attitude; you are very dubious if there should be legislation regarding it?

Mr. Costello: Yes. Because when it is defined, we are having difficulty in defining it; every publisher is having difficulty in defining it. But if it is defined in law, then chances are also that it will be restrictive and that is dangerous.

Senator Macdonald: Well, as I understand it, the freedom of the press though is already guaranteed in Canada by the Bill of Rights.

Mr. Costello: I hope so.

Senator Macdonald: So it is a case of interpreting what is meant by freedom of the press.

Mr. Costello: I would like to see it left with the widest possible interpretation.

Senator Prowse: To the Supreme Court of Canada.

The Chairman: Well, Senators, I want to turn to Brigadier Wardell as quickly as possible. I am wondering if there are any final questions. Mr. Fortier, do you have one?

Mr. Fortier: I have one question for Mr. Hazel. Mr. Hazel, as an editor, how do you treat at your newspaper, public relations material?

Mr. Fred Hazel, Managing Editor, The Telegraph-Journal, Saint John: I am glad you did not leave me out. Public relations material coming from any particular source? Have you some specific source in mind?

Mr. Fortier: Well, start with public relations material emanating from government representatives.

Mr. Hazel: Well, I guess that is the big one because we get more from the government than from anyone else. We treat it all the same way. We try to apply the same basic principles; our aim is to apply them to information coming from any source to treat it by the criteria of its news value.

If you are speaking of government hand-outs, as we call them, we are very conscious of the fact that we do not want to be inundated by them, that we do not want to be used as a propaganda vehicle.

At the same time, we have a responsibility to inform our readers of any news that we have obtained. We look at them very carefully and try to handle them based on news value.

Mr. Fortier: Once you make that decision, that it has news content, do you edit it or do you publish it verbatim?

Mr. Hazel: In theory, we try to edit it because this is information given to us and we pass it to the reader. Sometimes, in the practice of deadlines, this not always possible.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you.

The Chairman: In Paragraph 8 of your brief, you make reference, Mr. Costello, you say "Many newspapers in Canada have achieved financial stability and a high degree of integrity and professionalism under group ownership." That is about six lines from the bottom of the page.

What specifically, what specific instances of improved integrity and professionalism can be cited for the Telegraph-Journal and other media acquisitions since their acquisition by the group?

Mr. Costello: Since acquisition? I would like to speak for the last 10 years or last nine years when there has been—when I was charged with bringing about an improvement and if it is the wish of the Senate Committee, I would be very pleased to submit additional photostats showing the newspaper which we produced at that time and what is being done now.

The Chairman: Would you not think that most newspapers have improved over the past 10 years?

Mr. Costello: Yes; I do.

The Chairman: Whether or not they are members of groups. I am wondering specifically related to the group.

Mr. Costello: I think in that question, I said specifically here—no; I am sorry; that is another.

The Chairman: Well, you said...

Mr. Costello: Yes; "financial stability" under group ownership. What I am saying is that—and I am thinking of other groups, rather than our own—I do think they have financial stability and they have become great newspapers. Your question, I believe, was would they have become great anyway.

The Chairman: No. My question was would you give me specific instances of improved integrity and professionalism at your newspaper and other Irving media holdings since their acquisition by the group?

Mr. Costello: I think that we have improved professionally and I think that we do have a higher degree of integrity and professional awareness of our responsibilities to the people of the province and I think this is increasing all of the time.

The Chairman: With all respect, that is what you say. I want to be specific. What are some examples of this?

Mr. Costello: What are some examples...

The Chairman: Of improved integrity and professionalism since you have joined the group.

Mr. Costello: I think the publisher of the newspaper—it is not since we joined the group and I am relating that not to our own newspapers.

The Chairman: Do you relate it to your own newspapers? Could it be related to your own newspapers? In other words, have your own newspapers achieved, and to use your quote "financial stability and a higher"...

Mr. Costello: Yes; financial stability.

The Chairman: And a high degree of professionalism—integrity and professionalism under group ownership?

Mr. Costello: Yes.

The Chairman: Specifically, how—or what are some specific examples of improved integrity and professionalism since you became part of the group?

Mr. Costello: Well, actually I was not involved at the time. There have been two publishers in my time on the newspapers. I think this is a general statement, a statement of opinion, a statement that it is my belief and I am not even sure that I can pinpoint specific areas.

The Chairman: All right.

Are there other questions. I would like to get on to . . .

Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: I am sorry, but I forgot to ask this one earlier. Mr. Costello, you heard Mr. Irving an hour ago say that he would have no objection to having disclosed in any one of his newspapers at the bottom of an editorial, which directly or indirectly concerned another company in which he was interested, the fact of this interest.

How would you, a publisher, view such a disclosure?

Mr. Costello: I think it would be a very difficult thing to do. Mr. Irving would have to submit a daily list of companies with which he is involved.

Mr. Fortier: It would be difficult because of the wide range of holdings?

Mr. Costello: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Would it not be advantageous also if it could be done?

Mr. Costello: If there is any suggestion that the newspaper had a specific personal interest, I am not enthusiastic about it but I think it is a point.

The Chairman: Any other questions before I move on? Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: I would like to touch on one point. You mentioned, Mr. Costello, that at a certain stage in events in New Brunswick, your newspaper editorially and otherwise, too, took issue with certain parts of the so-called program for equal opportunity.

Would it be fair to say that up to this point there had been not an unfriendly attitude by your newspaper towards the government?

Mr. Costello: I think that up until the point of the introduction of the legislation, there had not been legislation which, we felt as a newspaper, we should oppose.

Senator McElman: As a matter of fact, one other publisher commented that this was—I am not going to put words in his mouth—but almost in effect that it was a honeymoon of sorts between your papers and the Robichaud government.

Mr. Costello: I have no idea who suggested that.

Senator McElman: Perhaps that will come out later. The period involved there was between approximately mid '60 to late '65?

Mr. Costello: What period is that, Senator?

Senator McElman: In this period in which there was no great controversy. There were no burning attacks by your editorial columns against the government of the day. At that time, there had come down in the legislature a parcel of legislation which made up this so-called program, 100-odd bills involved. The cornerstone of that legislation was the Assessment Act. You recall the details of that, I am sure.

This whole parcel had been discussed widely in the province, including the Assessment Act but there was one detail of the Assessment Act when it went before the Law Amendments Committee which said there would be no more special tax agreements in New Brunswick for industry or commerce, etc.

As you know, there had been numerous such agreements over the years and also provision for the setting up of a board or committee which would possibly renegotiate with those who held such agreements—I am sorry for the detail, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Is the question soon coming?

Senator McElman: Yes; it is.

On the day that this Assessment Act came before the Law Amendments Committee, would you agree with me that the most prominent objector to this was Mr. K. C. Irving?

Mr. Costello: I would certainly agree that he was the most prominent. I do not remember the others, but there were many prominents.

Senator McElman: With him.

Mr. Costello: Yes.

Senator McElman: The lead story in your newspaper the next day on this carried Mr. Irving's photograph, Fredericton dateline: "Industrialist K. C. Irving of Saint John" said Tuesday that the government's proposed new Assessment Act is "completely unacceptable."

That was the first paragraph.

I suspect, knowing your tremendous sense of humor, which I have a high regard for, that whoever coined the line over the lead editorial of that day—if it was yourself, your sense of humor came through; if not, it is matched when the lead said "The voice of the province must be heeded."

What I am getting to is this: Would you agree with me that it is rather remarkable, that the change in editorial approach of your newspaper coincided with that day?

Mr. Costello: No. I would not. I would say that the criticism of the newspaper coincided with the introduction and explanation of the program of legislation, piece by piece, which was dealt with as it came before the House.

The fact that Mr. Irving objected to legislation which he felt was wrong does not suggest that it was right. I think there were weaknesses. I think at the end of that long day, as you recall, the Minister told the assembly at Fredericton that the government did not really mean to do it that way at all. I think you recall that vividly. It was all a mistake and they should not have been so upset.

This was after listening to evidence for 11 or 12 hours. I think that whatever editorial position the newspaper took, it coincided with the introduction and explanation of the legislation, and I think if there is any question on that, we would be delighted to bring out the arguments which we set forth at that time and we would be delighted to relate them to the position of the province at the present.

We were greatly concerned, as you recall, about the availability of the money for this huge program, where it was coming from. There was a mass of legislation, as you say; 100 bills.

21413-5

The province, in our view, did not have the resources to do all that quickly.

I think that has been borne out in our province by the very difficult position we are in today. We said it would be. I think this was a public service.

New Brunswick has the surtax, and we feel the situation very much in New Brunswick.

Senator McElman: Mr. Chairman, I should say in all fairness to Mr. Costello, the only reason I do raise this is because this charge has been made repeatedly, publicly, throughout New Brunswick over a period of time. Is that not correct?

Mr. Costello: Yes; there have been a great many charges.

Senator McElman: I thought you should have an opportunity to comment.

Mr. Costello: Thank you very much.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Costello. I think there are no more questions. Thank you, gentlemen, very much.

Honourable Senators, the third brief this afternoon, and the final brief, is that of the Fredericton Gleaner. Sitting on my left is the publisher of the Gleaner, Brigadier Michael Wardell.

I think you are reasonably familiar with our procedure. As requested, we did receive three weeks in advance of this hearing the copy of your brief which you were kind enough to prepare.

The brief has been circulated. The members of the committee have read it and I think for purposes of discussion, we can take the brief as read. I now put at your disposal 15 minutes in which you can summarize your brief or explain it or add to it, indeed talk about other things, if you wish.

I will try to notify you at about the 10 minute mark; indeed, you do not have to use all of the 15 minutes; you can if you wish. Following your statement, the Senators will be free to question you on the comments you have made, the contents of your brief, and other things which may concern them.

Brigadier Michael Wardell, Publisher, Fredericton Gleaner: Mr. Chairman, Honourable Senators. I will take as read this brief and I suspect that some questions will be raised which I would be very glad to answer to the best of my ability.

Of course, several points have come up during the afternoon which reflect on me or relate to me and to the Daily Gleaner. On these, it is understood, that I should speak.

I, therefore, will not deal with various opinions that I expressed about the press generally and about what I believe to be the limitations—the liberties, the freedoms, the responsibilities of the press and the way they can best be carried out.

I will explain, perhaps I should explain, that I came to Canada 18 years ago—19 years ago, practically. I came to Canada in 1950 and agreed then to buy the Daily Gleaner.

At that time, I was employed by Lord Beaverbrook and held a position in his newspaper. I had not any intention of making my life in Canada at that time. I am saying this in explanation because I think it necessary to explain my background a little bit.

I had no intention or any idea of making any life in Canada, but I bought the Daily Gleaner as an investment and as a source of tremendous interest and something which I thought could become a responsible—it was at that time responsible—but I thought it could increase over the years perhaps.

Perhaps its influence in that area of Canada could be increased. I fully intended other people to concern themselves with the running of it. But I stayed on, instead of going back to the Beaverbrook newspaper. Having left that organization and returned to it, I had reached the top seniority, not as absolutely number one in the organization, but I had gone back as Vice Chairman of the group and I had a tremendous life. The end of my life was going to be very happy and successful as the result of many years of work with it.

But I stayed on in Canada and stayed on in Canada and gradually became more and more immersed in these problems. Is it necessary to say all this to say I was an Englishman resident in Canada?

Nobody had any idea there was anything improper about my owning Canadian newspaper shares at that time. It is only a very, very recent time ago. I may say, that my former master in journalism, Lord Beaverbrook, contrary to what I read the other day that it was necessary for him to be a naturalized Britisher because he had all these huge newspaper interests in Britain.

On the contrary, his great pride was that he was a Canadian. He always traveled on a Canadian passport. He always carried his Canadian nationality to the day of his death. His son does now. The idea that a Canadian is not fit to own, publish, edit or anything else a British newspaper has never, so far as I know, been raised.

During the many years that I spent with Lord Beaverbrook and on the Daily Express and Evening Standard, either people loved him or criticized him. Some people did not know him at all, but there was every sort of criticism from time to time because he was a very controversial man. He was always raising issues, facing issues, delighting in battle and therefore, every sort of reply was directed at him, but never, never that he was a Canadian.

In the great days of the growth of the Daily Express, which was of course the greatest newspaper in terms of circulation, in those days by far—but in the days of its rise, its owner—you call him owner they do not use the word publisher in Britain—the owner was a Canadian, the editor was Beverley Baxter, and the general manager, who was sort of a genius of management who did everything about managing editing, was a Canadian called E. J. Robinson—who is the finest newspaper executive that I have ever known in my life. There you have the owner, the boss, the editor, the manager—everybody Canadian and never a single word of complaint about it. I only mention this because I think it wants to be stated.

I saw somewhere that Lord Thomson had to be English because he owned newspapers in England.

He had absolutely no basis for that truth at all, he wanted to be a lord and he could not be because he was a Canadian and there is no such thing as a Canadian lord—therefore, he had to be an English lord. Let him. He is a very fine man and no doubt, he is well and duly and properly honored. This has nothing to do with the British public saying that we cannot read the Times, if Lord Thomson is not an Englishman. That is just an hallucination. This is the type of thing that should be mentioned, I think. Freedom of the press is the freedom to own, edit and sell a newspaper without interference with governments at any level. I regard as an attack on the freedom of the press this Senate inquiry. I believe that newspapers must have the right to ask questions, question everybody, and they criticize and should be criticized. I am not suggesting that they should not be criticized.

But I do say that what happened in New Brunswick is something quite different and I am going to deal with it personally because—and I do regard it as an attack on the freedom of the press—that there should be this Senate inquiry coinciding with the raids on the Daily Gleaner under the Combines Investigation Act combined with hostile and threatening speeches and published letters of those concerned in prompting these investigations and I may say in sitting on the committee in judgment, and that I regard as something utterly indefensible.

Now I get to the point where pressure groups were mentioned. I said in this brief that pressure groups are no problem to newspapers. Their representations generally are received with proper courtesy and their arguments given fair consideration on their merits by the newspaper.

Mr. Irving answered that one in quite a different way: He said, "Well, if you want to know about pressure groups, look at Wardell". He went on to say "He was very savagely treated."

I can say and it is known by Senator McElderman that the Premier of New Brunswick declared that he was going to ruin and drive him out of the province.

Now, he did not say that to me. I never made a complaint to anybody in the printed word, or any other word. I never made any complaint about any attacks made whatsoever or at all. It is a fact that they were made.

It is a fact that I had supported after a campaign which I devoted my life to for some years, a campaign in favour of the Atlantic—Maritimes, if you like, to call for the development of massive investment in great public work schemes.

This called for the establishment of an Atlantic Development Board. I was representing a body that was advocating it you see, and we saw the Prime Minister, Mr. Diefenbaker. He was greatly taken with this idea of a great development project and tidal power development and with making the Maritimes the source of the greatest outpouring of power at the cheapest rate of anywhere in North America—and millions of other things that could be done—that should have been done. We didn't and shouldn't sit down and whine, but we should make that the greatest center in the world which it can be—in North America which is the world.

He was tremendously infected by the ambition to see these things done and he went into that general election in 1962 and said that "This is exactly what I am going to do." He declared that he would set up the Atlantic Development Board.

All the dreams came true. I thought at that time they were the dreams of Premier Robichaud, too, because he was concerned in propounding the development of the area and the development of tidal power as well. But it is a fact that after that election, which of course as everybody can remember, resulted in Mr. Diefenbaker being returned as Prime Minister to form his government in a minority position.

I found myself—it is true—I never raised this matter publicly. I did not ask Mr. Irving to raise it. I did not have any consultation with him about my brief, which is in contradiction to his. But as raised, it is perfectly true. Somebody said, "Well, isn't this a usual thing when you get a change of government?" "It was a change of government." The Robichaud government had come in in 1960, so this was not a change of government.

I was divested, my business was divested, and everything that could be torn away from it—all government printing and I lost the printing.

When I came to Canada, I bought a business there which had had a long-established contract to print the Royal Gazette and it was not a very profitable thing.

That was taken away from me and a terrible injury done to the Atlantic Advocate because we were running a national magazine from this small country town which we were able to do. We had to have advertising—liquor advertising—in order to get sufficient revenues to do it and this was always understood. Although there was a law against it in New Brunswick, that law said that there is an exception if permission is granted by Liquor Board Commission. This was clearly understood and regularly every month, before we went to press, the manager or someone would go to the Liquor Commission and would be carrying the advertisement.

This amounted to a very considerable sum. It was a considerable amount in the magazine. All that, I was not only suddenly at that moment debarred from carrying it, but I was never told that I could not carry it again.

Suddenly I found that my advertisers had been told that they were breaking the law and that that fellow Wardell is running you into a very dangerous position.

They came to me and asked "Have you been leading us astray; leading us to suppose that you could carry these advertisements properly and now, suddenly, we are told that this is not so."

I was put in a deservately uncomfortable position. All of the printing work was taken away and, of course, I suffered very much. Now, I am not one to complain at all, about my treatment. I am quite prepared to take any blows, adversity or such, if they apply.

I am quite prepared to defend myself and to return a blow or two. That is part of life. But as it is mentioned, certainly I was to be drawn and quartered. There is no doubt that Mr. Irving, there—I was not part of the Irving group at all at that time. It is perfectly true that I did say to him—he is my friend—I have known him from time that I first set foot in Canada—I did say, "This is the most monstrous injustice that has been done and I cannot understand the reason of it. Can you find out for me. I would like to ask somebody."

He never gave me at that time a very good explanation, but he has said something about it today and it is perfectly clear that he was told that I was going to be dismembered and broken, if it was possible to break me—which it was not.

It should be noted that I have never complained about hairs and if it had not been for this hearing today, probably it never would have been known.

But we come to another point now, that is a fact that at that time, Mr. Irving had built up an improved series of operations in this poor New Brunswick, which is beyond the powers of understanding.

I cannot, to this day—I have been here for many years and have seen very closely, at close quarters—I cannot understand how it was possible for him to do it.

But he did it by watching every detail, by working through the clock, by having no bad habits. He does not smoke; he does not drink; he has some wonderful young sons.

He did it on his own before his sons were there to help him. He built up a great position. Now when I came to Canada, his name was a very great name and he was a Liberal, so most of you gentlemen—who are Liberals—will approve of him.

Then they saw these pulp plants rise out of the ground and they saw logs rolling down the river. They said "Hip, hip, hurrah; Irving and employment for New Brunswick." Then they said "God bless him".

That was the attitude and no doubt, the hat that was thrown the highest was Senator McElman's. He was very young at that time and no doubt he was perfectly delighted.

Now there was no criticism of...

Senator McElman: Are you speaking of fact, there?

Brig. Wardell: I am speaking of fact. There was no criticism in that day at all from you, sir, or anyone else that I know of, I was watching facts pretty closely, the industrial activities of Mr. Irving. They were looked at with wonder and he did a tremendous job.

I have said—and I said it long before I was any part of his group—that he did more for New Brunswick than all levels of government put together. Lord Beaverbrook used to say that of him. Many people that I have known, not because I am anything but a most mediocre man; I do not give myself any pride at all, but I have known some of the very great and active men in the world but I have never known any of them who could do and I believe who could have done what Mr. Irving did in that poor province of New Brunswick.

In those days, the province was very, very poor. It was done absolutely as though by magic. Well, now, certainly I saw suddenly the climate change and I saw it about the beginning of 1966, just about the time that the Honourable Senator was appointed to the Senate, that there was a great change and there was an argument about certain of the items of legislation.

In the main, the great issue was something else, which was Brunswick Mining and Smelting. Here was a great industry in New Brunswick, which he knew or he said was worth in its assets more than all of the forests of New Brunswick, all of the Crown Land of New Brunswick added up together, to be valued at somewhat between half a billion and a billion dollars.

Perhaps this was one of the greatest assets in the whole of Canada. He was suddenly in a series of what you could say, hostile acts which were accompanied by a great deal of criticism of him.

There is no doubt that the deal which passed these great assets over to Noranda was done like a trap door. I was sitting there and watching it. It never has been published, but am going to publish it one day, if nobody else does. Perhaps somebody else will.

It was a most extraordinary thing that happened. It was like a booby trap that was opened and he unguardedly fell into it and Noranda took control of these great assets. He was, what you could call, given the cold shoulder by the government. After that, there were most rude references to him by the Premier of New Brunswick. Shocking things were said in speeches, representing Mr. K. C. Irving as a sort of great financial ogre, as somebody who was battling on the poor.

All these things, chapter and verse—they all can be produced. He was called "the man from Saint John." He was sneered at.

Senaio Smith: That is bad?

Brig. Wardell: It depends on the connotation. If the connotation is a happy one, it might be the highest compliment to be the man from Saint John. But if it is done in a way that is adverse, I do not think it would be a happy phrase.

Anyhow, we get down to this extraordinary change which took place when suddenly the newspapers, which are not the greatest newspapers in all Canada because newspapers do—and I have been in the newspaper business for many, many years—and of course, they do depend on the amount of money or the amount of advertising brought in.

They have got to live on advertising. There is not that amount of advertising in New Brunswick to make them comparable perhaps to the Times of London or the New York Times. In a book on the press which the Chairman recommended they discussed what they considered to the great delight of newspapers—the Times of London, which is very rightly praised, praised enormously; It was in the newspaper in the last 24 hours, that it is losing a million pounds, $2,600,000 this year, that it has lost over 13 million dollars for Lord Thomson. It is a very, very expensive prestige operation there and maybe it will be remedied and rectified.

These things are very difficult to deal with in a doctrinaire way by theory. You can only get newspaper men who know that they have to get their revenues out of advertising and live on their revenues, and make their papers as good as they can within the relatively constricted area of the news pages versus the advertising pages.

Having said that . . .

The Chairman: May I interrupt you at that point to say that you have spoken about eight or 10 minutes longer than the 15 minute time limit. The point is that we would like to question. We are most interested in what you are saying. Would you, perhaps, conclude your remarks?

Brig. Wardell: Yes. I am only going to say that I believe that the press of Canada compares extremely favorably with the press of any other country and I have been engaged in the press in England for many years.

Almost any measuring stick you apply shows that Canada ranks high. The press of New Brunswick is good and it is honest and it does not suffer from distortion or suppression in my view.

Now I end by saying whatever you find to criticize about the Daily Gleaner, do not blame Mr. Irving and Mr. Costello or anybody like that because he has not taken it over. In fact nothing has happened except that there is an agreement about an exchange of shares, an agreement dated from last year.

There are many angles. It is complicated, a complicated thing that we did and we have not concluded by any means at all. Suddenly this thing is charged, blown up that he had bought the control of the Daily Gleaner.

Right; he did. But that has not been entirely consummated and at the present moment, he has not got any representation on the board at all. There is absolutely no communication even between Saint John and Fredericton in connection with this.

I do not tell you it is a good thing. I am not recommending it. It might well be that I could say at my time in life, when I certainly, you know like an old horse, could be turned out to grass—if there is any grass—it is about time perhaps, he did take a great deal of stress and maybe it will be a far greater newspaper than I was able to produce.

I have done my best with it. I never allowed distortion and never allowed suppression. No editorial man has ever been asked to slant the news. What was done was done by me.

Very good; I will answer my questions.

The Chairman: Thank you very much.

Senator Prowse: Brigadier Wardell, you referred to—your statement in Paragraph 7, particularly the second paragraph—do you regard "as an attack on the freedom of the press this Senate enquiry..."

Now, you are not suggesting for a moment that this Senate inquiry had as its purpose the intention to harrass the Gleaner surely.

Brig. Wardell: Yes; I have, sir.

Senator Prowse: That this Senate inquiry was set up for that purpose?

Brig. Wardell: No; I do not. I am sorry. I thought you meant the Department of Consumer Affairs, what I call a raid when they walked into the office...

Senator Prowse: Well, I understand that was somebody else's business. I do not even know about...

Brig. Wardell: That was brought about by your Senator McElman.

Senator Prowse: I do not know who asked for it. I do not know who is doing it. I do not know what they have done and I do not care.

Brig. Wardell: I answered to what I thought was to another question. I thought you were asking whether the conglomeration of all these facts...

Senator Prowse: Will you listen a moment? Maybe we can then get it done with less time. I have no objection to you complaining about something a government department does. That is your God given right in this country.

I am taking exception to the fact that you make an accusation that a bona fide inquiry by one of the branches of Parliament in this country into something which we consider—and this was set up by the Senate itself—and the Senate considered it was important to the people of Canada—should constitute an harassment of one particular person or a group of persons.

Now, would you like to make it clear that that was not your intention?

Brig. Wardell: No, sir; I would not. I answered it in this way, that I protest the bias that Senator McElman expressed in his speeches, his statements in reference to the Daily Gleaner.

Now, in his speech to the Senate on March 11, in support of Senator Davey's motion to appoint this special committee, he charged that the newspapers in the Irving group, including the Daily Gleaner, distorted the news to benefit private interests of Mr. K. C. Irving.

Now, this is not true. Allow me, sir; you put this question to me. I think I have the right to answer.

Senator Prowse: You have said it is not true. We are not going to have this whole debate because neither you nor Senator McElman are on trial.

Brig. Wardell: I am on trial.

The Chairman: Excuse me, Senator Prowse. I think I made clear, Brigadier Wardell, that no one is on trial and most certainly, sir, if you feel you are on trial, I can only apologize and assure you that you are not.

Brig. Wardell: May I be allowed to make a statement?

The Chairman: Yes.

Brig. Wardell: May I make a short statement. Then anybody can say anything they like to me. Now I say this, it is not true—this distortion of the news. If it were, both Mr. Irving and those who direct the five newspapers that he has financial control of, would be guilty of infamous conduct, and that includes Mr. Costello.

The statement is defamatory and I say I am quite prepared to put that to any counsel to judge upon. The Senator ended his speech with a demand that the Department of Consumer Affairs—this is the speech of March 11—undertake an investigation of the English language newspapers in New Brunswick with the right to show an improper monopoly.

He hoped the law would be applied to remedy this situation. Now, that was in the Senate and it was fully reported, but not content with that, three days later, he comes to Fredericton.

He goes to the Provincial Legislative Building, which has nothing to do with the Senate, and he calls a press conference in the local provincial legislature there. He has my own reporters at that press conference and he makes these charges again of suppression of news in the interests of Mr. Irving and says that he has called for this investigation of the Combines Investigation Branch only the previous day in Ottawa.

Now, that is done. On October 15, in the pollution debate in the Senate, Senator McElman charged that the consultant's report on pollution in the Saint John River was given an indecent burial and he said that the other newspapers, having the same ownership and named the Daily Gleaner, likewise buried the story. Now this is tantamount to charging that the Daily Gleaner was joining a conspiracy of suppression to please Mr. Irving.

Now, the next day I published an editorial which ended with the words "It is no part of our purpose in this column to speak for Mr. Irving and no doubt, if he so desires, in due course, we could speak for him." It continued "It is our purpose to refute the charge made by the Senator that the Daily Gleaner is being derelict in its duties."

On October 20, four days later, the officials of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs raided the office of the Daily Gleaner. They said there were visits on other newspapers. They stayed there for two days. They rifled the desks of my executives, the managing editor, the advertising manager, the editor. They visited my own home, demanded to see any papers that I had there and I was treated as though I were a member of the Mafia.

I may say that Canada is full of Mafia-controlled companies, but I do not see their being raided in this way and I look upon it as a gross and insupportable insult that it should be done as part of this—on what you call the Irving newspapers.

On October 23, the Daily Gleaner received a letter from Senator McElman making fresh charges against the Daily Gleaner. This is in the midst of this investigation and ending with the statement that he will continue his efforts to destroy the existing organization of the press in New Brunswick.

To this I replied in a signed editorial which some Honourable Senators may have seen which I am prepared to read or distribute. If this committee desires to present an appearance of judicial fairness, Senator McElman could greatly assist by retiring from the committee.

The Chairman: If I may just interrupt at this point and make a statement, Senator Prowse. I think the question about the study under the Combines Investigation Act would really be pointless here because that study has absolutely nothing to do with this committee.

I won't address myself to your comments on Senator McElman except to repeat the remarks I made in the course of Mr. Costello's comments. I would, however, like to ask you a question which is essentially the question Senator Prowse was asking.

May I ask you specifically, sir, do you regard the establishment of this Senate Committee as an attack on the freedom of the press?

Brig. Wardell: I can answer that this way, that the establishment certainly of a Senate committee to look into the press is an admirable idea. I would support it wholeheartedly, but here I say, as I said before, the announcement of that coupled with one of its prime promoters, you are supporting the very motion.

The Chairman: I might just say that the motion was accepted unanimously.

Brig. Wardell: He supported it.

The Chairman: So did all of the Senators.

Brig. Wardell: Well, I can show you his speech, sir.

Senator Prowse: We have heard it.

Brig. Wardell: Yes, you have heard it. But the fact is that he tied in his support of that thing with an attack on the Irving press in New Brunswick, and he coupled it with a threat that he was going to ask for a special investigation of the monopoly by the Consumer Affairs Department.

He coupled it with letters which are challenging and threatening and I say the combination of the whole is a direct attempt at intimidation and harassment.

He is not going to succeed. His efforts, just as when I was beaten about by the Premier of New Brunswick, that was an attempt at harassment. It did not have that effect, but obviously his intention was to harass Mr. K. C. Irving.

The Chairman: I think we have dealt with Senator McElman at considerable length as we have with Mr. Irving. I again come back and put the question. I would hope, sir, that you do not regard this committee's establishment as an attack upon a freedom of the press. It certainly has not been so in Canada.

If I did understand your answer, you do not. You are concerned, as I understand it, with that point that you are making.

Brig. Wardell: I have made the point.

The Chairman: I do think it is important to have your acceptance of the idea of the committee because I can assure you, during the planning for the establishment of the committee, I had no particular contact at all. I am sure Senator McElman did not know that I was planning to propose the committee. I think it is important, an important thing for this study. I am sure I could not change your minds on opinions you express, especially, but I hope...

Brig. Wardell: No. I started by saying that the press lives by the criticism of others because that is its job, its duty. It has to do that to find out the reasons things happen. It has to be critical.

It has to be alert for that reason. Therefore, obviously, the press cannot object to being investigated itself, as to its motives, its reasons, its conduct. Much good can come out of such an inquiry and, of course, that thing is going on.

It is continually going on in its area wherever it circulates and some people think it does well and some think it does badly. There is always a good deal of criticism, but criticism is the essence of life, particularly press life and certainly I would welcome the idea of a Senate inquiry.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. On that point I only just want to add one other thing on Senator McElman. That is to say that I think in fairness, because I think you are a fair man, if you study the transcript of the hearings which have taken place, you will find that while Senator McElman as a New Brunswicker, has of course evidenced considerable interest in the Irving newspapers, the Irving group and in the problems we have been discussing this afternoon.

I think in fairness to him, he has asked a great many questions since the hearings started a week ago on a great many matters, a great many of which do not relate at all to the New Brunswick situation.

In any event, I would like to turn to other questions. I will go to you, Senator Prowse.

Senator Prowse: Well...

Senator McElman: Mr. Chairman...

The Chairman: Is this a point of order?

Senator McElman: I would like to comment if I may on the facts before you move into questioning.

The Chairman: Senator McElman, I think I have been most patient with Brigadier Wardell and I shall try to be most patient with you, but I do not want—

Senator McElman: All right, Mr. Chairman. I will put it as a question of privilege. Certain interpretations have been put upon what I may have done or what I have said, such as that as I finished my speech on March 1, I concluded by threatening that I would do so and so. This is the same sort of thing that has shot through the dialogue of Brigadier Wardell. Now let me read from the Senate Hansard. I am sure that is one unimpeachable record...

The Chairman: Is this the conclusion of your speech?

Senator McElman: That is correct, sir.

"In this light," which follows the reference to the situation, "I now call upon the responsible authorities in the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to undertake an investigation of the reported ownership-control of all English language daily newspapers in New Brunswick. And if the evidence shows an improper monopoly,"—I was talking about the law—"then I should hope that the law will be applied to remedy the situation."

The Chairman: Thank you.

Senator McElman: Mr. Chairman, I simply wish to point out there is no element of threat. I suggest further, immediately following this—I directed a letter to the Director of the Combines Branch. I drew his attention to the remarks that were made in the Senate and I asked that they look into the matter to see if there was any infraction of the law.

As Brigadier Wardell has suggested, I was in Fredericton a day or two later and my presence in the legislature in Fredericton is not looked upon as strange. It has been going on for many years. Often do I drop into the press gallery office to chat with my friends and some of them are here today.

They asked questions about what I was doing and I told them what I was doing. There is nothing indvidious or insidious or secret. I simply wanted to state facts to clear away the impressions.

Senator Prowse: Mr. Wardell, you say in Paragraph 1 of your brief that in the second paragraph, in the second sub-paragraph, starting in the third line: "I have never at any time had any discussion on editorial policy with any member of the Irving group... All such discussions have been confined to the committee from within our own organization."

What do you mean by editorial policy?

Brig. Wardell: Exactly what it says. Editorial policy is the policy, so far as I know, in every country of the world and every newspaper in the world, the policy applied to produce editorials; the line a newspaper takes has to be met or discussions have to take place. It is the position of one man always, but it is generally brought about by discussion with a reasonable and representative group and the group that I discussed those things with is a group of executives in the Daily Gleaner organization.

They do not decide on every day or exactly every editorial, but they are generally responsible as an editor who writes these things. There is a group and if I am away, they carry along and know what the policy is that the Daily Gleaner has and they do their best to produce with a certain amount of research and cases of observation. That is about it, I think.

Senator Prowse: In the verbal presentation you referred to K. C. Irving as "my great friend". You must have had some discussions with him about things that went on or were going on in New Brunswick.

Brig. Wardell: Well, that may be so, but I did not seem him, although he is a great friend of mine. I have lived in Canada now for 19 years. I do not see him very frequently. I see him from time to time and we discuss everything—obviously anything that comes into your head, but we do not do editorial policy for the Daily Gleaner.

Before he agreed to buy these shares, before that time, we could have discussed the general climate of the news of the world or not.

Senator Prowse: Or New Brunswick.

Brig. Wardell: Obviously.

Senator Prowse: Or New Brunswick, or the news of New Brunswick?

Brig. Wardell: Or the news of New Brunswick.

Senator Prowse: You were at all times conscious of what his thinking was.

Brig. Wardell: No. I was not at all. Good gracious, I would not even see him for perhaps months on end.

Senator Prowse: But as far as anything that came up, he is big enough in New Brunswick that you cannot walk around without bumping into him. You could not be in the province without knowing his attitude on any subject.

Brig. Wardell: Are you suggesting, sir, that that influenced me?

Senator Prowse: No. I am just suggesting that you were aware of the facts.

Brig. Wardell: I am just saying if that is the insinuation from your question, the answer is no; he did not influence me ever, or try to ever.

Senator Prowse: All right. On the 14th of October, 1965, in the Daily Gleaner, you had an editorial referring to "the extraordinary barrage of publicity produced by K. C. Irving and those who support him in Saint John, to bring about a last ditch revision of the harbour bridge scheme must be startling to those not conversant with the use of all the media of public information to create the impact of an idea."

Brig. Wardell: I wrote that, sir.

Senator Prowse: All right, then, fine. Thirdly, "the use of all media for the purpose of recruiting public opinion on the subject of intense public interest is a democratic process which should be encouraged".

Brig. Wardell: I agree.

Senator Prowse: Mr. Irving used the media for the purpose, his own purposes there.

Brig. Wardell: No; he did not use it. He thought and his sons thought and his executives thought, many people thought, that a great mistake was being made with an immense expenditure. I do not know Saint John well enough to know whether he was right or not.

I think he probably was right that there was an immense amount of muddle in the establishment of some very expensive bridges. Mr. Carter, who is a lawyer, mobilized public opinion and he used every possible means of declaring what the criticisms were.

I am bound to say I was sent a barrage of publicity; it happens about almost every thing that happens in life, an immense amount of stuff, put out by what you call public relations organizations. It comes flowing through.

Now, I got this from Mr. Carter. Sitting down there and then, wrote a little homily which said what an amazing thing it is; here is something which may be tremendously important to the people of Saint John; that they should look into this thing and see whether it is right or whether a terrible mistake is being made or what a wonderful thing to see the tremendous barrage of publicity which is presenting this thing for observation and criticism.

I said that is the exercise of the democratic processes. It is a very, very good thing, too.

Mr. Irving never asked me or no member of his family ever asked me to say that; Mr. Carter did. I think it was rightly said.

Now I could only say this as one last final word. In spite of all that great effort of all of the media, everything showing the dangers, they did exactly what they were going to do and they had absolutely no effect whatsoever.

Senator Prowse: There may be a lesson in that.

Let us go to something else. Your paper I think carried...

Mr. Costello: Mr. Chairman, I think it should be clarified that Brigadier Wardell is absolutely wrong in his assumption, made in that editorial. The great barrage of publicity was created by reporting of news and a reporting of a citizens' committee and its fight to stop the construction of a bridge.

It did make a great deal of news. There were special meetings of the common council and this committee did make statements and called for the committee to rise and stop this. It failed with a great barrage of publicity. It was caused by the reporting of what took place and what was taking place in the city and their great barrage of support was so strong by those people, the proponents of the bridge at the time that it did, in fact, go through.

There was no use of the media for anything other than publicizing what was taking place in the city of Saint John. Brigadier Wardell, from the distance of Fredericton on that occasion, and on that occasion only, did not know what he was talking about.

Senator Prowse: You have conducted a very aggressive campaign in your newspaper against pornography on the news stands. Was it successful?

Brig. Wardell: Absolutely unsuccessful. The only thing it does do, is make people occasionally say that something is going to be done about it, of course, it is a terrible truth that of course, it is a sort of Mafia-controlled filth industry that you can go into, probably today.

When those editorials were written, you could go into a book store, a news stand, and in Fredericton and find filth that you would not believe could possibly be printed, it is so utterly foul.

Senator Prowse: I think we are aware of this now.

Brig. Wardell: Every now and then, we whip up a little conscience on this matter. I would like to see something more.

Senator Prowse: Well what about advertising? On the Maritime Magazine program of May 30, 1969, which is the CBC radio and TV program down there, Donald Cameron did a little thing in which he tells that on a particular day you had an editorial complaining about the Governor General's awards in literature for 1968 having been given to Mortiky Richler for his novel Cocksure, and the collection of essays, Hunting Tigers Under Glass, and a collection of poems and you go on to object to that.

But he says that on the page opposite that...

Brig. Wardell: Have you read those poems?

Senator Prowse: No.

Brig. Wardell: Filthy.

Senator Prowse: Would you mind listening to the question? I take it that they were not filthy enough to stop you reading them.

Brig. Wardell: I read them because it is my professional duty.

Senator Prowse: We all have excused ourselves in some way.

Now, right opposite your editorial page, there was an ad for the Capitol Theater: "Now playing, at 2.00 p.m. and 8.00 p.m., beautiful young moonlighting wives rock and shock the city with unprintable scandal. This group of beautiful, young, exciting women touched off a moral scandal that stunned veteran vice squad police officers, startled and embarrassed seasoned newspaper reporters, shattered and shamed the whole city. Sorry; we cannot show you scenes from this movie in our ad. We do not want to offend shy or prudish people. Nothing is cut out. Nothing is hushed up. Nothing is covered up. Nothing is left to your imagination. This program is recommended for adults, a raw and jarring motion picture about shameless women filmed in color, as it really happened. Moonlighting Wives restricted to 18 and over."

"Also playing 'It is Hot in Paradise, a new experience in daring love and evil desires for mature adults.'"

Did it ever occur to you that that ad and that motion picture might be as bad as the books and magazines that other people were selling?

Brig. Wardell: You see, I am quite certain that it was not. You have not seen the sort of pornography that I am talking about in the books. You could not possibly film it by any stretch of the imagination. Secondly, I did not write those...

The Chairman: Have you gone to the movies lately?

Brig. Wardell: I did not like those ridiculous advertisements, but I do not think that we can expect or should perhaps censure advertisements. They come in. They are ridiculous, foolish, and vulgar, but they are not pornographic. They are just downright silly.

Senator Prowse: I am going to ask you one last question.

Brig. Wardell: I would like to make another statement. Reading out, what has been used by that gentleman who said that the Daily Gleaner was the stupidest paper, that it was always worrying about pornography, it was edited by an old fool of an English colonel—and by God, he looked like it.

Maybe he is right. I have heard so many things. He manufactured that bit of witicism and he carried it on until it was put into the students magazines saying the same thing.

Senator Prowse: I would like to ask you one last question as far as I am concerned. You said something about the New Brunswick Mining and Smelting and you said the government deal made in passing it over to Noranda was a terrible giveaway. Is that right?

Brig. Wardell: Absolutely; yes.

Senator Prowse: But you did not print anything about it at the time?

Brig. Wardell: Well, we did not know about it.

Senator Prowse: When did you first find out about it?

Brig. Wardell: We did not really know about it until the meeting in Saint John and we published quite a full story.

Senator Prowse: At that time.

Brig. Wardell: Very shortly after. You see, this I asked Mr. Irving—you ask him; he will tell you all about it. The handover was in March, I think, 1967, and there was an annual meeting in Saint John in the early part of the summer and the thing had to be ratified at that time and I wanted to get the story.

I could not get the story very clearly from anybody at that time. I got a lawyer's version of it, and then we sent a report to the annual meeting and we worked—it was a very complicated story.

It was not easy. We ran it very considerably as soon as we knew it. Believe me, I wanted it very much indeed. There was no question of not printing that story. I wanted it more than any.

The Chairman: Senator Bourque.

Senator Bourque: I just wanted to ask the Brigadier, he said that Lord Thomson became a British citizen so as to become a Lord. Are you aware, sir, that there is a Canadian who is a member of the British House of Lords, the present Lord Shaunessey? He inherited the title from his late English father. He lives in Montreal and is a Canadian.

Brig. Wardell: I am, but the original Lord—

The Chairman: I am of course grateful to Senator Bourque for his statement and for your explanation. I am wondering, I think perhaps we might have the final questioning of the day. Mr. Fortier has one or two questions and then we will adjourn.

Mr. Fortier: Brigadier Wardell, I read in your brief that the freedom of the press is the freedom to own, edit, print, publish and sell a newspaper, without interfering or coercion from governments at any level.

Would you please tell the committee what obligations go with this freedom?

Brig. Wardell: Oh, tremendous obligations. Obligations to publish, so far as is possible, nothing but the truth; to not ever distort news; to give an opportunity for dissenters to express their views; and generally to produce a fair and accurate newspaper.

It is a tremendous responsibility. I did not put that side in because I think it goes so obviously.

Mr. Fortier: Have you ever had reason to believe that a majority of the people of Fredricton wished for another type of newspaper?

Brig. Wardell: Well, that is possible. It is perfectly right and proper that the newspaper should be criticized; also perfectly true that anybody if they think that way, if they want to write criticism or say anything disagreeable about the Daily Gleaner they are given every opportunity to do so, always and invariably.

There are some very rude things being printed now. If they want to start another newspaper of their own, they are quite at liberty to do so. The task would be a long and a very expensive one.

Mr. Fortier: How do you manage to take the pulse of your readers? By what?

Brig. Wardell: Well, in many ways, particularly in a community of that size. One hears gossip. Also one listens to editors, and in some instances, reporters. You see, we have quite a staff of reporters who are going out and many of them are talking to people every day. They come back and we are encouraged if they suggest criticism.

Information is coming in every day. Then in the long run, perhaps we can say that the sales are the strongest measure of the stature of the Daily Gleaner in that area. It may, perhaps be the greatest saturation of any place in Canada.

It is only a fairly small city, you see, and we hear if people are disgusted, or annoyed with the newspaper taking a line which is contrary to what they believe. Mind you, our line has not always been conservative, by any means.

Mr. Fortier: With your experience in journalism, both in Canada and in England, Brigadier Wardell, would you say that competition between newspapers makes for better newspapers? In any given community?

Brig. Wardell: I would not say that altogether. I would say it is brought about, it has brought about the ruin of many good newspapers. It is just as easy as that. You cannot get—in most cities of considerable size now—you cannot run two newspapers. You can in Ottawa because Ottawa is the capital of Canada.

But you cannot in a city of up to something in the order of 250,000. I do not think you can run two newspapers economically. I think you have got to strangle one or the other. You see, the cost of the newspapers have risen so.

Mr. Fortier: Could you give a minimum figure of 200,000 dollars, I should say, inhabitants in a community?

Brig. Wardell: That was a figure just taken out of my hat, 250,000. That is very minimal. I think it would be hard to find that. The two newspapers would exist certainly.

Mr. Fortier: In answer to one of Senator Prowse's questions, where he read extracts from the movie advertisements, you said that is why it was very difficult for you to exercise any control over the contents of an ad. Did you really mean that?

Brig. Wardell: I did not use that expression. I said that I did not think it was right or permissible for a newspaper to censure advertisements. Now that is a great foreshortening of an argument. Certainly, if there was something that is really obscene or even at all obscene, certainly it should be kicked out.

But if it is merely vulgar and stupid, I do not think that the role of the newspaper publisher is to say, "My dear sir, your advertisement is damned silly."

Mr. Fortier: If it is vulgar, you accept to publish it?

Brig. Wardell: Well, it depends again; vulgar can have many meanings, many interpretations and uses. If it is merely vulgar, merely silly, I do not think it has anything to do with me.

Mr. Fortier: You accept it?

Brig. Wardell: I would not even see it. I would not personally see it at all. The advertising manager would see it. He would not bring it to me simply because it was a gross statement. If it were libel or defamatory in nature or obscene, certainly you could say that we will not publish.

Mr. Fortier: But if it does not break any law, the contents of the advertisement will not be screened by your advertising editors; is that correct?

Brig. Wardell: It should not be. That is my view. I do not think you should stop it. It would be a gross imposition if he did because what I consider...

Mr. Fortier: I find it difficult to reconcile that with the anti-smut campaign.

Brig. Wardell: Do you? Well, there is no difficulty, I assure you.

Senator Prowse: One didn't cost you anything.

Brig. Wardell: Well, that is one way of looking at it.

The Chairman: I think that, Brigadier Wardell, on behalf of the members of the committee, I should say thank you and I should couple with that a re-expression of my appreciation to Mr. Costello and his associates and also to you, Mr. Irving.

It has been a long afternoon for you and for us. We apologize for that.

For the record, there was a discussion early on this afternoon. There was some in camera material. I think that Senator Prowse has decided that we can waive that.

Senator Prowse: I think we have enough information.

The Chairman: If additional information is needed, we may be in touch with you.

For the benefit of the members of the committee, may I outline tomorrow's schedule. We will be in this room, at 10 a.m.

Senator McElman: Before you leave this subject, please, there are a couple of other facts that should go on today's record of this committee hearing.

The Chairman: Are they brief and to the point?

Senator McElman: They are brief announcements.

The Chairman: First I shall outline tomorrow's schedule. At 10 a.m., Corriere Canadese, the Italian language daily newspaper in Toronto; 2:30 tomorrow afternoon, the Indian Eskimo Association, the Association of National Indian Brotherhood and the Canadian Metis Society; 8 o'clock tomorrow night, the Associated English Media Journalists in the Province of Quebec.

Senator McElman: Mr. Chairman, in fairness to the committee itself, it should be part of the record that my request for the investigation by the Combines Branch took place prior to the formation of this committee.

Secondly, I was asked to join the committee sometime after that.

Thirdly, I knew nothing further about the investigation by the Combines Branch until it was published by Brigadier Wardell.

Fourth, it has been suggested that I have been attacking Mr. Irving. That is not the case. I have not raised questions about Mr. Irving's many numerous and—for New Brunswick—wonderful enterprises. I have raised questions about the involvement of his monopoly ownership of the media in New Brunswick.

Thank you very much, sir.

The Chairman: Thank you.
The meeting is adjourned.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Wednesday, December 17, 1969

The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 10 a.m.

Senator Keith Davey (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, this morning we are receiving a brief from Corriere Canadese, which is a new daily newspaper in the City of Toronto. Sitting on my immediate right is the chairman of the board of Daisons Press Limited, and the publisher of Corriere Canadese, Mr. Daniel Iannuzzi.

And sitting on Mr. Iannuzzi's right is Mr. James Wallace Thompson, who is the marketing director of Corriere Canadese.

Gentlemen, the brief we requested from you was received as requested some three weeks in advance of the hearing.

The brief has been circulated to the members of the committee and has been studied by the members of the committee, and I think for the purpose of our discussion this morning we will take it as read.

If you wish, perhaps you could now make a preliminary statement in which you can summarize the content of your brief, explain it, expand upon it, or indeed you can talk about anything else that you may wish. You will have 15 minutes for that purpose and I will notify you at the 10 minute mark.

You don't have to use all the time, but following your preliminary statement the Senators would like to question you on the content of your brief, on things that you may say and things which you may not say at all.

Mr. Iannuzzi?

Submission of: CORRIERE CANADESE

By Mr. D. A. Iannuzzi, Publisher

Mr. Iannuzzi: Mr. Chairman, Honourable Senators. Thank you for the invitation to be here this morning and to appear before this committee.

I understand this afternoon you will be hearing briefs from the Indian and Eskimo Association. How strange it is that we representing an ethnic group and striving to become Canadians, that the descendants of the earliest Canadians find themselves in a position of an ethnic group.

The mere fact that we represent an ethnic group does not necessarily mean that it is foreign. I think it is important to keep this in mind in any of the discussions that we have this morning.

A great deal of time was put into this brief since it was a question of interpreting an area in the publishing field that is not too familiar to a great many people in this country, as it was only in postwar years that the majority of ethnic publications were born.

This was brought about of course as outlined in the brief by a need for some form of communication that newcomers require when they come to Canada.

The contacts that they find in Canada must be interpreted to them in a way that they can overcome some of the barriers which this country has in comparison with other countries, especially the communist countries.

Generally speaking, the ethnic press has some problems which are peculiar to this particular area in that the ethnic press as such—because the majority of them are not privately owned—suffer from internal problems such as personnel, antiquated equipment, loss of circulation and things of that nature.

We of Corriere Canadese in the past 15 years have been on a steady growth primarily because of the community itself; the large numbers of Italians settling in Ontario have given us this possibility since the market is forever expanding.

Eighteen months ago, we decided that it was necessary to supply a means of communication for this particular market. The lack of radio and television in this particular field made it necessary for us to do extensive research to justify a daily newspaper in an ethnic group.

We foresee that in the next few years, at least the 70's will probably show that there is an area in which some three or four other ethnic newspapers would probably become daily newspapers. I am talking in the area of German, Ukrainian and Polish.

One of the most important problems that an ethnic daily newspaper has is not so much distribution, mail and so on, but it is the question of finding experienced editorial help.

In our case we were unable to find personnel in Canada, nor had the time to train them ourselves. Therefore, over the past year, I have made extensive trips to Italy and was able to recruit the necessary personnel for our newspaper.

Generally speaking, it is difficult to find bilingual personnel in Italy, so it takes an average of six months before an Italian journalist is acquainted with Canadian facts, Canadian law and so on and so forth. So again, this is an investment on the part of the publication to cover this journalist for at least six months.

From the business side of the ethnic daily newspaper, we outline in our brief the marketing aspect which brings about one of the most important ingredients of a newspaper—advertising. I don't want to sound like Roy Thomson, but with a staff of 117, payday rolls around pretty quickly since we pay them on a weekly basis.

We have spent in the past three years more money in research of our own market—since this did not exist—to give the national advertiser and national advertising agency the market data that they would require in order to have a better understanding of the market in which they were to invest money on behalf of their clients' products.

But in general, advertising agencies give us the impression of being apathetic toward ethnic newspapers for the simple reason that, first of all, there is an image that the ethnic newspaper is a poorly printed, a four to six page newspaper somewhere on Queen Street in the back of a bookstore.

True, this may have been the case in some of the small western towns prior to the last war, but I have been associated with the ethnic press since we founded the association back in 1954-55. The quality of their paper is much better today, but of course this again was brought about by the fact that they were able to receive sufficient advertising to permit them to make these changes, to better the quality of their editorial content, to switch from maybe letter press to offset, and so on and so forth.

Getting back to the advertising agencies, in the past six months, we have in Toronto told our story to some 416 agency personnel. We think that this may have given them an insight into the market, but still they are reluctant to really pass on this information to their clients.

As a daily newspaper today, as an ethnic newspaper, we still do not receive anywhere near the amount of national advertising of publications half our size in Canada.

The apathetic attitude of agencies originates in other sources as well. To place advertising in a newspaper in a language other than French or English requires different production procedures.

A few years back, the attitude of the advertising agencies towards the French press in Canada was no different than it is today towards the ethnic press. Up until a few years ago, the French press was receiving advertising, it was simply translated for production and sent to the newspapers.

Today, no responsible French language newspaper, at least to my knowledge, will accept a straight translation of an English advertisement and I think this is a good thing. It is a good thing because you are reaching the market the way it should be reached in the language which they understand. An advertising agency in that case is rendering a service to his clients.

In the case of the ethnic press, this was one of the things we tried to get across to the advertising agencies in the last six months. With the market data we had and with the experience our staff had accumulated over the past 15 years, we are in a position to supply the advertising agency. There is no reason why advertising in an ethnic newspaper—or the Italian one for that matter—should be a straight translation of English advertising.

An example of this was the recent OHSP campaign by the Department of Health in the Province of Ontario prior to the changes in their Medicare. There was a great deal of money spent on the advertising telling the citizens of Ontario: "Don't worry; you are covered."

I am not trying to get political here, but the fact is the illustration in this particular advertisement was a fellow sitting in a hammock, or lying in a hammock and there was some copy to go with it.

Now, this particular advertisement simply translated into an Italian newspaper would certainly not convey the message. There is no such thing as a hammock in Italy and this is no way for an Italian to relax. There was no thought put into this particular advertisement.

So it conveyed the wrong message and it was a question of waste when it could have been thought out a little bit more and really rendered a service to the client.

In this case it was the Ontario government and in this case again, it was public funds.

Usually, the agency must rely on translators employed by the newspapers. This is true. In our advertising rate, all translations are done free of charge since we are working with the language; we know our readers and therefore we can assist the agency in translating or re-writing copy that will sell or at least inform.

Checking the accuracy of the advertising is difficult. In many instances the translation will have subtle shadings which stem from certain regions or dialects. This is true.

In our particular case, we are reaching a market that comes from some 18 regions in Italy, speaking some 40-odd dialects, and thank God there is one thing in common, and that is that the language is only written one way and spoken one way if it is spoken correctly.

For an agency to surrender control of production would be a prime factor in the agency's attitude towards the ethnic newspapers and its reluctance to place advertising, rather than the reasons sometimes given.

Now, our national reps met over some three months with the advertising executives—they said: Your rates are too high; or, can you guarantee your readership? Your people don't read newspapers; your readers don't buy my client's product; they see it on television. These are usually questions or answers that an account executive gives when he is really not familiar with the market.

The closest he ever got to the Italian community was his barber. This is true. It has happened so many times. I just didn't think that there were that many Italian barbers.

It is difficult for all members of the ethnic press to do the amount of research that is required in the market that we have had done. In the past few years D.B.S. did not supply too much information on ethnic origin. Therefore, it is necessary for a newspaper in an ethnic field to gather this information.

Other weekly newspapers in the English language and French language, have associations and the information is gathered for them.

As to other daily newspapers—on a regional basis, the C.D.N.P.A. does a great amount of research for them. I think it is every two years they do a consumer survey. This is material that unfortunately we cannot make use of. We can use it as a comparison, but certainly it will not sell our market.

The first thing that any new ethnic language daily newspaper would have to do in this particular field is to spend a good portion of its financial investment in the area of marketing research and marketing procedures. I think it is necessary for the publisher to know his market.

On that subject, I would like to add that last June, July and August, myself and my new managing director who for 17 years was the managing director of Rome's leading daily newspaper, El Tempo, spent three months in the City of Toronto where there are some 8 or 10 Italian concentrations. There is no ghetto but there are concentrations spread throughout the metropolitan area.

We had set up a trailer—a mobile newsroom type situation—and we would go out three days a week, pre-advertising our own publication on radio and that we would be in a certain shopping centre and in a certain area. We spent the day talking with our potential readers or the Italian people that lived in that particular area, wanting to know exactly what were their problems, how did they feel in Canada, what would they want in a new publication such as ours—although we were publishing at the time just three times a week. And I may say that I doubt if very few publishers in Canada today would be willing to risk the time and the close contact with the reader to really find out what the citizens of a community really want in a newspaper.

It was most gratifying for me personally because our publication, from the results that we gathered from our own market data and from this contact with the readers, was able to strike what we feel is an excellent product.

The judgment of this being that the forecast circulation for our daily newspaper for six months—we have been able to achieve in a little over three months. So again, I repeat, it is a question of market—knowing your market and having the information to go with it.

One area—in the press reports on the Senate hearing, one area in which we didn't touch too heavily was the question of freedom of the press and the press council.

On the question of the press council, we feel that it's a new concept here in Canada, and like any new concept it comes about as a result of a need. We are not aware of any need. In fact, I personally have never been conversant on the subject of press councils. I have just returned from London and tried to inform myself a little bit on the question of press councils and what some of the actions have been and how useful they have been.

But the first mention came in the guidelines that were supplied to us. We gather that you must have some overwhelming mail and petitions from the public for such a council or you would have never suggested it in your guidelines for this hearing.

If this is the case, then we concur that a press council is necessary in Canada. However, until such evidence is produced, we must be governed by our close association with our readers.

This I just mentioned a few moments ago. When you have that feeling you know who you are talking to, and you are able to service them and satisfy them. I think this is one of the best guidelines there is.

This close association with the readers leads us to believe that they are truly and honestly served by our newspaper. Fortunately, a newspaper is in a position of an elected opinion rather than an appointed opinion with the result that it must face its electorate every day. It maintains its position only as long as it honestly provides a service in the interest of its electorate or its readers.

In this concept, its electorate pass their votes against it by transferring their allegiance to another newspaper, and this happens every day. This could happen to our newspaper tomorrow because in our own market there are three other newspapers. Although they are weekly, they could eventually become daily newspapers, if we did not protect our investment by serving the people in the best interest of the community.

I seriously doubt that if Corriere Canadese existed within the framework of a press council that it would have little merit, let alone the opportunity, to sit here before you and express myself as freely as I have this morning.

Thank you very much.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Iannuzzi. May I ask you two questions just at the start. What is the circulation of the paper now?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Some 22,000.

The Chairman: 22,000 a day?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Yes.

The Chairman: Secondly, would it be possible when you return to Toronto to send for example today's edition to the Senators? I think we have only one on file—I have seen the paper often, but I think it would be useful if the Senators could see it.

I realize that probably they won't be able to understand it, but I think it would be useful if they could see the paper.

Mr. Iannuzzi: Yes.

The Chairman: Also before I turn to the Senators for questioning, I would point out to the Senators and to you that on the 11th February, we will be having a day, much of which will be devoted to the study of the ethnic press in Canada. We will have presentations from the Ethnic Press Federation and there will be hopefully some type of forum in which we can discuss the role and function of the ethnic press generally.

All of which is not to preclude questions this morning about the ethnic press generally, but Mr. Iannuzzi is here less as a representative of the ethnic press than as a daily newspaper publisher, so I just hope you might be mindful of that in your questioning.

Senator Prowse: Have you felt that you had some success in working out with the advertising agencies this problem of translation, which I would imagine is their big problem? Their reluctance may hinge on the fact that they don't know how to write an ad?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Well, we have stressed this.

Senator Prowse: Have you received any useful reaction?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Yes. We are probably doing more translation now.

Senator Prowse: For them?

Mr. Iannuzzi: We have more Italian advertising from national agencies than we had in the past, but it is a slow process.

Senator Prowse: Most processes are that require a new adaptation.

Mr. Iannuzzi: Yes.

Senator Prowse: I haven't had the opportunity to see your paper but what is the emphasis on the news? Basically, are you trying to bring them the news from their region in Italy?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Well, we are in effect a Canadian newspaper in the Italian language.

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Mr. Iannuzzi: We cover all areas that the average daily newspaper in Canada would have to cover in order to inform its public and its readers on what is happening around them, both on the national and local scene. But there are areas such as old country news...

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Mr. Iannuzzi: I don't mean old news.

Senator Prowse: No.

Mr. Iannuzzi: Old country news from those areas—from which the majority of immigrants or Italian immigrants came to Canada. This is why we have had to set up an editorial office in Rome. We have some 60-odd regional correspondents throughout Italy. These are full time journalists with other newspapers in their own areas. They supply us copy on a daily or weekly basis.

We carry more sports than the average daily newspaper. This is because we must get involved in European sports and primarily Italian soccer, which carries a 39-week schedule...

Senator Prowse: It is probably the only place in Canada where you can get a proper report on a soccer game.

Mr. Iannuzzi: This is right. We cover the four main divisions in Italy. We have the wire news services that supply us with some of the information and the rest is done by telephone and we re-write it in Toronto.

On Monday mornings, we carry five pages of sports. This is more than the Globe and Mail does. This is because it is a requirement for a large segment of our readership.

The Chairman: How much of that, Mr. Iannuzzi, is Canadian sport; hockey and things of that nature.

Mr. Iannuzzi: We cover hockey.

The Chairman: Of the five pages?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Of the five pages, probably about a page and a half.

Senator Prowse: What would be the rough percentage or could you give us this, of the amount of Italian news as compared with Canadian news that you carry? Don't misunderstand me. If you are going to sell your paper you have to give people things they are interested in and the people want the home town news—I am aware of that. I am wondering how much, or what is the percentage of these two?

The Chairman: If I might just intervene here. There is a third dimension surely, and that is international news, which is neither Italian or Canadian. Where are you classifying that in your question?

Senator Prowse: Well, I think he understands what I mean.

Mr. Iannuzzi: What you call Canadian news—the distinction between Canadian news and local?

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Mr. Iannuzzi: That's what you were talking about?

Senator Prowse: Yes. What I have in mind is generally the type of news—what would be the percentage of the news that comes from the local areas in Italy—that has an Italian context—what would be the type of things that they were looking for, because after all, you have to have this association for your own comfort, don't you?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Yes.

Senator Prowse: The second thing would be news that had to do specifically with the Canadian scene. I wasn't too concerned with the international.

Mr. Iannuzzi: It's not too difficult for us, since in our newspaper's formula all pages are departmentalized, and this is where we differ from most Canadian daily newspapers.

We set up a page and a heading for every page, so that when it comes to Italian news as an example, we will have Italian news and Italian features, and therefore that would take up two pages on that particular day.

We also have a page which has the latest news from Canada and a local page which is Toronto news or Metro news, and we have another page from other cities in Canada which gives us three page a day—to use figures—of Canadian content versus two of Italian content. So it is about three to two.

I can show you a copy right now to illustrate exactly what I am saying. The rest is on features and international news and theatre and so on. The regular components of a daily newspaper.

Senator Prowse: The reason I asked the question was that I noted in your research material that there is a tendency for the second generation in particular in the younger people to be more interested in what is now their local area, which is Canada.

Mr. Iannuzzi: This is true.

Senator Prowse: Do you anticipate a transitional period with your paper where gradually as your people have been here longer and become more and more integrated and familiar with the Canadian scene, that the emphasis may come to where that will have to be the main thrust of your efforts?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Definitely. If we expect to hold on to our readers, we must change with them. Prior to going daily, we made a study of all the changes we have made in the last 15 years, and we looked at the product 15 years later and there was no way that we can compare the first edition which had a high content of Italian news.

The majority of the immigrants that have come here in the last 10 or 15 years, their children are now in school. This is why we have increased our Canadian content and local content to this extent and I expect it to increase again in the early part of the year when, as I mentioned in my preamble, we will start publishing some English content in our paper.

We will not get involved in hard news since this is an area covered by daily newspapers in our own market,—but generally speaking, we will carry some feature materials and articles trying to explain the differences or the gap between the first generation and the second generation Italians in Canada.

In fact, this is an area in which a problem has arisen in the past few years. The generation gap is commonplace.

Senator Prowse: It is not only limited to you.

Mr. Iannuzzi: No, no. More so because we are dealing here with traditions and customs that the first generation want to maintain, and Canada is a country that permits an individual to maintain his language and his customs and his culture. But it makes no allowance for how the second generation is to accept these changes in customs. To the second generation, Canada offers a completely new culture new traditions. As I say, it makes no allowance for how you bridge this thing. This is a problem which is let to the new Canadian family to work out on their own, depending on what regions they come from, and the countries they come from and so on. This is a hardship.

It is more difficult maybe for a Greek family to overcome this gap than it would be for a German family or an Italian family from the north versus the south. These are problems. These are things that a newspaper, an ethnic paper, sometimes must get involved in, because we are closer to the situation and therefore this becomes part of publishing and editing a foreign language newspaper.

Senator Prowse: If I may say a very important part. One of the functions that you see for yourself, is easing the transition of the new immigrant from the one culture, to acclimatize him in a way, to the new one.

Mr. Iannuzzi: Yes, this is right, because our role or the role of the ethnic newspaper should be a question of interpreting the Canadian scene. You do this by interpreting legislation, news and so on on a daily basis without having a writer sit there and saying to him "Now write us a nice piece on this, and we will give them a dose today."

This comes about by getting to them in the news.

Senator Prowse: You use slivers and not a 2 by 4?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Right.

Senator Prowse: How do you see the future in ten years time? Will your paper be in approximately the same format that you see now, or do you foresee any changes?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Well, we hope it will be much larger.

Senator Prowse: Well, from the indications, it probably will be.

Mr. Iannuzzi: No. Great changes of course will come about that our readers from time to time will let us know about and that our market research will bring about.

We are playing heavily on the English content idea because this will enable us to render a better service to a larger segment of the Italian community that unfortunately we are not reaching on a daily basis. We think we will strengthen our ties with our present readers, since they will also have the opportunity, as they are learning English, to read material about themselves, about their community and their country—material that they do not find in a daily newspaper.

As we outline in our preamble, 87 per cent of our readers do not read an English language daily newspaper, but this is to change.

No doubt in the next ten years daily newspapers more and more have interest every day in this particular market since it represents some 12 per cent of a community, which a daily newspaper like the Toronto Star, Telegram and Globe and Mail do not reach every day. I think they are working on it and they should be.

I feel this would not create any problem because since we are reaching this market in a language that they are more comfortable in and reading today with the way of life—reading can become a burden unless we are really comfortable and enjoy the material that we are reading. Otherwise, we misinterpret what is being said so that I think that in the Seventies, by approaching our market with English content, we have given ourselves the additional market required should immigration close tomorrow. An example is a question that my comptroller keeps asking when we are setting up the budget. "What does it look like for immigration" and I tell him "Don't worry about it. We always have about ten or twenty years ahead of us." There are enough problems and things wouldn't change that much for the better if immigration were closed tomorrow.

So I think that we have our work cut out for us. The changes will come about as the market changes and as Canada changes.

Senator Prowse: With your supply of news you say that you get a wire from Rome. Is this an Italian world wide service?

Mr. Dan A. Iannuzzi: We have an international news agency and, of course, as outlined we are also members of the Canadian Press and Associated Press.

Senator Prowse: Do you have any problem in getting membership in Canadian Press?

Mr. Dan Iannuzzi: No. We applied originally for a contract for the news and I might say that they were most helpful in assisting us and giving us consideration for the fact that the material had to be translated. The rate given to us, of course, was a little high for an ethnic newspaper—not for the average daily newspaper that would use tape material and would go straight to linotype but in our case this was an investment. It had to be in order to responsibly report the national news—something that we were not able to do. Our rate drops on the 22nd of this month and as of the 1st of January, after the annual meeting, we are in effect the 104th member for the Canadian Press.

Senator Prowse: I gather from the little I know about research work, that you spent considerable sums in order to get what you hoped, and I would hope it would be accepted as reliable research. Has this helped to satisfy the advertising agencies as to your readership?

Mr. Dan A. Iannuzzi: Well, the proof will be in the pudding. In 1970 we will have to see what happens then.

Senator Prowse: You will have to wait and see?

Mr. Dan A. Iannuzzi: Yes. Presently I think we can give you a figure there, or breakdown of advertising. For example, we carry about 6% national advertising, 50% retail or local advertising and 44% classified. We have one of the largest classified sections in the metropolitan area, aside from the Toronto Star. Basically in the past 15 years it was the hard core. The merchant that really had daily contact with the market really made the investment and it was they that really sponsored this newspaper indirectly. This is the source of our revenue.

Presently, we are carrying some half million lines of advertising per month which is slightly below some of the newspapers in markets our size and with our circulation. We would expect that if we did our homework back in the summer, the effect on advertising agencies, will bring about in the Seventies, at least an increase that would if nothing else cover the cost of the information.

Senator Prowse: Does much of your circulation go outside of the actual Toronto market or are you concentrated pretty well on that?

Mr. Dan A. Iannuzzi: The first thing we had to do of course—we had a number of regional newspapers—I shouldn't say regional newspapers—regional editions—and prior to our decision to go a daily it was a question of merging them back into one newspaper and setting ourselves up primarily in the Toronto market and in some of the larger Italian markets in Ontario, such as Windsor, Northern Ontario, Sudbury, Sault Ste. Marie, Hamilton, etcetera. We now carry regional news from these areas. We are stringers and we would expect sometime in February or March to set up regional bureaus and get involved in the regional sections but still maintaining the one publication with greater circulation in these areas so that we eventually feel that within some three years, it would be a national Italian daily newspaper.

The Chairman: Mr. Iannuzzi, can I ask you what kind of relationship you enjoy with each of the other three daily newspapers in Toronto? Are they your competitors?

Mr. Dan A. Iannuzzi: No. I thought I illustrated that a few moments ago. Over the years there has always been an excellent relationship with daily newspapers. They have always supplied material free of charge.

The Chairman: Is that true of each one of the three daily newspapers in Toronto?

Mr. Iannuzzi: All except maybe the Globe and Mail. They charge us but, of course, they are a business publication and newspapering is a business.

The Chairman: But the Star and Telegram are more cooperative, are they?

Mr. Iannuzzi: The Star and Telegram are most cooperative, yes. They are the most cooperative of the three daily newspapers in Toronto.

Mr. James Wallace Thompson: May I make a comment on that?

The Chairman: Certainly.

Mr. Thompson: We find ourselves in the very enviable position of being a rather ram-bunctious child where the established daily newspapers are concerned. It is a position that we enjoy. Most of the daily newspapers go out of their way to be cooperative with us.

The Chairman: What percentage of your advertising is local and what percentage is national?

Mr. Iannuzzi: About 50 per cent.

The Chairman: It runs 50 per cent does it?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Yes. 50 per cent is retail and the rest is classified ads and national.

The Chairman: If I am interested in advertising locally, or nationally for that matter, to the Italian market in Toronto, what choice of media do I have? You mentioned three other weeklies?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Two weeklies and a monthly.

The Chairman: Might I consider using them. Are they competition for you?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Not really but probably everything is competition if you want to get right down to it. The other newspapers—they are not serving the market.

The Chairman: Well, let me put the question in reverse then. Do they regard you as competition?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Yes, I think they do.

The Chairman: The Senators may not realize those who aren't from Toronto—that we have a radio station in Toronto which is substantially dedicated to ethnic broadcasting—and of the ethnic broadcasting it does, I suppose, most is in Italian. Are you competitive with them and are they competitive with you and do the advertisers use both?

Mr. Iannuzzi: In some instances. Radio, of course, as a facility of allowing the station to sell what we call packages and so on and so forth which is something that a newspaper really can't do because of the basic cost. And in a newspaper if you increase your advertising you increase your cost, of course. In radio for the little experience that I have had in it you start off with your basic cost and you have a lot of time to sell. Within the regulations set up by the C.R.T.C., a station can permit itself—although it has a rate card of $20 per spot—it can really go out today and sell them all for a dollar for the particular reason that the time is going by whether we sell something today or not. Now, this can be considered unfair competition in some particular areas.

The Chairman: I gather from something you said, you did use, or you do use CHIN to promote the newspaper?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Yes.

The Chairman: Do they carry your logs or timetables or schedules?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Do we carry theirs?

The Chairman: No, do you carry theirs?

Mr. Iannuzzi: No.

The Chairman: Do they advertise in your newspaper?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Not at the present time. They did at one time.

The Chairman: There is some Italian television coming into the Toronto market I believe from CHCH. . .

Mr. Iannuzzi: That terminated a few weeks ago. Their policy has changed.

The Chairman: Why has it changed?

Mr. Iannuzzi: All we received was a two paragraph memo.

The Chairman: There is no more Italian programming on television coming into Toronto?

Mr. Iannuzzi: No. On Channel 9 they carry a one hour programme on Sunday and there is a national sponsor which carries on Channel 11 a half hour American programme that was dubbed into Italian.

The Chairman: Who is the national sponsor?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Toronto Macaroni. Any ethnic programme that is done on either radio or television—the little that is being done on television—is not being done on CBC facilities. Toronto has one French language station which has the lowest ratings in Canada and I would like to go on record that we feel that there is a certain waste there of the facilities that could certainly serve the interests of the people in Toronto, not only the Italian language but certainly a number of other languages that are not served by radio at all, let alone television.

Sometimes CJBC carries this programming still from CBC Radio in Montreal and to a great extent. I speak French; I was born in Montreal, and occasionally I listen to this programme and I am darned sure that the few French Canadians that are in Toronto are not too interested in the farm broadcast that is coming out of Montreal, talking about Rimouski and the increase in production of potatoes and tomatoes and so on. I think that there are greater problems at the CBC's facilities, which as far as power is concerned, is one of the strongest stations in Toronto. I think the CBC should look into this and see if it is not possible to assist in servicing the market. True, there is an ethnic radio station in Montreal and there is one in Toronto. They are not fully multi-lingual stations but these are stations that are given certain considerations on higher percentages allowable to normal radio stations from 15 to 40 per cent of foreign content and are still bilingual and I think this is a good thing.

I think radio should be bilingual the same way it works in our way as a bilingual language newspaper. The problem is that an ethnic radio station in a metropolitan area, in most cases, sell broker time; and, if I may explain that for the Senators, that is where a radio station will sell to a broker or a producer such as myself one hour of C time, Sunday morning, late Saturday afternoon, Wednesday night when hockey is on—this type of thing, at a cost—and I can table this—at a cost which is higher than that which a leading national advertiser can buy from the station through an agency paying the 15 per cent and having included the production charges as set up by the radio stations.

The Chairman: Yes, I can confirm that.

Mr. Iannuzzi: So that we bring about a situation where a broker, in order to satisfy his audience, in order to be on radio, and I will take one of the smallest ones—some Latvian group that wants to have radio programming one time a week on Sunday morning. They are forced to sell advertising and to use the maximum allowed by the C.R.T.C. At this particular point we are down to a situation of commercial, record, commercial, record, commercial, record and the programme is over.

With CBC's facilities even if this situation must continue, and I don't think it should, then the CBC could supply material—which these stations unfortunately are not in a position to supply—Canadian content. There is material being produced by the CBC that could be translated and produced, once again, in the languages that this country has available.

Today in the Metropolitan area, in both Toronto and Montreal—we won't get involved in some of the Western cities—all other ethnic programming, unless we want to consider Toronto and Montreal as monopolies—to use a word that has been thrown around here for the past few days—there is a situation where there is one station supplying ethnic programming, either producing it itself or brokering the time. All other programmes—and this is where the statistics don't really tell the truth when we look at how much ethnic programming there is in Toronto—you can total it up and it would be somewhere around 55 hours—all this programming is done on fringe stations. We get involved in Brampton, Welland, Oakville, and Oshawa. These are all stations with one to five thousand watts in their own area so that a listener in Toronto in order to hear an Italian programme, other than the one he receives should he not be satisfied, must listen to something on a squeaky radio and so on and so forth, and that the broker in that particular area is paying for time again, higher than the stations who at one time did allow programming such as CKFH and CHIN and so on and so forth. All these stations made policy changes because their market changed and there was no need for ethnic programmes. It served the purpose at the time. It paid the rent and with that kind of money, why shouldn't it?

As the market changed and as everyone tried to reach for number one and number two spot, all ethnic programming was cancelled and, of course, most contracts as you know, allow for 15 days notice so you can have a situation where a broker may be carrying anywhere from two to ten hours a week of language programming on a radio station and within 15 to 30 days notice of the policy change on the radio station the programme no longer exists and there are no advertising contracts and so on and so forth.

The Chairman: I think it should be observed and would you agree that people who do ethnic programmes on a brokerage basis are not the only people who suffer this type of treatment. That is being forced to buy no prime time at prime time rates. Other groups who are treated the exact same way are certainly religious programming and the exact same treatment is given to religious broadcasting and indeed to politicians.

Mr. Iannuzzi: Well, it is not so bad as far as religious programming is concerned. I think we have to break this down into certain areas.

The Chairman: Fine.

Mr. Iannuzzi: One is the religious programmes on Sunday morning from within the community. This is not too bad because this is the right time for a religious service but on the other hand there are religious programmes which radio stations are paid for from US...

The Chairman: And for which they are paid religiously.

Mr. Iannuzzi: They are paid for by different sects in the United States and this programming...

The Chairman: And in Canada.

Mr. Iannuzzi: Yes, in Western Canada—in Alberta and so on. Well, this is ideal as far as time is concerned. I think Sunday morning and late Saturday evening is a good time for let's say the Bible Hour but on the other hand, on the television, the little bit of television there is both in Montreal—and how strange things work out that way—both in Toronto and Montreal the one or two hours of television takes anywhere from 10.30 a.m. to noon. This is the bracket in which they are in, a time when most Italians—in this case most in Montreal and Toronto would be in church. This is the time that they normally go to church so there is a toss-up there whether they stay home and watch television or really go to church.

Senator Prowse: Then, if you have a good programme, you are going to be in trouble with the church.

Mr. Iannuzzi: Well, I think this is something. We are not in the television end of the thing but I think that if I put myself in his position—here he is sitting on a film of an excellent soccer game that would be taking a full hour of his programming. How does he advertise it in our newspaper. Well, he says you stay home on Sunday morning between 10.30 and 11.30 and we are going to air this programme because this in the only facility available.

The Chairman: Well, we don't want to go on endlessly on this. What you are saying is, Mr. Iannuzzi, in your opinion the CBC should get into ethnic broadcasting?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Well, they should make the facilities available.

The Chairman: So that we are perfectly clear on the record here you are not suggesting that the CBC shouldn't be doing French broadcasting in the Toronto area?

Mr. Iannuzzi: No.

The Chairman: You are saying that they should be doing ethnic broadcasting?

Mr. Iannuzzi: I think that in the Toronto area the French programming should get its rightful percentage of a public facility.

Senator Prowse: What is the population in the Toronto metropolitan area that you would consider as your potential market?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Well, the Toronto Italian population—280,000 of which some 172,000 are really Italians—Italian speaking and Italian reading—and this is our market. The Italian population of Ontario is somewhere around 475,000 and this would bring it up to somewhere around 240 or 250,000 Italian speaking and Italian reading and this is the market area that we serve.

Senator McElman: Just as a matter of personal interest before we get started I see in the biographical material, Mr. Iannuzzi, that one of your interests is sharp shooting. What are the sharpies?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Well, I was a member of the Canadian Grenadier Guards and we had a team that went to Bisley one time.

Senator McElman: You are a subscriber to the Canadian Press Service of course?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Yes.

Senator McElman: Do they give you any particular service other than that given to any other customer?

Mr. Iannuzzi: No. Well, let me put it this way. We had a number of discussions with them—meetings at the Canadian Press office. They wanted to know what our requirements were and they tailored the service that we now have to suit our requirements. In fact, as late as a month and a half ago we were using the Ontario service and we figured we needed a little more national so they also included their first Canadian wire. We wanted a little more in-depth material since we must translate and rewrite the material. Since we must interpret we need more facts than the average daily newspaper would require. In order to accomplish this they also supplied us with the full New York service of Associated Press all within the same cost. I think this is quite helpful and we have been operating this way now for a month and a half. Only yesterday in talking to our managing editor, he felt the service is working out exceptionally well.

Mr. Thompson: When we first started taking the Canadian Press Service, we explained that one of our major interests was receiving photographs of the soccer games that took place on Sunday in Italy so that we might publish them in our Monday paper. At that time, pictures of the soccer games were not available on the North American market at all. Canadian Press went to bat for us with the result that they are now transmitting two or three pictures of leading soccer games in Italy. Initially, they were for our use but now all subscribers to Canadian Press Service and Associated Press in the United States have taken an interest in these pictures and they are now coming over with greater frequency.

Mr. Iannuzzi: And it's not being charged to us. Initially, there was a separate charge but since there has been a request for it, now it is part of the service saving us some $4,000 a year.

Mr. Thompson: I think it should be pointed out here that the Canadian Press is made up of professional newsmen and what we are doing is pioneering to a large extent—a lot of these papers have gone from weeklies to dailies and we are the only ethnic newspaper to go into the daily field. Canadian Press has taken a certain amount of pride in what we are doing in our pioneer work and they have really gone out of their way, both as a group and on an individual basis to help us.

Senator McElman: I take it you are getting a good measure of cooperation and assistance from Canadian Press. Is there any particular area—not particular to your own ethnic group but to the ethnic press in general—Is there any particular area where CP wire services could be of greater assistance to you? Are you satisfied at this point?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Yes, I think we are satisfied.

Mr. Thompson: A lot of the problems that we had in going daily and in the Italian language were of our own making—by virtue of the fact that we had gone daily. These are problems that are internal and we can solve ourselves.

Senator McElman: You have spoken of the immense amount of research data material that you have gathered. Is this available to other ethnic press—I am not speaking of your competition in your own ethnic group but would it be of use to, let us say, German language newspapers or others?

Mr. Iannuzzi: No. The actual material itself—the end result I doubt would be of any assistance to them since it pertains solely to an Italian market; but certainly the method that we applied in order to gather this material and our own information and costs, and its uses and so on, could be of assistance to any other ethnic newspaper.

Senator McElman: Would it be available?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Definitely.

Senator McElman: Because obviously it is going to be known that you have done tremendous research here and it would be available?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Definitely.

Senator McElman: In this measurement or data gathering that you have done, do you have a breakdown of the age grouping of your circulation—and does this indicate that you are reaching the second generation part of your ethnic group as effectively as you should. Has there been a sufficient time lapse in your measurement to indicate whether it is going up or going down?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Well, this survey here was completed in the early Spring, early Summer and we have subsequent to this the information required by agencies and by advertisers—and some of our own information that we require. We used up our 1970 budget in 69 and a new survey is coming out just prior to Christmas when it will be released and will carry much more information, much more detailed information.

Mr. Thompson: We do have a breakdown of age groups certainly and we extend that breakdown and through cross-tabulation we are able to tell you the language spoken in the home between adults, between adults and the children, and amongst the children themselves. Incidentally, I might point out the fact that where the children concerned who are going to Canadian schools, and receiving their education in Canada, there seems to be a reluctance to speak Italian within the home. It is almost as though they resent things Italian because they are going to school with all kinds of children who are doing things, and who are allowed certain freedom which they are not allowed within the Italian home. As a result, these children very reluctantly speak Italian and then only when they are not able to communicate in English.

This is one of the major factors, I might point out, in our decision to start carrying the English language in our newspapers. We felt it was necessary in order to fully represent the family and that we be able to communicate with the children in those homes that we were reaching.

Senator Prowse: Just speaking Italian when they want the car or money to go to a show?

Mr. Thompson: When they are allowed to go to a show, yes.

Senator McElman: I know sir that you attended Sir George Williams in Montreal. In instances such as the difficult problems that developed there last year...

The Chairman: Would you speak a little louder, Senator, as some of the people in the back can't hear you.

Senator McElman: In such an instance as the problems that developed at Sir George Williams over the past year, considering that the large part of your leadership is obviously first generation Italian—people who have, I am sure, on the basis of Canada selling the nation to prospective immigrants as the land of milk and honey with no problems—would you treat such a story any differently for your readers than would an English language or a French language newspaper?

Mr. Iannuzzi: No, so long as you stick to the facts. I presume that most newspapers do this. For that matter, the story itself, the news of what did take place would be identical.

Senator McElman: There has been no interpretation?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Not at an early stage. A little later maybe on some background material as things develop. As things develop we may interpret the cause and effect of the situation in Montreal. At the time of the happening we may not blow it up to the extent that a Montreal newspaper might or a Toronto newspaper might because this is an English-French situation and so on and so forth, but we will give it the prominence that it should have, since it is a national problem anyway.

Senator McElman: The reason I ask that—I tried to put myself in the mental context of let us say, a new immigrant from Italy. On the basis of what I have been told about the country I am coming to, my possible reaction might be "What kind of a country have I come to" and you say other papers might blow it up. The impression that might be gained is that this is indicative of the new generation, the oncoming generation in all parts of the nation. This is the basis for the question.

I can see where an immigrant—and not necessarily new—would worry very much about this sort of thing.

Mr. Thompson: That is correct.

Senator McElman: Even more than a Canadian born person.

Mr. Iannuzzi: This is true. These are problems that are happening in our case in Italy right now. Student demonstrations are world wide for that matter so I think he would be more surprised if he didn't have them in Canada and the US because they are happening, or they have happened.

Senator Prowse: They are not as upset as we are.

Senator McElman: You spoke at length about the problems that you have with the advertising agencies. Do you suggest that the problem lies totally, or almost totally, with the agency or is there is still some reluctance on the part of advertisers themselves. Do they not consider the circulation that you are serving important enough to go into?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Well, I would like to clarify the statement that I originally made on the question of the fault. I made the statement that the fault lies with the advertising agencies. The advertising agencies have been reluctant for the simple reason that they did not have the information in the past and still do not have it for the majority of the ethnic press.

In our case they now have at least an insight on the market and are able to interpret this to their clients, the national advertisers. The national advertisers themselves are taking a greater interest. In fact, I would say that we have received in the past four months more requests for information from the advertiser himself because he is the businessman in this particular case and he has the interest in the market for the simple reason that he has products sitting on the shelf that must be sold. The advertising agencies prior to receiving the information were reluctant in selling something they knew nothing about. Today they may be still reluctant but this is a question of production and of getting involved in an area that a special ad must be produced for the only Italian daily newspaper in Canada.

It is not a question of cost so much as time and involvement. It is easier to buy an ad in the Weekend with a million in circulation and so on and so forth. These are problems that we have as a newspaper of course to face and iron out with the advertising agency.

I must admit that there is still a reluctance on the part of the agency to sell our newspaper to their clients and I think this is the role of the advertising agency.

The Chairman: How do you solicit business. Do you have your own sales staff?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Yes.

The Chairman: I have never been quite clear on this and I don't know the answer to this question. I am not clear on the role or function of—There is a newspaper representative house that sells on behalf of ethnic papers is there not?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Yes.

The Chairman: Is that New Canadian Publications?

Mr. Thompson: Yes.

The Chairman: Could you explain that to us?

Mr. Thompson: Yes. There are two rep houses that deal primarily or completely in ethnic newspapers. One of these rep houses I believe has 47 newspapers it represents and the other some 52 or 53. Unfortunately, in our case, and I think in the case of most ethnic newspapers, these rep houses must be all things to all men. When they approach an advertising agency, they are representing every language available in Canada and if an agency on behalf of a client is interested in reaching a market—an Italian market per se, they must of necessity listen to the sales pitch that that rep is going to make on behalf of the other 46 newspapers, and invariably, the market data is just not available for these other groups that is available, for instance to the German market, to the Italian market.

It is a problem that necessitates our spending more money in making a direct approach from our newspaper as well as our rep of course.

The Chairman: When did you go daily?

Mr. Thompson: September the 2nd.

The Chairman: And prior to that time did one of these houses represent you?

Mr. Thompson: Yes, and still does.

The Chairman: They still do as well?

Mr. Thompson: But we are complimenting it now.

The Chairman: I understand.

Mr. Thompson: We will be doing more and more of this in the new year.

The Chairman: I am going to transgress my own edict at the beginning of the session when I said we are not dealing with the ethnic press generally. We are not, but may I just ask you this one question? You would say then—and please don't let me put words in your mouth—that these rep houses haven't done a very good job of telling the story of the ethnic market to the agencies?

Mr. Thompson: Well, that is a loaded question.

The Chairman: Well, it is not intended to be.

Mr. Thompson: I think the rep houses are doing an excellent job insofar as they are able to do it. The majority of the newspapers that they represent—you must understand that there are newspapers with circulations of 1,000, 2,000, 3,000, 4,000 and 5,000 readers and these newspapers are operating on a shoe string. They may just have a staff of three or four people. They don't have the funds or the access to information on their market or on their readers to provide the ammunition to the rep house but I believe that within the limits that the rep houses must operate, I think that they are doing a good job.

It is simply that in going daily and because of the size of the Italian population, we must naturally broaden our base. We are doing that through a series of four or five surveys we have had done and we are planning additional market approaches in 1970. These are designed to augment and broaden our approach to national advertising.

Senator McElman: In your comment on the research that you were doing, you used a word without any elaboration—you doubted that other newspapers would take the same "risk" in going to their readers, in gathering data and so on that you have taken. Were you speaking strictly on the financial input there?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Primarily.

Senator McElman: I thought so, but I just wanted to clarify that.

Mr. Thompson: There is a factor I think here. In the case of a Finnish paper or a Latvian paper or some of the smaller ethnic groups, they are serving the community on a national basis. They may have 30 readers in Sudbury, 200 in Sault Ste. Marie, 140 in Hamilton, and these are all spread throughout the country; whereby the very virtue of the fact that there are 280,000 people of Italian ancestry in Toronto we are able to localize our market and get an accurate picture, a profile of our readers.

This is a problem. It is a problem of geography. We don't for instance do our market data—the data that we have, while we believe it to be accurate regarding the Italians in Toronto, I don't believe that we can apply this information 100 per cent for instance to the Italians residing in Hamilton or in Windsor, or in Sault Ste. Marie.

Senator McElman: Yes, your size really comes home to me. I am a New Brunswicker and the Italian Canadian population of Toronto is almost 50 per cent of the total population of New Brunswick. Your circulation on an ethnic basis is 22,000, I believe you said?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Yes.

Senator McElman: That is larger than some of the dailies in New Brunswick. It impresses me very much.

Mr. Thompson: Well, there are a few groups that live as communities—the Italians, the Portuguese, and the Greeks—strangely enough all countries aligned to the Mediterranean—these are countries that don't assimilate—these are groups that don't assimilate as quickly as your central and northern European groups do—with the result that people live in communities rather than to integrate into the population of the city.

For this reason their assimilation is retarded and we serve them from a different standpoint, for example, than a German newspaper would serve its readers.

Senator McElman: If you will permit me, Mr. Chairman...

The Chairman: Well, I am certainly going to permit you, Senator McElman, but I am wondering if you might give the reporter about 90 seconds to make some changes. (Short adjournment).

The Chairman: Honourable Senators if I might call this session back to order. Senator McElman, you may resume your questioning.

Senator McElman: For your benefit there is an old saying that misery likes company. As you have spoken of your problems, I would just like to briefly mention that we have not an ethnic but a French language daily newspaper in New Brunswick and relative to Canada, New Brunswick is not very large but it has a rather large piece of the land. We are settled sparsely along the coast and the waterways. The French speaking population of New Brunswick is mostly Acadian and is spread up one shore and across the top of the province. The population is approximately 250,000 and the French language newspaper has a circulation, as I recall, of about 8,000 that it must distribute. You have your package.

Mr. Iannuzzi: Yes, in the Toronto area.

Senator McElman: So I was simply giving you an example that misery has company. Do the English language dailies of Toronto give special attention to ethnic groups and particularly yours, by having people on their reporting or editorial staffs who are thoroughly backgrounded in the problems of the ethnic groups in Canada? Do they try to give any special attention here at all?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Well, from reading and checking daily newspapers they certainly do cover to some extent happenings within the various ethnic communities. Whenever I have had the opportunity of running across some of these reporting staffs of the daily newspapers, some of them do make an effort to know a little bit more about it. The Telegram prior to 1967 did have someone on an ethnic beat, so to speak...

Senator McElman: A person backgrounded?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Yes. He was a fellow from Western Canada, a fellow by the name of Leon Cauthor and only the other day I was talking to a reporter from the Toronto Star who just started there. He is Maltese who spoke some Italian and he felt great that he was talking to me in Italian but little did he know that he could speak to me in English. This is the case and I think as I mentioned earlier that daily newspapers in large metropolitan areas such as Toronto, Hamilton and Windsor in their own interest would have to take a good look at these markets and see how they can serve them. If not the first, at least the second generation of the ethnic market and I think they are doing this.

The Chairman: I would like to ask a supplementary question if I might. Oh, I am sorry, Senator McElman you carry on, please.

Senator McElman: Would you see any possibility of the great dailies of Toronto, the English language dailies themselves to say an ethnic section of the newspaper—using the language or would this be quite beyond their financial possibilities?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Well, I am not sure.

Senator McElman: Well, you obviously must have considered the possibility.

Mr. Iannuzzi: No, I doubt if a large newspaper with some 300,000 circulation would want to include an article really to serve 2,000, 3,000 or 5,000 if the bulk of the readership is paying for the paper in English—the language that he purposely bought the newspaper for. This would be space that he feels would be wasted. I doubt if a newspaper would want to risk that possibility.

Senator McElman: Well, we are talking new concepts in newspaper handling. I just wondered if you had considered this possibility arising?

Mr. Iannuzzi: No.

The Chairman: In a survey which was done for you by Elliott Research Limited you indicate of the 13 per cent of the Italian people who do get an English language newspaper it is interesting to note that the Star outsells the Telegram 3 to 1 and outsells the Globe and Mail 4 to 1. This is disproportionately larger than the margin the Star has over those papers in the community at large. I am wondering if there is any reason for that?

Mr. Thompson: Maybe they are getting more bulk for their 10 cents.

Mr. Iannuzzi: I don't really know.

The Chairman: It doesn't relate to ethnic coverage?

Mr. Iannuzzi: I don't really think so.

Mr. Thompson: The Toronto Star I think by virtue of its sports pages and the great volume of classified advertising that it carries as regards to houses for sale, job opportunities and this type of thing, I would think that would have a bearing on it.

The Chairman: But it's not related to ethnic coverage particularly?

Mr. Iannuzzi: In some cases it is. I would have to say that as an example—when this market survey came out, it was the first of its type, and the Star gave it probably more space since it was in effect informing its own readers of a community within a community and its size and so on and so forth. An area such as this would slowly bring an interest to both the second generation and eventually to the first. There is a higher readership there.

Mr. Thompson: I suppose of the three dailies, the Globe and Mail will say there are 280,000 Italians in Toronto, the Telegram will say there are 280,000 Italians in Toronto and where they came from, and the Star will say there are 280,000 Italians in Toronto, where they came from and why they came. I think it is just a matter of depth.

Senator McElman: You passed rather briefly over the freedom of the press. To this point have you felt any pressure, any infringement, anything that you feel from your standpoint would inhibit the freedom of the press for you or do you see that it is in perspective or possible there?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Not really. Not in this country. Of course, I put myself in the position, as any other publisher of a newspaper. I think that the fact that our staff comes from a European country, and my close association with other editors from other ethnic publications, it is surprising to them—the freedom that they do find in this country. This is something that these newspaper people really do not appreciate and it is the fact that they are able to report responsibly these facts and have a wide discretion in interpreting news and of writing it, more so than they had in their own country. Aside from the Iron Curtain countries, we get involved with the very democratic countries such as Italy where the press is Government subsidized and they have political party newspapers, where they have a very strong federation of journalists giving them all sorts of pensions, and they are apparently the highest paid professional people in the country—much higher than they are paid in Canada on a dollar basis. They really don't have the freedom that a Canadian journalist has today.

For many ethnic editors in our discussions—their view is that you don't have the feeling that you can hear the jack boots on the steps and if you say this to a Canadian newspaperman it doesn't even ring a bell. To an ethnic editor this is something that he was living with and in our own editorial department these are working journalists who have worked from anywhere from five, in the case of our managing director, to some 30 years on Italian newspapers, and even in the postwar years with the New Republic. The industry clamped down on itself with Government intervention, Government subsidies and so on, and that freedom isn't there.

In our case we do not find, at least our editors don't find, any pressure or any influence at this stage. In fact, it is one of the first things they ask me—"What party do you support? What advertisers do we have to be nice to, and who pays the rent?" These are things that are happening in Italy right now.

Of course, they will pay for this very heavily in the next few years and the Seventies will show a great change in Italy as far as the press is concerned. This will be a living example of what can happen in a democratic country when a political party decides to support a newspaper. Large advertisers in the case of Italy, shipbuilders, oil companies and so on are interested in newspapers; and to add it all on top of that, the political parties get into coalition governments and therefore the Government gets involved. They get involved with subsidies to news agencies. Every politician in Italy has a news agency of his own and is getting a subsidy from the Government. This is all legislation that slowly creeps into Parliament and why not? Even using Italy as an example it is a democratic country.

It would be interesting to do a study on what happened to a free press in 20 years and I think that at least we are in our own area trying to avoid any of this particular thing. I would even go one step further and say that although Italy to some extent subsidizes the Italian press, other countries subsidize in the form of engraving, news services, feature travel and so on.

In 15 years our publication has made it point not to accept any of this particular material. I have just returned to Italy—I am president of the Italian press abroad—and this is a problem where I have to on one hand defend the publications that are published in Montevideo, in Europe, Germany where their feelings of course are altogether different than mine. They are stressing higher subsidies and so I have to speak out of both sides of my mouth. Higher subsidies for the Italian newspaper in New Zealand and the other one in Germany because they have different problems.

On the other hand I have to say, in our case we just wouldn't go for it. It slowly creeps in there and you will always find someone to whom legislation of this type will serve his purpose today; but in the long run I think that they are going to pay for it at a rate which really no publisher, or no writer would put himself in a position because he really can't afford it in the long run.

Senator McElman: Then, in the Canadian context, the term freedom of the press you suggest would have a greater depth of meaning than the definition that has been given to us by one or two—that it is the freedom or right simply to own, publish and sell newspapers?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Well, I think it goes beyond that. I think I have explained it and in the case of ethnic writers and editors this is the way they see it, and I certainly go along with it and I am trying to apply that to the theories that others have expressed here in the past few weeks. This also applies in a democratic country like Italy. This freedom that allows a large corporation to publish a newspaper on its own or for a political party—freedom to publish and say the things that political party wants to say, or for a Government—to subsidize a group of newspapers who say the things that the Government of the day wants it to say. This is freedom of the press.

If we are to interpret some of the things that have been said in the last few weeks—out in the end freedom of the press, I think personally, is the freedom of the reader to read the things that he wants to read—the information—freedom for the writer to write and express those things which the reader, the citizen of the country must know about—not tailormade.

Eventually in a generation with new writers coming up, 10, 15 or 20 years from now, freedom of the press could be misconstrued to be a theory that they are applying today—the right for certain people, certain groups, certain interests to publish a newspaper and take advantage of all the subsidies that public funds are available for now indirectly.

This is, of course, from the Press Gallery to the newsbox on the corner. This in effect, indirectly, is a subsidy. The news vendor doesn't have to pay for the space, the newspaper does. It is a privilege that the public has given a newspaper but in return for what? In return for responsible reporting without the control of the Government or big business.

Senator Smith: I find, Mr. Chairman, as time goes on the questions become fewer in number because the subjects are covered but if I might go back to something that you said quite a while ago. You made a reference to the effect of immigration of Italians from Italy. Do you have any serious worries that the flow of immigrants from Italy would be a very important factor in making an assessment as to what your long term prospects are for your daily newspaper?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Well, I don't think the policy in Canada on immigration will change. I think you would have to admit that immigration is one of Canada's prime requirements today. The thing that might change the situation is the fact that some of the European countries and Italy is one of them, where the standard of living is on the increase, will not permit a greater number who want to emigrate to Canada. When their conditions improve at home, there is absolutely no reason for them to emigrate.

In this case if immigration were to dwindle down to nothing then we would still serve, so long as it is required, the market that we are in—both the first and second generation.

If it really came to a point after 20 years that the newspaper no longer served them then it has no reason to exist because a newspaper should only be in a community until such time as it is no longer required. At that time the investment would amortize itself in any event.

Senator Prowse: By that time you may have changed with your changing market as well?

Mr. Iannuzzi: That is right. It could well be that 20 years from now we would be an entirely English language newspaper from an Italian point of view, still representing and serving a large number of citizens of this country.

Senator Smith: I think perhaps I should say, I think it is a generally accepted thesis that Canada's present policy is about as open as any other country in the world. I think the Canadian people in general—including certain groups who until more or less recently had doubts about the advisability of opening the door as wide as it is today—I don't think that they need to be educated. They have seen the great benefits of immigration. I don't think that immigration would be any more restricted than for the reasons you have stated.

That leaves me, and brings me, to a subject which I would like to learn something about. Where do the new generation of kiddies born in Canada learn to read and write Italian so that they will in future be readers of your newspaper? Well, let me ask you this. You were born in the city of Montreal...

Mr. Iannuzzi: Yes.

Senator Smith: How did you learn to read and write Italian?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Well, I started studying the Italian language approximately some 15 or 20 years ago.

Senator Smith: Well, did you learn it in the home?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Well, in the home there wasn't too much because my parents were both born in this country but it had to be studied through private courses and so on because there were no schools that would allow the Italian language to be taught. I think that as to stressing—some ethnic groups do, we haven't—the question of learning the Italian language—in other words putting pressure on the Government and the School Board to give us that right—I think it is a little early at this particular point as there is a much greater need to see that they learn English. Both the first and second generation have all the opportunities to take advantage of the educational system that Canada offers, at least in Ontario, more so than in their own country.

Too, in order for the second generation to really appreciate and understand their heritage, their traditions and customs and so on, it would be necessary certainly for them to understand the language and thereby read publications such as ours and maybe other literature that comes from Italy and Europe.

One point that I would like to stress is that Italians generally feel that it is Italy's responsibility more so than Canada's responsibility, to make available classes in the Italian language, whereas you get groups such as Ukrainians, Latvians and so on, from the communist countries who are pressuring for language classes in the regular school system. Italians generally feel that Italy, the Italian Government should sponsor courses, should supply material and so on, since there is a benefit. I think this could be applied to other countries.

Senator Smith: A benefit to whom?

Mr. Iannuzzi: To the mother country in this respect because if not in the first at least in the second generation—if someone speaks Italian, well, he would rather travel to Italy rather than Mexico, for example, because he can speak the language and therefore it has certain economic advantages to a country such as Italy, in travel, in products, in books and programming and so on. There is an advantage and I can see where there shouldn't be anything wrong with a foreign country supplying material. Of course, it would have to be approved and so on and in allowing for classes in languages we should see that we are not getting involved in politics in this.

Senator Smith: I am not quite sure yet that I have received the kind of answer that I was looking for. Let us assume that you have a next door neighbour that came in to this country ten years ago and they have two or three kids going to school and they go to English speaking schools, I suppose in your area, and how does that average sort of a family learn to read and write in that language, and if they don't, where are your newspaper readers?

Mr. Iannuzzi: No. There are a few churches that offer classes on Saturday and Sunday afternoons for five or six dollars a month and teach the Italian language. All this is available and I think there are two libraries in Toronto in the whole library system that do carry the odd book and records for them to learn, so that there are really no facilities in Canada for learning the Italian language.

Senator Smith: That situation, as you describe it, doesn't sound too promising for the future generation of readers and your circulation is going to be related over all the years to a flow of this immigration...

Mr. Iannuzzi: This is one of the reasons why by attracting them to our publication with English material, they will spend some time in reading some Italian material and thereby getting some benefit from it.

Senator Smith: Just one other question. I would like to ask Mr. Iannuzzi, are you aware of any promotion of Italian culture that is done by Government organizations such as the Canada Council or the Secretary of State's Department. Culture in any one of its forms, language, the dance, the music and so on?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Well, the Canadian Folk Art Council which of course was formed prior to our Centennial. There is a feeling that, unfortunately, there is too little being done by the Government agencies to further culture of the various ethnic groups. The feeling was that prior to 1967 that what the Centennial really needed was colour. This was true. To quote "Canada needed colour", and the only people really that could supply the colour at that particular time with the dances and festivals and so on were the ethnic groups.

Senator Smith: I think this is one of the most wonderful things that Canadian people can see on their televisions or even hear on radio. A lot of my friends say to me, well, what has happened to the programme that we saw in effect in 1967...

Mr. Iannuzzi: Well, it has served a purpose. Where do you go from there? The only thing that we have left since that time of course is the Canadian Folk Art Council which still of course does supply the CNE at the end of their season with a one night stand on Nation Builders 69 and I am sure next year we will have that Nation Builders 1970.

Senator Smith: Does that organization get funded by any Government agency?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Yes, primarily I think the Ontario Government and some Federal funds.

Senator Prowse: Yes, I was going to ask...

Senator McElman: Well, before he does Mr. Chairman...

The Chairman: Is this a supplementary question?

Senator McElman: No, I just want to make a comment. I resent that reference that the only colour had to be provided by the ethnic groups. That is a reflection on my Scotch kilt.

Senator Prowse: Perhaps we should make it clear to Senator McElman that in this country Scotch, English and everybody else are all ethnics.

Mr. Iannuzzi: I remember, Senator, if I may—during an interview with Senator Grosart some years back—talking with him—we were a group of ethnic publishers. He said of course that he represented an ethnic group, a minority group, and I told him at the time that "the only difference between yourself and myself was that your ethnic group was a ruling majority"—minority I should say—and "that of course made a big difference."

Senator Prowse: We looked up the meaning of the word "ethnic"—I think if I may, Mr. Chairman, in dealing with some legislation and we found that the dictionary defined it as meaning "non-Jewish".

The Chairman: It did?

Senator Prowse: Yes.

The Chairman: What dictionary was that, Senator Prowse?

Senator Prowse: That is in the New Oxford Dictionary. The definitive one and the word ethnic, as we use it here, is something that is drawn up in folklore since the war.

Mr. Thompson: We are not happy with the word ethnic. It has an alien connotation.

Senator Prowse: Well, maybe we could find a better word.

The Chairman: Would you prefer the expression New Canadian?

Mr. Thompson: I would prefer it.

Senator Smith: How old is new?

The Chairman: Exactly.

Senator Prowse: Perhaps if we just said language group it would make it simpler.

The Chairman: Do you have another question, Senator Prowse?

Senator Prowse: Yes, Mr. Chairman, the question I have has to do with the advertising and national advertising in particular.

It appears to me that the real problem you have with the national advertiser—if I am an advertising agency I can set up an ad, let us say around the phrase "Clean across Canada" which is a play on Canadian words and once I have my one ad produced then I can put that into about 1,000 English speaking publications and over the radio and television and I am set. In other words, I would have only one production cost which would be divided up between the whole bunch.

Now, when you come to an ethnic paper obviously this isn't going to be the case because there is a need to translate; so I have the same kind of production costs multiplied by the number of ethnic papers that I put it in. Now, is this one of the problems you have here?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Yes.

Senator Prowse: So that your answer seems to be is that you have to then come to them and almost you have to do the production for them and say "You tell us..."

Mr. Iannuzzi: Yes, that is correct.

Senator Prowse: And this is the basis of the real difficulties you have here?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Yes.

Mr. Thompson: Some advertising agencies, some of the more progressive ones, tend to consolidate at the planning stage rather than ask for a translation.

The Chairman: Any other questions? May I ask you then a final question just out of curiosity.

Could you tell us about your experience as a boxing promoter? You moved into the boxing business for a while, did you not?

Mr. Iannuzzi: No, our newspaper. Our newspapers, like most newspapers, gets involved in community promotions. At that time when Mr. Benvenuti had become champion we decided to promote a fight in Canada in Toronto with the proceeds going to the Canadian Save the Children Fund. We felt that this would be a way of introducing the Fund and for that matter all other funds since the system is peculiar to North America such as the United Appeal and so on and so forth. These do not exist in Italy and we figured this was a way of doing it and we did promote the thing and ran into a considerable amount of problems and costs—but this is how we really got involved in it. This is how we really got involved in boxing promotion.

The Chairman: Is Benvenuti the most popular sports figure in the Italian community in Toronto?

Mr. Iannuzzi: Well, apart from some of the national sports event.

Mr. Thompson: I believe he is.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Thompson and Mr. Iannuzzi, thank you both very much. This has been a most worthwhile presentation for us, it has been interesting to us, not only because you are the fourth daily newspaper in Toronto, but because in February we will be examining a little more closely the role, the purpose and the functions of the ethnic press in Canada. I am sure that this morning's discussion will be useful in that regard as well. We do thank you very much.

The Committee adjourned at 11:55 a.m. until 2:30 p.m.

The Committee resumed at 2:30 p.m.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, this afternoon we are receiving a Brief which is in the nature of a joint presentation by the Canadian Metis Society, the National Indian Brotherhood of Canada, and the Indian-Eskimo Association of Canada.

Sitting on my immediate right is Mr. Walter Deiter who is the President of the Association of National Indian Brotherhood. Sitting on my immediate left is the Reverend Adam Cuthand who is the President of the Canadian Metis Society. On his left is Mr. Bruce Rogers who will, I understand, be further introduced by Mr. Deiter. This session was to have been also attended by Mr. Walter Currie representing the Indian-Eskimo Association; however, I understand he missed a flight connection, and is unable to be here.

Now, I would say to the gentlemen, we have received a brief from your organizations. It has been circulated to the Senators, although this has been done as recently, I believe, as yesterday; and I cannot absolutely guarantee that all of the Senators have studied the brief in as much detail as we would like.

In any event I am going to propose that you take a few minutes, perhaps fifteen minutes if that is necessary, to summarize what is in the brief, to explain, to expand upon it, or to talk about anything else which may be on your mind. I gather both you, Mr. Deiter, and you, Mr. Cuthand are going to speak. Following that oral presentation you will be questioned by the Senators on the contents of your brief, on the contents of your oral comments, and indeed, on other comments; and any other questions which the Senators may have in mind.

With this introduction I will turn to:

MR. WALTER DEITER, PRESIDENT,
NATIONAL INDIAN BROTHERHOOD OF CANADA

and ask you to speak first?

Mr. Walter Deiter: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Honourable Senators, I guess I was prepared to make the introduction of the people but I guess it is already done; but on speaking of who we represent—I represent the Indian Organizations across Canada. That is we are pretty well organized from the Chief and Counsellors, or the Bands themselves up to the Provincial Presidents. We have organized and appointed a National Chief.

The reverend Adam Cuthand is representing the unregistered Indians, or the Metis people; and I fail to see any difference between the unregistered, or Metis people, and the Indian people in general. However he is the President of the Manitoba Federation for Metis people as well as the Provisional National President of the National Body of the Metis people in Canada.

Now, Mr. Bruce Rogers, our Consultant—I think that is one way I can introduce him. He has been the Chairman of the Indian-Eskimo Association on communications, and has been a teacher of journalism and communications in the University in Toronto, and he has been on the CBC on the World at Six. This is a radio program; and I think at that I will turn this over to:

REVEREND ADAM CUTHAND,
PRESIDENT, CANADIAN METIS SOCIETY

Reverend Cuthand: Thank you, Walter. Mr. Chairman, Honourable Members of the Senate. There are certain things I would like to clear with you, there are certain terms which may appear in our brief such as "treaty indian", "registered indians", possibly "half-breeds"—"registered indians are those people who are registered with Indian Affairs, and are members of a certain band. They may live in the reserve, outside the reserve in urban areas, and rural parts of Canada; but the Metis to whom I refer are unregistered, have some Indian ancestry, and because our girls were very attractive they were married to either French, Scotch, Irish, or English; and out of that group we have the half-breeds as was mentioned in the Manitoba Act of 1870, or the word has been accepted at this time, the word "Metis". I am referring to a particular group of these people, those people who are living culturally, sociologically, and economically as the registered indians of Canada.

There are others of Indian ancestry who have been assimilated into the larger society numbering perhaps thousands and thousands in our Canada. These people who have been assimilated through inter-marriage with the rest of the Canadian race are in the affluent society, and have become members of the civil service, and moved to other provinces—some Members of Parliament. We are not concerned with these people because they are like any other Canadians, accepted into the larger society; but we are concerned with people who have been left through circumstances, because of isolation, and because of lack of opportunity for education in the past. Our next illustration—I will follow with a summary of the brief, first of all, the native organizations are asking for a change in the way the media is serving the native peoples. One of our dissatisfactions is the concentration of the media on sensationalism.

Number 3, Government Releases especially, from the Indian Affairs Branch readily find their way into the media.

Number 4, public relations agents are paid for by the Indian Affairs Branch in order to give the Indian Affairs Branch a good image, while the Registered Indians have no such service. For example the Crockett writers of the City of Winnipeg have been hired, and have made an agreement with Indian Affairs to do that kind of work.

There has been a certain stereotyping of Indians which you will find in Appendix "B" of your Brief, page 3, which began in the early history of our country, and it says as follows "They can with truth be called savages, as there are no people poorer than these in the world. I believe they do not possess anything to the value of five pennies. They are great thieves and will steal all they can". Cartier said this of a poor and backward tribe.

Champlain is quoted "Along each side runs a bench four feet above the ground, where the inmates sleep in summer to avoid the innumerable fleas".

Now, these are some of the words that have appeared running through all of the history books which are taken by the students, and these kinds of supposed facts have been presented to our children in the social studies right across Canada.

On the positive side, however, which very few people know about—you find in Appendix "C", "Contributions of the American Indian to Modern Civilization.". As you begin to read this, you will find, for example, that 75 per cent of the foods that you have at home have been developed by the Indians in North and South America thereby giving this to the rest of the world at no cost. Our method of government called "democracy" was adopted by the Americans from the Confederacy of the Iroquois.

Then there are other things which you will read for yourselves, such as equality of man has been preached by our people in the past, the brotherhood of man; and many other things which we have given to the world. Even the way of speaking—many words have been adopted from the Indian language which we use now at the present time.

Item No. 24 will have to be changed, but you will find in the preface, No. 24 at the beginning, it is on page 7 "there have been some suggestions that radio stations" I would like you to delete the word "radio stations" and put the word "media" instead.

Item 45 requests that immediate government action be taken to give various publications the same preferential treatment now enjoyed by daily newspapers. Recent increases in postal rates have worked a severe handicap on all native publications. We have several newspapers across Canada which have come out, and they have suffered because of this postal—the postal rates that have gone up since that time.

Number 9, a native Indian, or native of this country, when I speak of natives, I am talking of the registered Indians, Metis, or Eskimo—should be on the Board of Governors of the C.B.C. An Indian should at least be on the advisory council of the C.R.T. Commission.

Senator McElman: Excuse me, where is that contained?

Reverend Cuthand: It is not in the Brief. It is an oral suggestion.

Senator McElman: All right, thank you.

Reverend Cuthand: I would like you to refer to Number 42, "That steps should be taken to establish regional radio, television, video-tape, and press centres in order to adequately serve the total country with media facilities". This has been done in Sweden where the community is broadcasting for the community itself.

Perhaps Mr. Rogers would like to explain what happened in Sweden at this point.

Mr. Rogers: The experiment which is now becoming—and I might say more than in Sweden, is just a community or regional establishment which might do anything from preparing slides for community purposes, to the production of a film, or even transmission of radio or television programs for that community. This is, in fact, a multi-media establishment for the use of, and service of a given community, or region.

I don't know that there is any more I could say about it except that it would seem to be an established practice in Sweden where perhaps the need is less than it is here.

The Chairman: Yes, there may be questions.

Reverend Cuthand: Among the important recommendations is one which asks that the Department of National Defence stations now being phased out, be given to native organizations in their respective provinces. For example the D.N.D. Station at Moosonee is being phased out.

No. 12, our recommendations that Indian communities be given help to establish their own community low-power radio stations. We have, for example, in northwest Ontario an organization called "Kenomadiwin" which translated means the "Crying One". This is a program which is on low power coming from northwestern Ontario.

No. 13, there is a lack of educational opportunities related to job opportunities for the Meis people.

And last of all, through the mass media there will be an opportunity given to speak to one another as Canadians, and to all Canadians thereby giving us better relationships between different ethnic groups.

Mr. Chairman: Thank you, Reverend Cuthand. Is there anything you wish to add at this point, Mr. Deiter?

Mr. Deiter: No, I am just satisfied.

The Chairman: Mr. Rogers? something you wished to add?

Mr. Rogers: No, thank you.

The Chairman: Then I think we can proceed with the questioning. Senator Hays?

Senator Hays: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I think first on behalf of the Committee I should like to thank you for your brief. I think it is an excellent brief, and although I did not have the opportunity to go through it more than once, I think that it handles many of the problems and difficulties that your people are having, and I think it will be of great help to the Committee. I should like to just go through some of the Brief, there are some questions that I should like to ask in connection with the brief.

Reverend Cuthand, on page 8, paragraph 26 of the brief, the point is raised that the American Negroes have been getting more media coverage recently. This has been due to militant and dramatic action by blacks to draw attention to themselves, and their cause. You seem to suggest in the paragraph and throughout the brief that the dissatisfaction of your Metis population, with the media specifically, might lead to a spread of this same militancy and violence. How is the Association planning to handle the militancy if it does occur?

Reverend Cuthand: I can speak personally about this problem because the Manitoba Federation was officially organized April 5th., 1968, the day after Martin Luther King was assassinated. The leaders at that time felt that we do not want to see this kind of violence take place in Canada; and one of the primary reasons why we organized was for this reason, to fight this kind of violence. Therefore, when we are concerned with a problem we do it by negotiations, and also by just talking about it with people to replace what you would consider to be violence.

Senator Hays: How do you think that the media could harm this sort of thing, or where are they falling down insofar as it is concerned?

Mr. Rogers: Well, I think, Senator, the brief suggests a number of ways in which the media have not been serving the minority groups, and specifically Indians, Eskimos, and Metis people. They very often—their pre-occupation with sensationalism, as referred to by Mr. Deiter in his opening remarks, has lead to the ignoring of the real issues in a given community, whether it is a reserve, or a concentration of Indian people—or independent people of Indian descent in an urban settlement. So there might be a pre-occupation with a single isolated incident of violence that had nothing to do with the ancestry of the people involved. At the same time the media would have ignored the conditions which lead to that violence. A typical situation must be pre-occupation with a brawl, a beer hall, while the media have ignored the lack of adequate housing in the community for instance. This might have lead the Indian people to think of the beer hall as the only centre, the only community centre, the only place they had—or place for social relationships.

Mr. Chairman: I was going to ask earlier about this pre-occupation with sensationalism to which you referred before, Reverend Cuthand? Do you relate that only to the media coverage of Indian affairs, and Indian development? Or is that a broad criticism of the media generally?

Reverend Cuthand: I would say it is much broader.

The Chairman: It is a general criticism. I was not clear on that.

Senator Hays: Thank you very much. Now, on page 11, paragraph 35 where it is stated that modes of communication fail to meet the needs of minority groups...

The Chairman: Just a moment, he has not got it yet.

Senator Hays: Then I will repeat, if modes of communication fail to meet the needs of minority groups, the country will probably set a course of violence action, as minorities seek their rightful place. Would you just expand on this? I am wondering if insofar as the media is concerned, in your opinion should there be some control, or some regulatory bodies? Whether it is within themselves, or how can these best be handled? How do you keep this sort of thing that you are suggesting out of the media?

Mr. Deiter: I would like to just make a comment on this point that you are talking about here—about this violence, and about the media, and about these people that go around shouting "fire". We cannot stop the freedom of the press, but we can get some real constructive things in the papers if we had the means to do this. Now, in dealing with these violence situations, the National Indian Brotherhood is working from crisis to crisis, and if there was a better communications system in dealing with communities we would not be having these crisis to crisis situations happening, and we would be able to settle down to more constructive ways of doing things. In order to get this across we need communications.

Senator Hays: How would you stop the newspaper coverage—say that day on the brawl that you speak of? How would this be stopped?

Mr. Deiter: Well, I do not think we would go into stopping anything like that, but then we would be publishing news that is constructive—apart from the people. The bad coverage we get on this kind of thing—I don't know how we can control this. We cannot because we are dealing with the freedom of the press, and we do not want to suppress this.

Senator Prowse: What you are suggesting, I gather is this, if they are going to carry a story about the fight, or drunk, then at the same time in that paper they can balance it off by printing a story of somebody who has achieved a little success, or done something good and beneficial in the community? In this way you would get a more balanced picture. Is this what you have in mind? In other words put in the good as well as the bad?

Mr. Deiter: Yes, the point is here, if they would not mention nationalities.

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Senator Hays: Do you think that they should not mention nationalities Indians? or Eskimos?

Mr. Deiter: Not in bad publicity like that, because there surely was a mix-up in Northern Saskatchewan when this Peterson case happened. One group was Metis and the other white, and there was such a mix-up, they were trying to connect the two with may be an up-rising or something, and this doesn't look good for the Indian people in Saskatchewan.

The Chairman: I am wondering if either Mr. Rogers or Reverend Cuthand would care to comment on this question of Senator Hays. I think we are agreed this is a desirable objective. I think what Senator Hays is asking Mr. Deiter, is how do you achieve this—particularly being given the point which you have made so well about the facts of a free press?

Reverend Cuthand: I would like to say that I mentioned previously the stereotyping of Indians. At the present time, we realize, all of us, that there is a barrier between native people and the other Canadians because of this stereotyping, and therefore there is a great area to be covered in the areas of publicity for the Indian. There is the fact that the public at large have to be educated on the potential of the Indian. The only time an Indian is useful is when there is a crisis—a war it appears to us now. Many Indians volunteered in the first, and second; and fire, when there is a fire the Indians are in the front fighting fires.

I mean the public are not aware that the native people of this country have a potential for the common good of this country, and this is the work of the media to get this across to the public.

The Chairman: If I might just ask, how can you make the media do this? Is it the art of persuasion—by appearing here today? Is that it?

Mr. Rogers: I think that is one of the ways, and as Mr. Deiter pointed out that is the prime way—and Reverend Cuthand made the same points, that the Indian, Eskimo and Metis will try through this kind of presentation, and any other opportunities to make their points; but I wanted to point out there is no suggestion in the brief of censorship. There is no reference to a press council in the brief. The Organizations decided that they would not deal with those two subjects. That is not to suggest that neither Chief Deiter, nor Reverend Cuthand will not have anything to say on specific questions but those points are not covered in the brief—the brief does not take a negative position in this respect at all. The brief however does speak to the problem that you raise I think, Senator Hays, that in many ways the many particular items in here, that if there was less status quo orientation in the media, then the minority groups of all kinds, and the poor would probably have greater access to the media. That is they would be serving a broader spectrum of society rather than concentrating on the middle class, and the affluent who can buy the products advertised. I think that point is simplifying it perhaps too much.

Mr. Deiter: I would simplify it to the point—give us a T.V. station and paper of our own so that we can do this kind of thing.

Mr. Chairman: I take that point, but let me ask you a question in return. If you had a newspaper and station of your own, that probably would not rectify the stereotype problem which you have been talking about, that for example say the people in Toronto may have, because presumably the radio station or television station would not be in Toronto?

Mr. Deiter: I wouldn't say they wouldn't be in Toronto because that is one of our biggest reservations in Canada.

Mr. Rogers: It would serve a purpose in a centre like Toronto, or Winnipeg, or Regina—anywhere there are large concentrations of people of native decent. One of the problems recently dealt with at some length in the media in the urban centres—the problem for instance, of just one of the symptoms—suicide in a certain age range. This is, in some part, undetermined here—a result of a negative self-image which is a direct reflection of the stereotype problem. So if you did have some sort of media service that reflected that concentration, the problems, the issues, the aspirations of those people, it might be that negative self-image could be altered.

Senator Hays: Are there any Indians on newspaper staffs? Do you have reporters? Are any of your people reporters, editors, editorial writers?

Mr. Deiter: We have such a small number that it is hardly effective. We have some with C.B.C. Well, we have Johnny Asenault with the Indian Magazine which is a very good program that all Indian people across Canada listen to; but I think that is about the only one that I know of. Well, they have in northern Alberta, they have a scheme there. Then there is another one...

Senator Prowse: Is that the "New Start Scheme"?

Mr. Deiter: I don't think that has anything to do with the "New Start Scheme" because they were operating...

Senator Prowse: The radio program?

Mr. Deiter: It is the radio program.

Senator Hays: You mentioned somewhere in the brief that there has been a lack of farm programs. You mention that this has probably hurt the Indian, that most of them are agriculturists and there was a lack of farm broadcasts, and that sort of thing. Now, I did not know that was the case but may be I am wrong about it.

Mr. Deiter: No, I think this was just a reference to farm forum.

Senator Hays: There should be more farm forums, is that it?

Mr. Deiter: What worked for farmers could work for Indians.

Senator Hays: That kind of program.

Mr. Rogers: It was a community confrontation kind of program with built-in feed back which enabled farmers to know the effects on conditions, sometimes rather specifically. It suggested in the brief that it could still serve that purpose, and also serve broader purposes in solving the problems of other communities.

Senator McElman: This is just a comment at this point. The Gleaner was represented here yesterday by Brigadier Wardell, and it carries a regular column, I believe it is daily, which is devoted solely to the constructive purposes and interests of the St. Mary's band at Fredericton. This is written by a lady who is not a native Canadian but all of the information, and all of the research, etc. associated with it is done by members of St. Mary's band, and it does appear regularly, and I believe daily.

Senator Hays: Well, I don't have many more questions. I would just like to pursue this news problem. Do you know what the incidence is of reading a daily newspaper among your people? Do you get more communications through radio, or the television, or is it by newspaper?

Reverend Cuthand: Possibly I can answer part of this. The farther north you go, the people rely a great deal on radio—the Northwest Territories, northern Saskatchewan and Northern Ontario and so on. The farther south you go, people use both the radio and the T.V. Now, that the T.V. is coming in, many of the natives have the T.V. in their own home, and it is both, and of course the press, etc.

Senator Hays: I think the radio is more important than the T.V.—in the future probably more than newspapers.

Senator Prowse: Depends on the area.

Reverend Cuthand: It appears to be, especially when the broadcast is given in the native language as they have done from the communications people living in Edmonton under James Steinhauer.

Senator Hays: Do most of the native Indians, in addition to their own language, speak English or French?

Reverend Cuthand: This is true, yes.

Senator Hays: One hundred percent?

Reverend Cuthand: We still have people in northern Manitoba for example including Metis who do not speak English, they only speak the Cree language. This is also true in northern Saskatchewan.

Senator Hays: Is it true right across Canada?

Reverend Cuthand: Oh, yes. Northern Ontario...

Senator Hays: What percentage would there be?

Mr. Deiter: Many of them know basic English.

Senator Hays: But they all go to school?

Mr. Deiter: No, I went into a whole Metis community, and this is supposed to be mixed, white and Indian, and not one of them spoke English. I had to drive over and talk my mixed-up Cree and try to find somebody to interpret so I would be able to communicate.

Senator Hays: These people are not exposed to education at all?

Mr. Deiter: No. Father Renaud would certainly know about the situation in this field.

ANDRE RENAUD O.M.I. UNIVERSITY OF SASKATCHEWAN

Father Renaud: This is very simple. Of the adult population of Indians, particularly in the north, or in all Canada only half of them went to school. Only half of Indian children were in school up to 1945—which means the adult parents have never been in school. Those who went to school went to about Grade V, and as a result, the functional literacy, particularly in the north is almost nil.

Now, there was a study made in Manitoba I remember, about the input of information, about two years ago, into the northern Indian and Metis communities. About 15 per cent have radio and it comes only exclusively in radio because newspapers are not known, and magazines—well, Eaton's catalogue—that gets there once in awhile for various purposes; but the input of information is predominately nil. A survey was taken by the Department of Forests to find out how the Indian trappers learn about changes in trapping, and so on. Most of them did not know except through the Game Officers. This radio in their language is important because it is the only means of access to information. What has amazed some of us over the years is that Canada is perhaps one of the most technical in radio communications, and we would be the last one to help our native people, whereas these technicians are being used in South America for those purposes.

Senator Hays: May I ask a question on this same subject? You say in 1945, or since 1945 are all of the native children now being schooled?

Father Renaud: It has taken all these years to get class room facilities and teachers, and I think now it is about 98 per cent. There are still some that are loose somewhere in the woods but that is because there is no contact with them.

Senator Hays: Are these schools in the big unit system?

Father Renaud: Increasingly, yes—increasingly so. More than half of the children of Treaty status, for instance, or registered Indians are now in schools under municipal auspices, or in the northern areas, like Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, they have a large provincial school unit. It handles the education more and more of all of the children of Indian ancestry, both registered and the other ones.

Senator Prowse: They go to the same school as every child in the area goes to now.

Father Renaud: Increasingly. Where it is possible. For instance in Manitoba there is 65 per cent on the reserve who are inaccessible.

Senator Prowse: Isolated communities.

Father Renaud: Yes.

Senator Prowse: What about Indian Affairs building residences near larger centres, like Dauphin or The Pas and making it possible for an increased number of children to attend high school. I worked in one of these Indian Residential schools from 1931 to 1934 so I have my opinions about them. Are these residences now acceptable to the Indian and native people, and are they working out well?

Mr. Deiter: I think I could answer you on that one. I think our population has grown quite a bit you know. We have the same kind of—you might say that we have the same problems that white people have when it comes to liquor, and broken homes. This kind of school just about takes up that population, and actually I think there are not enough of them to take up this type of family grouping.

Senator Prowse: The reason I asked the question was there was a very wide-spread feeling among the native people at that time almost to resentment, that their children were taken from them and placed in the school. I think it was probably soundly based, and was wondering whether the present attitude towards residential schools had changed in that they were more suited to the requirements of the native parents, and gave more consideration to the wishes of the native parents than was given thirty years ago?

Father Renaud: The majority of children—there is about ten thousand at the most that are in residence, they are not called residential now, they are just residences. Now, these children are generally from broken homes, or sick parents, and a variety of cases. They are really welfare institutions now more than schools. They are still used in some areas as residences for older students, or students of children of trappers. Needless to say that program was changed from the program of the 1930's. Historically these schools were brought about by conditions. There were no roads anywhere, and the only way that some attendance could be maintained was through residences here and there. Historically the first residential schools were started at the request of the Indians of southern Ontario.

Senator Prowse: Would you say these residences are adequately staffed at the present time?

Father Renaud: Increasingly.

Senator Prowse: In other words, the problems are appreciated, and the needs and wishes of the native people are being taken into consideration now in the development of these institutions?

Father Renaud: Not fully but to a degree.

The Chairman: May I just interrupt to say with great respect that we are dealing with the media and not the educational problems of the Indian people I do not mean to be rude...

Senator Prowse: Yes, that is all right, I am used to it!

Mr. Chairman: We will come back to you, Senator Prowse but I believe Senator Hays has a few more questions.

Senator Hays: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Is there any such thing as an hour's program, or a two hour program in their native tongue? Is there any such program?

Mr. Deiter: There is a program in northern Alberta, and it is working out very well but it is too small for anything. I would like to hear some of the things that they are yelling at—they wanted the Indians to take over responsibility. Give us the responsibility of doing this instead of just talking about it because we are willing to take over anything we can get hold of, but we are not getting a chance.

Senator Hays: Could this be resolved by your staffing insofar as the program is concerned, say so much of a day? Would this be the way to do it rather than running a radio station?

Mr. Deiter: Let me answer you again. In running a radio station, give us a chance and just see if we will not run it? What happened when they kicked the British out of the Suez Canal? They said they could not run it, but the darned thing was run after they left.

Senator Hays: I am just wondering whether you want this subsidized for such a small audience. I don't know financially whether anyone could have a program for a few thousand people; but there must be ways around this that it could be done. It would just seem impossible to me with a few thousand people to run a radio station all day long?

Mr. Deiter: This is another question. Just give me one of these oil wells that we gave to you guys, we'll run it.

Senator Hays: Well, you give me a couple, I will help you.

Mr. Rogers: I think a couple of examples are given in the brief in each of the categories that you have now referred to. The C.B.C. is performing this service in a modest way through the northern service, and through the operation of stations like the one in Yellow Knife, and I think one at Tuck.

Senator Prowse: They have one in the east too.

Mr. Rogers: There is also an independently owned community low-power station in the eastern Arctic. The one there gained some notoriety a couple of years ago because it was taken over, and then later sanctioned by the Department of Transport I think.

So you have examples of both operations, one domestically owned in a community for its purposes with a low-power transmitter. The costs do not have to be as high as C.B.C., and there were some people on staff on a freelance basis. I believe broadcasting in Eskimo, and in several of the languages of the MacKenzie.

The Chairman: These C.B.C. services obviously one of the grievances with them is that they are not extensive enough; but are those that exist satisfactory?

Mr. Rogers: I think in the case of the Yellowknife broadcast, it has been proved there is an audience out there and it is serving the purpose, yes.

The Chairman: And where the C.B.C. facilities exist are they satisfactory?

Mr. Rogers: I find it difficult to answer.

Mr. Deiter: Let me put it this way, the radio broadcasts that are done for Indians in the north are serving the Indians better in the north than it once was—better than the ones that have every facility to serve people and are not serving the people.

The Chairman: Except for the fact that the existing services are not extensive enough, those that do exist are moderately satisfactory, are they?

Mr. Deiter: No, or else we would not be here.

Senator Prowse: I don't think—will you try that one over again—because I do not think he means they are not moderately satisfactory but that the whole problem is not answered. What Senator Davey was asking, if you will pardon me, was where you do have a service and within the limits of where that service reaches, is that moderately satisfactory for the area that is now being reached?

Mr. Deiter: Oh, yes, yes.

The Chairman: That is it Senator Prowse, thank you.

Senator Prowse: Where it is not satisfactory there is not a big enough area being reached?

Mr. Deiter: Yes, but in the populated areas we have all of the modern facilities that reach everything else. Everybody else.

Senator Prowse: But they are of no use to you?

Mr. Deiter: But because of the language differences they are useless.

(From the Floor): Mr. Chairman, it may be that I could clear up a point here. I am responsible for the northern service of the C.B.C.

The Chairman: Well, it is most unusual, but by all means, we shall make an exception.

(From the Floor): Where the northern service operates we do broadcast the native languages but that does not apply to other regions of the C.B.C.

The Chairman: All right, that is fine. I did not mean to be rude, but it is most unusual to have someone speaking from the floor. Thank you. Senator McElman, I believe you have a question?

Senator McElman: Broadcasting in native languages, could I ask, is it actual physical broadcasting done by natives?

The Chairman: Who are you putting that question to?

Senator McElman: Anybody?

Mr. Deiter: I think so far all of the native language broadcasts have been by natives.

Senator McElman: Is then the answer, Chief, that we have more C.B.C. low power units?

Mr. Deiter: Well,...

Senator McElman: Just a moment, I have not finished my question. Low power units, C.B.C. established, owned, perhaps mechanically operated but staffed by native people?

Mr. Deiter: I think this is what we are asking for in our brief.

Mr. Rogers: If I may, I think you are asking for a little more than that in the brief. I think the suggestion here is there should be community owned and operated stations right in the community—low power stations. You might reach the same goal via C.B.C. but I do not think that is precisely what the brief asks for.

Senator McElman: C.B.C. is owned by Canadian people, and is performing a service, a national service. What would be the objection to it as part of the C.B.C. network? What would be the objection to Canada, as such, through this corporation providing such service with the native people doing the actual administration within the units?

Mr. Rogers: None, I expect.

Mr. Deiter: As far as we are concerned it is entirely up to them, I feel that we are just as much tax payers as anybody else.

Senator McElman: Exactly.

Mr. Deiter: The only tax we do not pay is the reserve property tax, but I live in the white world, I pay every tax that comes along and then some. I complain the same as everybody else.

Senator McElman: Then what would be the advantage you aim for in having a community-owned—this is what I am trying to get at, as opposed to C.B.C. owned, but operated by the native people themselves.

Senator Prowse: Made available to them.

Mr. Deiter: I think this would be a real step in promoting the Indian people into getting into the main stream of economic socialism, you might say. If you understood the Indian Act and what we have been through the last hundred years—it was only four or five years ago that it was almost impossible to get a guy like me to come and talk to you guys because we thought it was impossible.

Senator McElman: I think we understand.

Senator Prowse: May I ask a couple questions? First of all, can anybody tell me whether the facilities in the armed forces bases, and the American radar bases which it is anticipated are going to be declared surplus soon, are those radio facilities of a kind that could be adapted to use by a low power community station?

Mr. Rogers: Yes, they are.

Senator Prowse: Would they require any substantial modification? or would they be all right just about the way they are?

Mr. Rogers: Depends on how well they have been maintained I expect.

Senator Prowse: My second question is this. If you were going to go in and establish a low power station, how much money are we talking about? Somebody is going to ask that question, I might as well? What does it cost? I have in mind—I think somewhere I got a figure that it was in the neighbourhood of about $120,000.00 a pack?

Senator Hays: I understand that it is about 17,000.00.

Mr. Rogers: You can do it for much less I think. I believe some of the community stations that have been put on the air on college campuses in the U.S. have been put on for as little as ten.

Senator Prowse: I see.

Mr. Deiter: When we are suggesting the news stations we are more or less going on the principle that if we cannot get a Cadillac, we will take the Model "T", you see.

Senator Prowse: It is always a good sound principle.

May I ask another question? To go back to our Page 8, section 26, when you are referring to black Americans—you say "token black involvement in commercial messages, situation comedies and dramas show a new awareness of the importance of the black community". In checking that brief, the word "token", and "tokenism" appears in here, and I get it tossed at me every once in a while; but it seemed to me, as a person watching the American shows that come in, that I am getting quite used to seeing black people in the shows. Now, I would think that if I were a black person in the United States, that to me to see my own people accepted in a perfectly normal situation along with everybody else, would help me to picture myself that way. So while it may be tokenism—what I am getting at—would not this in your opinion be helpful if we adopted the same kind of principle and policy, here in Canada, of showing the Indian people in perfectly normal situations, side by side with normal, ordinary people?

Mr. Deiter: This is a real good thing. This is a real step in the right direction if we could bring that out; because the shows today that show Indians show him getting chased around by somebody with a rifle, and he is running away with the bow and arrow.

Senator Prowse: He is always the bad guy?

Mr. Deiter: That is right.

The Chairman: Just for a moment at this point I would like to state an impression that I have, and I hope, Gentlemen, that you will be frank. I concede at once that the media probably has not done a very effective job of setting forward the potential of the various native communities, and it probably has not yet done a sufficient job of putting forward the problems; but I am under the impression that in the last several years that there has begun in the media in Canada, and particularly on television, attempts to portray the real problems of your community. Now, is that an unfair observation? I sense things are changing? The stereotype, of course, continues to exist, but I think to make a blanket coverage, or a blanket condemnation and say nobody is doing anything is a little unfair, because I think the media are beginning to? Now, I have made a statement, but I put it in the form of a question, is that a fair observation or not?

Mr. Deiter: It is fair, and it is not fair because the balance of the shows that come where Indian people are brought to the show are still being stereotyped, there are more Indians getting chased around on the television than there are doing the chasing.

The Chairman: Have there not been documentaries setting forward the problems that you have?

Mr. Deiter: Oh, yes.

The Chairman: Do you not regard those as useful?

Mr. Deiter: What I think is more useful is getting information of Government services to Indian people, right to the reserve level so that they will know what is happening.

The Chairman: I accept that, of course, but I am referring more to the stereotype which may exist in the broad community. Would anybody else care to comment on that?

Reverend Cuthand: I would like to say this. When we first organized in Manitoba, we had a CBC crew there spending a day with us on a course called "Social Animation" which I think was very well conducted by two men, Dr. Des Connor and Stan Cyril, but when it appeared on CBC only a minor part of this program was on the CBC. And mixed with this was a program of an appalling situation—where you have your beer parlour troubles, and so on. What we did there was offset by the other things that happen which are not becoming of the Indian, or Metis in The Pas. I mean the bad was outweighed by the good. This is the way I saw them because they took a great deal of time to photograph this course, but a very minor part of it appeared on the program.

Mr. Rogers: I think to answer your question, you only have to say that the Indian and Metis people have become far more aggressive in recent years in their efforts to be heard in the media, and elsewhere; that they have had far more interest from professionals in the media, and there is an acceleration in that direction. The brief is evidence of a degree of dissatisfaction that persists, and it will for sometime I expect; but to answer your question directly there certainly has been an improvement if quantity is any indication, however the stereotype certainly exists.

The Chairman: Yes, I am not disagreeing with the brief in any way, shape, or form, but in fairness I thought I should make the observation I did.

Father Renaud: I guess with Bruce over the last ten years there has been a much broader coverage of situations on reservations, and this is the new members. There is no doubt that the majority of Canadians now are aware of the sad situations; however the point that Chief Deiter is making now, it is almost overdone, and that the idea is that if you are an Indian—well, you are a poor fellow living in a shack, and so forth. There has not been enough promotion along the lines the Senator was suggesting. The very casual promotion of Indian persons in a variety of situations where younger Indians could identify themselves with positive models instead of the destitute models.

The Chairman: I take that point. Senator Prowse?

Senator Prowse: Well, the other thing would be—I have had occasion to do a little bit of reading, and when I read about Crowfoot for example, I am satisfied if it had not been for Palmer and Crowfoot western Canada would be part of the United States today; and I think I would include Louis Riel in there too. Now, for the life of me, I cannot read that in a Canadian history book; I have never seen it on a CBC documentary, or read it in the Canadian magazines, magazine section, or a story in the newspaper. It has begun to exploit the tremendous image picture there is in the three men I have mentioned, and if they wanted a real adventure story, or an image for people there is the fellow Gerry Potts who may have made a greater contribution than any of them to the development that Canada does stretch from sea to sea.

Now, is there something that can be done in this area to give these people the heroes that they are entitled to?

Reverend Cuthand: I would like first of all, Mr. Chairman, to ask the chairman is the curricula of the provinces considered to be part of the mass media?

The Chairman: Well, I think in fairness in terms of mass media, it is not; but I think you should feel free to comment. It really is not, but please go ahead and comment?

Reverend Cuthand: There is a change in the Province of Manitoba and Saskatchewan where the curriculum is being changed to give a better image of the native Canadian. Now, I have been to classes in the City of Winnipeg where I have talked to Grade III students, and they still find very silly questions. Do the Indians go to the bathroom the same as we do? or else do they still live in teepees? or are they still scalping people? therefore the children who are aged nine and ten, or eight, nine and ten still have this image of the Indian because they get it from the history books, or social studies.

Senator McElman: Or television?

Reverend Cuthand: Or television, yes. So the Curriculum Revision Committee of the Province then becomes very important. I happen to be on the Curriculum Revision Committee of the Province of Manitoba, and I know Father Renaud has done a great deal of work in this area. As a matter of fact, he is one of the leaders in all of Canada in this area of work.

The Chairman: Would you care to make a comment on that, Father?

Father Renaud: Well, it is one of the toughest jobs to do—to revise curriculum because it is like setting in a different direction a massive structure which is not just a text book. You have got your teacher training institutes, and departments of education, and the whole works.

This is where again short cuts could be taken definitely through a greater contribution from radio and television—because books are getting out of fashion more and more—if there were more programs, or more studies, or documentaries. The films have started to do some things but every so often they get clipped here and there and they cannot do it any further. The same thing applies with the production of tape recorded materials that can be used, or fed through the system in school broadcasts. There is not enough yet, and particularly on the development of the west. We are missing out on history which is far more fascinating than what we hear about; but they do not want to hear it, and I expect this is why this Committee is here—to study the ways and means of getting these things done. We are ready to advise, to suggest, and so forth, but you are the people who can say—give the green light.

Senator Prowse: If the press were to adopt as a style, in any case where they are dealing with a crime, or with poverty, they would give the persons named but no further identification of them? Would this be a step in the right direction? If they would do this voluntarily—I am not suggesting that we should make it a law?

Mr. Deiter: I suggest that we leave the names out of the business for a while until we get a little more development out of people because our names are definitely tell-tale at this time.

Senator Prowse: They are part of the stereotype.

The Chairman: Could I read something from your brief? I would like to have the comments from you, Chief and Reverend Cuthand, and perhaps from you, Mr. Rogers.

In Section 14—you say in the second sentence, "Mass media is designed to be bland pap, inoffensive to all, and suited to the advertising of consumer items like soap, deodorant, automobiles and cheese". That seems to me to be a terribly damning indictment of media generally. Do you mean the statement to be as strong as it seems when you read it and is that your general observations on the media generally? Let us start with you, Chief?

Mr. Deiter: (No answer.)

The Chairman: Or do you want to start, Bruce?

Mr. Rogers: Well, the point we are trying to make here—if there is a broad bias in the media in Canada, this would seem to be the single greatest bias—that the media are for the most part commercially operated, and including the C.B.C.'s efforts that they are dependent upon advertising revenues for their maintenance and operation; and in order to reach the greatest possible audience, one of the trite and true techniques is to offend as few as possible. If that is your guideline then chances are you are not going to provide much more than pap. Now, obviously that is sort of generalization. It does not stand up when you find an admirable effort in a newspaper, and social criticism in a daily, or some of the public affairs efforts of the C.B.C. It is not so much an indictment as citing that one overwhelming influence on the conduct of the media.

The Chairman: Reverend Cuthand?

Reverend Cuthand: I went into a home last year where the little girl of the family was crying. The mother was unmarried but they had been able to get a television set at a very nominal cost. The reason why the little girl was crying was because of the fact that she wanted to go to a drive-in centre and the mother had no car, and they had no money. This is the sort of thing that happens to the poverty-stricken people of this country. We advertise so many things they cannot afford, and it does disturb the children who are short of money. You can go to certain finance companies to borrow, or else trade in the car for a new one. For the poverty-stricken people who have this kind of problem, because so much is advertised that they cannot afford, therefore the children become dissatisfied, they are dissatisfied with their parents and this creates family problems.

The Chairman: May I say sir, that I made that very point, perhaps not as eloquently, but I made that very point in the speech I made in the Senate last February in which I proposed this Committee be structured. I agree totally with that, and I am delighted you made the point. I cannot help wondering though if this sentence is not too sweeping. I wonder if we went downstairs now and bought the Ottawa Journal, and the Ottawa Citizen on the news stand, I wonder if we could condemn them as "bland pap, inoffensive to all". I appreciate you may have said this, and the point is well taken—this point is well made throughout the entire brief—but perhaps that extreme phraseology—I am not trying to be argumentative, I just wonder if you mean it as severely as it hits me when I read it?

Mr. Rogers: I think we prefer you to concentrate on the first sentence of No. 14 where the suggestion is made that "Government policy and support is necessary to improve media performance because of media dependence on advertising revenues". Government policy, attitudes, moral persuasion if you like, support of various kinds could be used to change the bias of the total media picture—if there were more community stations of the sort that we discussed earlier.

The Chairman: You are talking now of the electronic media, are you?

Mr. Rogers: Not necessarily, no. We could be talking about print media as well. If there was more of this designed to serve community purposes as well, that would probably change the performance of established media as well; but it would certainly change the total picture if these communities were serving their own needs—their own needs with their own facilities. The few attempts so far as publishing from Indian communities could certainly do with assistance, and the Indian community could be assisted greatly in communicating with one another. This would change the overall picture.

Senator Prowse: On page 6, the second paragraph on the top of the page—about half way down it says "Government subsidy programs, such as Manpower retraining, have rules and regulations that also prohibit the involvement of Indian people". How does this work? or how does it have this result?

Father Renaud: Could I answer this? There are minimum standards for admission, and if you recall what I said about the adult Indian population not having gone to school, they fall below even that low standard. In some Provinces like Saskatchewan, I have tried to lower that level, but they have not been able to do it as affluently as the manpower program, and as a result they have not been too successful.

Senator Prowse: In other words there has not been enough preliminary work done to bring them up to the level where they could take advantage of the programs that presently exist. So either you have to supplement the present program, bring it down so they can help the people, or else put in a supplementary program?

Father Renaud: Yes, acknowledge the specific needs of that particular group that are not met—that are not met by the general program, and accept them as part of the total deal, or bring up another set of programs.

Senator Prowse: That is another question, and it falls within the same thing as you are speaking of now. Have the recent cuts in the budget of the film board actually resulted in a diminution of the work that could be done by that Board for the native people?

Father Renaud: This is what we heard recently.

Senator Prowse: From them?

Father Renaud: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Thank you.

The Chairman: Yes, Senator Hays?

Senator McElman: On that Manpower program, is it not true that currently there is available a program—and this can be run any time of the day, or any time of the night as I recall—classes which start at the very beginning? It is called up-grading training I believe—or something similar—so that even with adult people who are illiterate, you can start them, and they work through until they get the rudiments of spelling, reading, writing and arithmetic, and then they are moved into another grade, and it is continuous?

Father Renaud: This is just beginning.

Senator McElman: It has been in effect for eight years that I am aware of?

Father Renaud: What Province?

Senator McElman: In New Brunswick.

Father Renaud: Yes. It all depends on the regional office, and so on—the way they interpret the Act.

Senator McElman: Yes, well I know it has been put to extensive use in that Province.

Mr. Deiter: I went to Manpower and asked them for programs for Indian people, and there was a misunderstanding here. Instead of lowering the standard to meet the Indian people where they were, they give us more spaces.

Father Renaud: Which we could not use.

Senator Prowse: Could not use?

Senator McElman: Have you tried through the Provincial Department of Labour to get this going with Manpower?

Mr. Deiter: Oh, yes, we have been really active in this field. I started on this education kick in about 1956. I was trying to get a course that would not be so junior, but would fit grown up people, and it took about four years before they produced one.

Senator Prowse: The juniors were grown up by that time.

Mr. Deiter: The fellows I sent had never seen inside the class room. They were fellows working in the city, and they just wanted to be able to read the bills, or read the orders, or read anything, you see; At that time we had a guy driving eighty-five miles every time to come in and learn just basic reading—just a basic reading course that we had.

Senator McElman: I cannot understand, Mr. Chairman, because this program is available in Canada, and not in any particular Province in Canada I don't think. I am sure there were no particular arrangements made, and this would seem to be the sort of program you are looking for.

Mr. Deiter: This is another point, that we have a hard time. We have not got the funds available to get that kind of information out to the people. We have hundreds of programs, and it is to get it out to the people, to get the proper explanation so that they will take these kind of programs.

The Chairman: Senators, will you try and complete the questioning in the next ten or fifteen minutes? Will you therefore organize yourselves with that in mind. I think we can do it.

Senator Hays, I think you have the next question?

Senator Hays: Where is the largest vacuum in your opinion? Is it economic insofar as the newspaper media is concerned? Or education-wise? I would just like to make an observation. It seems to me in the last eight or ten years, in the field of economics, there has been a great deal of planning that must have been of great help to your people—that certainly was to everyone, I think, in Canada insofar as economics are concerned, and I am speaking particularly in agriculture, and I am wondering—

The Chairman: Do you mean in the media?

Senator Hays: In the media, yes.

Mr. Deiter: It is getting this information explained to Indian people. With most of the programs that are designed, they spend five minutes on the application and how they are going to put it across, or how they are going to tell the people about it, and they spend the rest of the month designing a program that will not even fit the situation that they are going after.

We have the same problem with the Branch right now. They have got fifty million there they have been yelling about for six or eight years, and we still have not got one nickel of it for economic development.

Senator Hays: Chief, I was not meaning that, but insofar as the news media is concerned, if there is a vacuum, which you say there is, your people are not—they are just not getting enough news through either broadcasting, radio, or the news media. The newspapers? Where is the big vacuum? Is it on the cultural side, educational or economic? You take for instance the program on agriculture that they have every Sunday for instance—what do they call it? Country Calendar? If you just listen to that every week, it is a fantastic farm program if you are interested, and want to go ahead and do it. I think every farmer in Canada is better off that listens to it. It must be listened to; and I am sure it must be listened to by your people. I can think of many, many programs like this that are wonderful programs. I am wondering if it is economic, cultural, or educational? Where are these vacuums? Or is it a language problem?

Mr. Deiter: Combination of both—about three or four things in this light here. Being able to understand the English that is being spoken over the television, or the radio—we have got one-third of our northern people—

Senator Hays: Education?

Mr. Deiter: That don't speak the language. Maybe another third that just have basic English that they can hardly communicate with—

Senator Hays: Do you suppose these programs—I remember being in Japan about a year-and-a-half ago, and my wife was with me in the hotel room. She said "I want to show you something you will get a kick out of", and the Gomer Pyle program was on, and he was speaking Japanese. You can go to any country and see this dubbing-in of languages. May be this is an area—it is taped anyway, would this be of help? This sort of thing?

Mr. Deiter: This is one of the things that we are talking about in our brief.

Senator Hays: It really is a language problem?

Father Renaud: Communications problem.

Mr. Rogers: I think perhaps if I waited it might be more convenient for your question, Senator.

There are two ways in which you could describe the vacuum. One would be the lack of reflection of the Indian, Eskimo and Metis part as a part of the Canadian Society, and under that heading there are a number of other categories which cover things like the dominant poverty culture which is part of the native culture of Canada.

Another point would be no reflection of the aspirations of Indian people as part of this country. Another one would be the broad cultural thing, what are the contributions, and what they have contributed. What is their cultural place? Another one under that same heading would be employment, employment in the media. One of the ways in which the media could reflect their presence would be greater employment opportunities in the media.

Then, the second category of vacuum, I suppose would be that the Indians are only on a very small scale able to speak to Indians and to Canadians at large.

Mr. Chairman: Very good, Bruce.

Senator Hays: That is a very good answer.

The Chairman: Are there any other questions?

Senator Prowse: I have one?

Senator Hays: Yes, I am through.

Senator Prowse: Page 11, right-under the Recommendation 35:

"That more stringent limits on concentrated multi-media ownership be instituted in order to avoid the widening gulf between the 'haves' and the 'have-nots'. When one part of society controls the major means of communication in a country, and when the dominant society fails to adequately reflect the needs and aspirations of the minority groups, the country is probably set on a course toward violent social action as minority groups seek their rightful place by other means".

Now, what I am concerned about... you are talking about the "concentrated multi-media ownership". Has it been your experience that the individually owned media, like the privately owned papers or singly owned papers tend to do a better job in the area than newspapers that are owned by chains, or multi-media areas?

Mr. Rogers: I do not think that is really the distinction that this attempted to make.

Senator Prowse: What you are doing is widening the distinction between the "haves" and "have-nots"?

Mr. Rogers: It is strictly the economic division that the native culture is predominately part of the poverty culture.

Senator Prowse: I see, thank you.

The Chairman: Are there any other questions?

Senator McElman: This matter of the negative side of the image of our native people, if I could just lead into this by saying that all of us have been watching, over our adulthood, the television of the U.S. films—United States' shows one way or another. We get them and have been getting them for a long time, and there is always the cowboy chasing the Indian, and The "uncle tom" show. Now, as a consequence of the virtual uprising of the black people in the States you do not see the "uncle tom" show anymore—now, I am not suggesting that is the way to overcome it, nor by putting on equally grade B movies where the Indian chases the cowboy and wins the show; but have you taken the practical approach of—as an association, dealing with C.B.C., or C.A.T.V., because let us face it, television today is what is making the impressions with our younger people. This is where we should be aiming, I think you will agree, the adult population, or adult generation—how much are we going to change the impressions that have been put over so many years? It is the younger people that T.V. is reaching. Have you taken the practical approach as an Association to deal with the heads of C.B.C., and the heads of C.A.T.V.?

The Chairman: Do you mean C.A.T.V. or do mean C.T.V.?

Senator McElman: C.T.V., I am sorry.

The Chairman: All right.

Senator McElman: With the objective of at least reducing the incidence of these bad movies, and I mean "bad", not just in the sense of the cowboy beating the Indian?

Mr. Rogers: The Indian-Eskimo Association is a citizens' group, as opposed to purely a native group. Individuals have been running that kind of campaign by the mails, and telephone calls for some time, and apparently with some effect; but in a more positive way, they have been trying to get the deeper story, if you like, across in the daily news opportunities. I think that has been the approach, not so much to censor these things that have long been a part of the television fare, but to promote coverage of things more substantial and contemporary.

Senator McElman: You misunderstand me. I am not suggesting a censorship, but that the association go to the heads of C.T.V. and C.B.C. and say, "Could we have your co-operation for these reasons? You are dealing with young people, it is these young people that watch the shows. Could we have your co-operation?"

Mr. Rogers: The Indian-Eskimo Association is done that certainly in relation to C.B.C., and with a great deal of co-operation, particularly in radio, but also television people are involved in the other organizations.

The Chairman: I think Chief Deiter would like to add something.

Mr. Deiter: I appreciate your question, and I sure will follow this up because we are just more or less of a new organization, and we are dealing with things as fast as we possibly can, and this is one thing we will certainly go after.

Senator McElman: All right.

The Chairman: You should be, and I am sure you are, mindful of the enormous technological advances which are upon us in the media, and which should, I think, provide the kind of access you are after. You know this is almost here now and I think it should be—it may be—far less difficult in the future than it has been in the past, for technological reasons over and beyond the accelerated awareness of your problems.

Mr. Rogers: Are you speaking there of the proliferation of channels by cable?

The Chairman: That is one thing, yes. There are other things. Senator McElman, were you finished?

Senator McElman: Yes, thank you.

The Chairman: I just had one other question I wanted to ask. I would be curious to know which of the existing media have the greatest influence on your various native communities in the country? Are they more influenced by television or print—now, at the present time?

Father Renaud: Radio.

The Chairman: Radio. Because it is radio that they hear most, yes. Senator Bourque?

Senator Bourque: I would like to know if these gentlemen all speak the language, the native language of the area we are talking about now? Do you speak the native language, sir?

Mr. Deiter: No.

Senator Bourque: And does the Father?

Father Renaud: No.

Senator Bourque: You speak French too, Father?

Father Renaud: Yes.

The Chairman: Mr. Rogers says that he speaks the native tongue of Toronto. That is a very special dialect, Senator Bourque.

Senator Bourque: Yes. Well, what I have in mind, near Montreal we have the Caughnawaga Indians, and I was just wondering if any of these gentlemen speak the language they speak?

Mr. Deiter: No.

Father Renaud: No, that is a different language entirely.

Senator Bourque: A different language entirely, is it?

Father Renaud: Yes, and the Caughnawaga people have to relearn. They had lost it for awhile.

Senator Hays: How many different native tongues are there?

Father Renaud: That depends on how you classify the mother tongue. There are eleven mother basic tongues, and about fifty-two dialects.

Senator Hays: Are you suggesting then that you would have to cover all of these groups that are over fifteen years of age?

Mr. Deiter: No. I was sitting around the table where there were eleven bands represented in the area meeting, and there was eleven different languages spoken there—so they all had to communicate in English.

The Chairman: Could I ask just one other question. You immediately answered my last question which was about which media had the greatest influence. You said the radio. Now, I expect in giving that answer you were thinking of Indians generally. Let me ask specifically about Indians in Toronto, for example, and in the big cities, which media would influence them most?

Mr. Deiter: Radio.

The Chairman: Still radio again?

Mr. Rogers: I think so.

The Chairman: More than television?

Mr. Rogers: Well, I think so. You see so much of the Indian population the City of Toronto would be young people, and they live in single rooms very often. They don't have television sets but many of them can afford a transistor radio, so they listen to the popular rock stations, or country and western stations for the most part.

The Chairman: So it would still be radio. That is very interesting.

Senator Hays: How many Indians are there in Toronto?

Mr. Rogers: There is no real record, and no way of assessing it. There are about 30,000 in Winnipeg now I think.

Senator Hays: I understood Senator Gladstone to tell me there were about 25,000.

Mr. Rogers: In Toronto. That would probably be a modest estimate if there are now 30,000 in Winnipeg. I would suspect there would be more in Toronto.

The Chairman: Senator Smith?

Senator Smith: I would like to put forward a personal point of view about the effect, at least of one media, on exciting the interests of the general Canadian population in the plight that the Metis, and Indians, and Eskimo find themselves?

The Chairman: Please do?

Senator Smith: I find myself from time to time, not running, but walking rather rapidly in defence of some work that is done by the C.B.C. As I was listening to a lot of the commentaries being made, I got thinking about three or four items which I myself had seen on television, which also were discussed by friends of mine. One was the story of this Johnny Esneau—I think that was the title of it—which depicted this unfortunate Indian boy, who through no fault of his own, was in a great storm in one of the western cities, and it was a very sympathetic treatment of that young Indian. The point I am trying to make is that it also might have indicated to the Indian people that we are always depicting one of this kind of Indian, and not a fellow who is making a go of it in life; but in order to excite the sympathy of the white people who do not have a closer contact with them, this is the kind of way that you can do it.

Now, I hope I am not taking up too much time, but I think it is important. I was impressed, as were some of my friends over the dramatization of this true story about a young Indian boy who got in a mess in Ottawa, and finally lost his life through suicide. I thought that was a very sympathetic touch that that little Indian lad, through no fault of his own, could not make it in the educational system, and we white people who are attempting to do something about Indian Affairs—you know making their life more comfortable for them in every way—I think are helped by having our sense of values in these things brought to our attention.

Now, I can think of one or two others, and I think these have been valuable things, and that is why I would hope you would not insist on stopping that kind of presentation of that kind of Indian. We are looking to help him, and when we do that we are also looking to help all the other Indian peoples. I think the C.B.C. has done a terrific job in painting the picture of the Eskimos up north.

I have been in the north a little bit, and I have seen it close at hand, and now I find my friends talking about the kind of conditions due to the economic changes, the sociological changes that are coming to the Eskimo people; and I think that his story has been well told in some of the colour documentaries.

I do not expect any particular response, but I thought I should at least express my own personal view on this thing.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator. Anybody care to comment?

Father Renaud: We agree.

Senator Bourque: I say that I am sympathetic to the Indian movement because I had the honour of being made a Chief of the Caughnawaga Tribe sometime ago. My name is Chief Tetakiwiniswatha.

Senator McElman: What does it mean?

Senator Bourque: It means he who spreads the news.

Senator Smith: Well, that is what this is all about.

The Chairman: Perhaps on that note we can conclude this session. Now, I want to thank you four gentlemen for being with us. I am sorry, Father, that you did not have a formal invitation. We are delighted that you joined us. One of the purposes of this study is to view the entire Canadian media in full perspective and I think it would be impossible to develop that perspective without the kind of discussion which we have had here this afternoon. Your brief, I can assure you, will be in a valuable place in our files; and in our ultimate deliberations. Thank you very much.

May I say to the Members of our Committee, our next meeting is this evening at eight o'clock in this room. We have four people appearing with a brief on behalf of the Association of the English media Journalists of Quebec, and that is at eight o'clock.

Thank you.

The Committee adjourned at 4:15 p.m. until 8:00 p.m.

Upon resuming at 8.30 p.m.

The Chairman: This evening we are receiving a brief from the Association of English-Media Journalists of Quebec. Sitting on my immediate right is the president of the organization, Mr. David Waters who, as well as being the president of this group is also associate editor of the Montreal Star. At his right is Mr. Dick MacDonald who is a reporter with the Montreal Star. On my immediate left is Miss Joan Fraser who is a reporter with the Financial Times and on her left is Mr. Rod Blaker who is director of public affairs at radio station CJAD in Montreal.

Now, as honourable senators will appreciate, we have received the brief from this group just this evening and I had a word with the president and he proposes, and I am sure we would agree, that he might perhaps take the time now and read the brief and we will read along with him. It is not a long brief and I think that is probably a pretty good idea. If you wish to add any additional comment as you go through or wish to explain or expand I am sure that is fine.

Following the reading of the brief you and the group will be available for questioning based on the brief and indeed based on other things.

I think I should make it clear that these people come as a group and some of their answers will be made as a group, but it is possible too, that some of the answers they will be making as individuals and so I will ask that when you are answering questions would you perhaps indicate whether it is a group attitude or whether in fact you are speaking for yourself.

Mr. David Waters (President, Association of English-Media Journalists of Quebec): Thank you, Senator Davey.

Honourable senators, the Association of English-Media Journalists of Quebec is pleased to appear before your committee to submit not only its recommendations but even more, its concerns, for your scrutiny.

The Association was formed only in April of this year. Elected directors were: President, David Waters, Associate Editor, the Montreal Star; secretary-treasurer—Joan Fraser, reporter, the Financial Times of Canada; Rod Blaker—Director of Public Affairs, CJAD; Bill Coulthard—reporter, The Canadian Press; George Cree—chief photographer, the Gazette; Evelyn Dumas—Associate Editor, The Montreal Star; Donald Foley—City Editor, the Montreal Star; Dick MacDonald—reporter, the Montreal Star; and Sean McGoldrick—Editor in Charge, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

The initial impetus for our formation was the emergence of a federation of bodies representing the French journalists in Quebec. The federation sought our participation and our participation had to be as a group and not as individuals. For a number of reasons, including a financial one, we have not yet joined the federation but we hope to be able to work out some kind of link with it in the near future.

I might at this time point out that certainly in Quebec there was heretofore no organized body of English media journalists. The French have been organized for some time in various groups and various unions of one sort or another but English journalists were never so organized in any way at all.

The Association now has 65 members. They include substantial representation from Montreal's two English dailies, from Montreal's radio stations, and from a number of wire services and weeklies in and around Montreal. We have only a few members from the television outlets in the city. The English-media journalists in Quebec are not a large number, and we believe that when our membership passes the 100 mark we will be substantially representative of the entire profession.

The plans and purposes of the Association are varied. We hope it will become a central body from which information about the profession can be given to members, that it will offer a forum for settling issues affecting journalism—and I just might point out here that the constitution limits us considerably. When we mean settling issues, we mean having a dialogue about them and attempting to reach a kind of intellectual consensus, but in the constitution—the journalists who joined and formed this institution were quite strong on this point, that they didn't want any kind of a body, like a Bar Association, or a Medical Association which would have any restrictive powers over them, or any power to censor individuals.

When we spoke on issues, we were to speak theoretically about the broader implications of the issues but not individually.

If necessary, it will pass information to the general public regarding the position of the profession on certain issues.

The Association would strive to provide proper representation of the members should a Press Council be created and it would, as in the case at hand, appear on behalf of the membership before a commission whose subject matter or conclusions could affect the profession.

We envisage the Association functioning as a clearing house for data related to journalism scholastic courses, a system of grants or bursaries for special study projects and the like. This, of course, would entail maintaining contact with universities or other educational institutions whose curricula might be of interest to the members.

The matter of protecting the professional rights of a member—as in a situation where there is legal or other pressure to break confidence regarding news sources—naturally would be a vital concern of the Association.

So far the effort of the Association executive has been largely devoted to the difficult problem of recruitment. But, we have begun to investigate the ethical issues facing journalists, and in this regard we sponsored in November a wide-ranging one day seminar on Ethics in the Profession.

The Association expects to be preoccupied for some time with the twin concerns of ethics and education. There has been far too little discussion of the former; and far too little availability of the latter. Journalists know that they must increasingly be better informed. What they learn on the job needs to be supplemented by more time spent studying. Opportunities for this are presently inadequate. The need for financial assistance and for more cooperation between journalism and the universities is obvious to us.

We would like to emphasize before proceeding to the substance of our brief that the Association has been in existence for only 6 months. We are a new phenomenon in English-language journalism in Quebec. The Association is the first formal structure through which Quebec English-language journalists in the various media can discuss and express matters of professional concern amongst themselves, with the public, or with other levels of management. Hence we have a very limited amount of organized knowledge about ourselves and our concerns, and we have had very little opportunity so far to discuss them among ourselves, with other groups or with management. That kind of dialogue is only beginning, and we would like to note here that higher management in the various media have expressed a cooperative interest in both the aims and the existence of the Association.

The Association's brief is divided into three main parts: 1) The answers some of our members made to a questionnaire which was sent them based upon the guidelines which your staff forwarded to us. 2) The summary of dialogues we held with some of our members on what were the primary concerns we faced as a profession. 3) The recommendations the Association wanted to make.

Of our 65 members, 23 completed a questionnaire which was sent to them based upon your committee's guidelines. The completed questionnaires came from a reasonable cross-section of the membership by age, rank and position.

The Association would like to point out that in regard to the questionnaires many of the respondents expressed their hostility towards the nature of the questions. Quite a few said that a great many of them were irrelevant. Many suggested that the concerns implicit in the questions, and the way those questions were focused, did not represent or elicit the real problems that were bothering them.

Nineteen of the twenty-three defined freedom of the press as the right of journalists to report news and information without interference from any source, or conversely as the right of the public to be informed about any and all matters affecting them. It is interesting that only one person mentioned in this connection the freedom to operate as a business to make a profit.

The respondents unanimously agreed that the primary functions of the mass media are to inform and interpret. Twelve said that another important function was to lead public opinion.

Eleven added to the list of functions those of elevating public taste and promoting causes, but some said that these should be restricted to the editorial and opposite editorial pages.

There was a consensus in the answer that the principal responsibilities are to report honestly, fairly and accurately; to understand the subject and admit one's own limitations; and to avoid irresponsibility, latent bias and corruption.

Twenty of the twenty-three believe that the freedom of the press is threatened in some way. Nine of these said that by its very nature the press will always be threatened. Six believe that financial interests present a serious threat to the integrity of journalism. Many said that the growing complexity of information made distortion of the news through manipulation by such groups as politicians and public relations people much easier than heretofore.

Internal and external commercial pressures were frequently mentioned.

In fact, two thirds of the respondents believe that the news is to some extent affected by commercial interests. Most felt that these influences were for the most part no longer direct or overt, but rather subtle and indirect pressures to which journalists may be subject and against which few had adequate time or ability to fully protect themselves. Eight respondents said such pressures are constant.

Some journalists expressed the fear that such pressures were indirectly moulding both the personalities of journalists and the way they write to the definite detriment of an honest press.

Half the people who completed the questionnaire said they do not believe the press is adequately protected, although there was no consensus about how best to protect it. Two people pointed out that existing laws deal with the possible abuse of the freedom of the press and not with its protection.

Eighteen respondents said that apart from cases involving national security or something of equal gravity, journalists should have the legal right to withhold the names of their sources. Those who do not wish this privilege argued that a journalist should not be entitled to any rights not shared by the average citizen.

Most respondents had few objections to multiple ownership and similar investment patterns. Only three people said that communications-based companies should not be allowed to invest in more than one medium, and only seven suggested that such investment be limited in scope or regulated to prevent interference with editorial policy. Only three people felt that companies with interests outside communications should not be allowed to invest in the mass media.

However, half of those who approved said that in such cases owners should be regulated so that no monopoly is created and that editorial freedom is preserved. Everyone who answered the questionnaire felt that newspapers should have to publish information about owners.

The replies were divided on the advantages and disadvantages of the growing concentration of ownership. Ten people said that a larger organization is stronger, can fight outside pressures better, and can pool scarce resources to provide better news coverage. But twelve people also pointed out that concentration of ownership can lead to the stifling of opinion or to the standardization of news and that such concentration would increase the pressure towards conformity.

Fifteen people said they approved of investigating the possibility of a press council, although many said it would have to be carefully studied before being established. People who opposed the idea usually cited the British experience as evidence against one being set up here. Three said they were undecided.

Most respondents felt they were not qualified to answer the questions on the credibility of the various media, or on whether an "establishment" controlled the Canadian mass media. Some objected to the very term "establishment" as too vague.

The realities of their work elicited substantial answers from most respondents. Poor working conditions were a sore point with fifteen of them. They used such expressions as "messy", "depressing", "chaotic", "archaic", "a factory environment", "lacks certain basic amenities such as decent heating", "physical conditions are abominable", "poor organization", "we need researchers and better libraries." Yet one-third said that they were either good or at least adequate.

A number of respondents were worried about the working reporters' difficulty in communicating with middle management, especially with the editors and desk men who handle their copy. Nine of the respondents said that it is the men at this level in the media who have the greatest power to determine what news and information actually reaches the public.

Only four people felt that salaries were generally good enough to keep the best journalists working in the field. Of the fifteen who said there are not enough good recruits, half said this was directly attributable to the industry's low salary rates.

Nearly all the respondents were strongly in favour of widely increased opportunities for education and further training, not so much in professional skills as in interdisciplinary work or in academic subjects related to the journalist field of interest. Seventeen of the twenty-three people said that they would like to see greater co-operation between the media and the universities; sixteen strongly recommended that continuing or further education be made available. For the most part these people mentioned sabbaticals, seminars and academic courses as potentially valuable.

Most respondents felt that the media's recruitment policies left much to be desired. They said that hiring practises were very haphazard. One person suggested recruiting drives in universities similar to those conducted by other industries.

If a major tonal characteristic emerges from these questionnaires it is the strong strain of self-criticism they expressed. Not one person said he believed all the media are doing their job adequately at all times, although 10 said this does sometimes occur. There was a strong emphasis throughout on the need and the desire to improve the media.

Because so many respondents to the questionnaire expressed the belief that the questions did not elicit their real concerns, the Association decided to hold several meetings with its members to probe this feeling. As usual, the more actively interested members attended. They were asked to forget the questionnaire which was sent to them, or the Senate committee's guidelines upon which it was based, and express what they wanted the Association to tell the committee.

In the next few pages we will attempt to convey the substance of those meetings. I might point out here that those meetings were very rambling and quite undisciplined. We taped most of the sessions and we studied what was brought up and the supporting evidences that people brought and what we are proceeding to now is a digest of what these people who attended the meeting said.

One of their major concerns was about the problem of the relevancy of today's journalism and what could be done to improve it. They were disturbed at the fact that in their view the public had lost faith in today's reporting of what was happening. An article in Fortune Magazine (October, 1969) was cited as an apt analysis of what was probably wrong with journalism and where it should be going. The article argues that most media today have an anachronistic view of what news is. It claims that the media are so caught up in "the story, the dramatic, disruptive, exceptional event" that they are failing to report properly the changes which will have a profound influence on our society in the future.

In the view of those at the meetings, journalism was too contingent on the big scoop and all the bang bang, razzle-dazzle that goes with it. The media, they felt, devote too great a proportion of their coverage to riots, fires, routine court cases, Grey Cup games and politicians' speeches.

Good journalism should probably be much more concerned, they felt, with the shifting emphasis taking place in our society, with the effects of the computer, the developments in genetics, the stresses and strains of our society floundering before the sudden explosion of knowledge.

The Fortune Magazine article summed up the problem this way:

"When news fails to add up to the permutations of change, the best informed men lack confidence that they know what is going on. Many of those who most confidently assert that they know, don't. Radicals and reactionaries both tend to ignore actual change and to derive their passionately-held views from a simple and more static society that isn't here. The noisiest debates tend to be irrelevant because their informational backgrounds are fragmentary and out of date. Even the most powerful nation—with the highest production of knowledge—thus becomes pervaded by a sense of its own ignorance and helplessness because it feels, correctly, that it has no adequate view of its own direction. Lack of confidence in the quality of the news could be fatal in our kind of society."

But if they felt the quality and relevancy of the news is one of the most critical problems the media are facing, those who attended the meetings voiced uncertainty about how that problem can best be faced, and their disgivings that the media have the structures and the resources to cope with it.

There is first of all the problem of coping with the vastness and the complexity of the information which must be assimilated, understood and reported on. Journalists, they believed, were aware that the volume is already far greater than they can presently handle. There is an obvious need for such things as computerized data banks to absorb the mass of material and organize it so that it can be useful to the media. But can specific media outlets finance such things and if not, who will? Under whose control should they be?

Many of those at the meetings felt that the rapidity of change, the selectivity that the media must perform because of the volume of information, and the sensitivity to what society needed to know that this role imposed would force journalists to reassess the whole question of objective journalism which is still the operative assumption upon which the mass media are based. This, in a sense, was their second major area of concern—the respective roles of objective versus what has become, perhaps mistakenly, termed advocacy journalism.

Few journalists today would claim to report just "the facts." That may be possible in covering an event which is simple and relatively unimportant, like riots and Grey Cup games. But most of the areas a journalist is called on to report require that he exercise judgment about its significance. He is forced to digest complexity and zero in on its import. The public—certainly the intelligent public—knows that it is not getting complete objectivity. But it is forced to read between the lines to assess the judgment that is being exercised on its behalf. But how to re-focus the work of the media so that the public will be better able to grasp and assess the real task they are performing is an unresolved question.

Many outlets are experimenting with the suggestions made by David Deitch in an article which appeared recently in The Nation, and which was cited favourably by those at the meetings.

"One possible course for an adventurous management would be to experiment with a program that devotes a limited amount of space each day to the opinions of those reporters who have sufficient confidence in their ability. The space would be clearly identified as containing advocacy accounts by writers involved, and the content would be under the control of those producing them. It would be understood by all concerned that the judgments were those of the reporters, who had acquired the privilege of stating them by demonstrating good sense, knowledge and general competence."

But this kind of reporting still is clearly segregated from what is presented as objective news. Many of the journalists who came to the meetings which discussed this issue felt that such distinctions were inherently false and dangerous to the media's credibility. The issue is a grave one. If more and more judgment is to be exercised by the mass media regardless of the guise under which it is presented, then two related problems assume much greater importance.

Those who make the judgments must be constantly better prepared and informed. There would be little point in worrying about the media at all, if the incompetence of those who form the basis of it were making a mockery of it to begin with. Hence, the great importance of such things as more time and money allocated to studying and gathering information.

And if more and better judgment is to be exercised at the base of the media pyramid, members at the meetings thought, then better structures to protect it and those who produce it from tampering by those who dislike the results may have to be found.

These members indicated that the category of those who might wish to influence their judgment extended over a wide range of possibilities—from outside commercial pressures to personal friendships (sometimes referred to within the profession as "cronyism").

These problems are only beginning to be examined and discussed in Canada. Some suggested that European countries appear to be far ahead of us in this field and gave examples: At France's influential L'Express, a new constitution is being designed to bring employees more closely into the decision-making process in order to provide them with power to protect themselves.

In West Germany, the editors of Stern have produced an editorial charter under which they now function. After a preamble which states that the editors are committed to democracy and to progressive and liberal principles, the charter declares that no editor or staff member can be compelled to write anything against his own conscience and his refusal may not be held against him. A seven man editorial board has been established which is elected annually by secret ballot. A new election can be called if 30 members of the editorial staff request it. All staff members are eligible to serve and everyone has a right to vote if he has been a member for more than half a year.

The charter goes on to specify that the Board must be consulted by the management on any change in ownership, and on the appointment of an editor in chief, who cannot be dismissed if the board disapproves such action by a two-thirds majority. An editor in chief is empowered to make personnel decisions in the editorial department, but he cannot make changes in managing editors, department heads or political contributors without a two-thirds vote of approval by the board.

Italy as well as France and Germany is moving towards greater participation and greater protection of journalists.

Should that be the direction of change in Canada? What changes should be made in Canadian journalism? We know that the question must be posed, but in all honesty we are uncertain about how to answer it. The simple fact is that while self-criticism exists in the mass media in Canada, the kind of study which must precede formulation of the right answers about the future changes has not been done, and the kind of knowledge upon which both answers must be based has not been accumulated.

Canadian journalism is, we suspect, only at the beginning of the process of change. It is in this sense that we make the following few recommendations to your committee.

First, we urge that you structure your hearings into two distinct phases. The initial phase should be restricted to the gathering of information. Because of the paucity of knowledge about the Canadian mass media and the direction it should take, we would like an opportunity to study the information you uncover and return to report what recommendations we would like you to make, based upon it.

Only then should the second phase, that of deciding your ultimate recommendations, be undertaken.

Secondly, we urge that the Committee go out into the field to rap with journalists across Canada to gain a feeling for their world and their concerns. We believe this is especially important because your investigations should be centred on them. The media is not machinery but people. And journalists are the most essential people within it.

Thirdly, we urge that your Committee undertake some study of what is happening outside Canada, because it appears to us that the range of what is occurring here may be too narrow for a proper compilation of the data upon which to base recommendations about the future of the Canadian media.

Fourthly, we urge you to study not only the present condition of the mass media, but espe cially what will be its needs in the coming decades, because we suspect that present resources to meet those needs may be inadequate and that government may have to play a substantial role if those resources are to be adequately increased.

We wish that we could make more specific recommendations to your Committee. But we are a new organization, and we are only beginning to confront our own professional concerns in any disciplined and organized fashion.

To do more than make the above general recommendations would be to practise the kind of irresponsibility that we have come into existence to work against.

We are confident that the work of your Committee will be of assistance to all of us in making our profession and our industry better serve the Canadian public.

In the appendix—well, perhaps I should read them. A number of people who came to the meeting wanted their own specific recommendation made known to you. We also took from the questionnaires that were presented what we felt were representative, specific recommendations. We have listed them here. They are not ones in which the Association was prepared to make any kind of a decision so we listed them for your perusal.

1: Newspapers should be operated by non-profit corporations. 2: Freedom of the Press should be spelled out completely in the Canadian constitution. 3: The media should provide inservice training for newcomers, continuing education for middle senior staff and professional development for senior staff. As well, definite policies should be set in regard to time off or leave of absence for upgrading education and qualifications, for it now is difficult to properly plan a career.

4: Clarification is needed of a newspaper's responsibility in matters of libel.

5: It would be advantageous to have a permanent "Davey Committee."

Senator Prowse: This may turn out to be just that.

Mr. Waters: 6: There should be assurances in law of protection for journalists who wish to guard their sources.

7: What is needed is a clear and realistic explanation of the job opportunities and what journalism entails as a career to those contemplating it—before they embark on university curricula.

21415-4

8: The possibility of an exchange program of journalists, to include Europe, South America and the Orient, should be explored.

9: Reservations must be expressed toward the excessive centralisation of governmental information services, which may limit the public's access to balanced, varied, multi-sided data.

10: Thought should be given to creating a national press council.

11: There should be serious consideration of accrediting journalists as professionals.

12: A study should be made of the question of police harassment of and interference with news media representatives reporting demonstrations, sit-ins and other events where the police come into direct physical contact with citizens. There is reason to believe that, in some cases, police abuse their legal powers by barring media representatives from certain public areas without legitimate cause.

Crown prosecutors in the Montreal area increasingly are requiring that news reporters and photographers testify and produce whatever documentary evidence they have gathered in connection with particular events. The adoption of this tactic as a regular practice poses almost as serious a threat to the freedom of the press as does direct censorship. If they are forced to turn prosecution witnesses through the use of the subpoena and the threat of a contempt of court citation on a regular basis, they will come to be regarded as little more than police spies and will be treated as such by demonstrators.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. Is there anything you wish to comment on specifically before we turn to the senators for questioning or is there anything that any of your colleagues would like to add before we go on? I think, we are probably ready for questions from the senators. I believe, Senator McElman, you are going to begin this evening.

Senator McElman: You speak of protection of sources. Does this extend in your opinion to cases like criminal courts or criminal actions?

Mr. Waters: My impression is that the majority of the journalists felt that it should extend upwards in a criminal or civil action to such things as involving national security. I would say I believe most of the members feel this is true that there should be protection in criminal cases, yes.

Senator McElman: You seem to make that conditional when you suggest that provision should be provided for in law for a journalist who wished to guard his sources. Is there to be a choice on the part of the news person?

Mr. Waters: Well, I think the assumption is that journalists who wanted that privilege could have it. Obviously those who wanted to testify could not be punished if they felt they should testify.

Senator McElman: Why should they have that privilege any more than an ordinary citizen?

Mr. Waters: Of protection?

Senator McElman: Yes.

Mr. Waters: I think the argument goes something like this. Unless they have it, journalists I think generally feel that to get information there is resistance. Nobody really wants, or very few people want, to give the kind of information journalists want from them to the press. So there is a fair amount of resistance that they have to work against. Anything that limits their ability to get it and gives the public reason to distrust them makes freedom of the press that much more difficult because they feel a responsibility to be able to get that information in order to be able to give it to the public.

There may be quite a few areas—well, demonstrations is one. We have demonstrations in Montreal and we send reporters out to it and they want to be able to report just what the demonstration is really like. Reporters are now coming back saying that they are being harassed, not only by authority but by demonstrators who, the minute they see he is a reporter, are afraid that their name is going to be taken or afraid of the photographer, so they smash their cameras and things of this sort. So it is becoming very difficult to report demonstrations and get in on it enough to be able to see what is going on and to report it accurately.

Mr. Dick MacDonald (Reporter, the Montreal Star): I think it goes a little beyond that. I think it goes beyond that—certainly into the political stream of reporting to choose any given story which might be sensitive—particularly to politicians speaking to the journalists. If the journalist believes that the information he is receiving is valid enough that the politician or the civil servant or whatever prefers to keep it confidential, then the journalist exercises his judgment. A vague case in point.

The province of New Brunswick—if I were doing a story on the dam development on the St. John River and a number of people were quite concerned about either the feasibility of the dam project itself and then as the project developed and people became concerned about the possibility of pollution and the whole aspect of it, they perhaps would not give me the information I would need to do my job adequately unless they were assured that their names were going to be held in confidence. I do the story and then if I am called into court or before a legislative committee in Fredericton, then I think I should have the privilege or the right because of that information which I choose to think or my medium chooses to think is important to the people of New Brunswick—I think I should be able to protect those sources.

Senator McElman: You are missing the point. I refer to criminal court cases. It would be unlikely through the circumstances you cite that you would end up in a criminal court. These are the normal protection of sources that go with any profession.

Mr. Dick MacDonald: It is all a matter of protection of sources though.

Senator McElman: No. We are talking about criminal actions or public interest stories where the total public interest is involved.

Mr. Waters: Well, what do you do in a case—the problem in a criminal case of course is you are forced to make a decision about revealing your evidence before the person is convicted. Till then he is still innocent and this is where the critical problem comes in. We have had cases in Montreal where say Michel Chartrand was arrested for sedition and the case was thrown out of court. At what point do you decide that this charge of sedition against him is so serious that you are forced to reveal something and then if you reveal it then the case is dropped against him or thrown out of court—so, it is very difficult I think in a criminal case to make a decision until the verdict is rendered.

Senator McElman: Again, you miss my point. You say at what point do you decide. That is not the point at all. It is at what point does the court decide—that is the people.

Mr. Waters: That is right.

Senator McElman: Let me suggest to you that yours is not the central core of our society. I suggest to you that our political system is, and the politician who is representative of and answerable to the people—more directly—much more directly than you are. He has no such protection as you suggest that your operation should have. Where do you draw the line?

Mr. Waters: Well, you know if politicians want to decide to pass that protection for themselves—we are simply recommending to politicians that they recognize that freedom of the Press now has a role in society important enough that they pass the legislation protecting us. This is obviously what most of the members felt. They are not taking the decision in their own hands. There are some that do go to jail for it but these are quite few. In general when they are forced to testify they do testify. They do it under a compulsion which bothers them and they do not like it. They are asking that this area be given serious consideration by politicians and perhaps if they were politicians they would have combined and suggested that the politicians pass it for themselves as well. I don't know.

The Chairman: On this point, Senator Prowse?

Senator Prowse: Yes, Mr. Chairman, very much on this point.

As you are aware the only time a politician has a privilege is when he is actually in the House and the Committee and it is very seldom that there have been complaints that has been abused there but that is the only place you have it. The result is that from time to time people will come to us and give us information and say, "Now you can use this" and then you have to make a pretty serious decision as to whether you are being misled or not. Now, if you had this protection I think you would find that you would be constantly embarrassed by people who are trying to use your protection for their own purposes. So a situation could easily arise where somebody comes along and gives this to you what he has said—he says, "don't use my name." Now you are bound by the lawyer is bound and then because it looks like a good story, it looks sound, and sounds reasonable, you go ahead and print it. You may be doing a great disservice to somebody. Now, there is one balance. The second thing is that a number of very sensitive professions have operated under British law—and I do not say that in any racist sense—but under the system of our law without any protection at all. For example, there is no protection at the common law in England or in Canada—although it has been granted in Ireland by the Irish courts—but not in England or Canada is there any protection for a priest or a minister even concerning what happens in the confessional. None of them would think of breaking the confidence. They have that protection today because nobody is going to call them as a witness because they know that they are not going to answer. This is something they have earned by their own adherence to their principles and not by asking somebody to give it to them. The medical profession, including psychiatrists, have no protection except for the fact—there are some American decisions—there are no Canadian decisions—except for the fact they have consistently refused to give the information so everybody knows there is no sense calling them as a witness.

Now, this system has worked reasonably well and it does not stop people from making confessions to the priest...

The Chairman: Well, Senator Prowse this comes dangerously close, I think to making a speech.

Senator Prowse: Well, the question is have you given consideration to all of the different aspects. Don't you think that perhaps the way to get your protection is to what the heck is seven days in jail for a journalist except an opportunity for the journalist to write a story about the jail?

Mr. Blaker: Senator Prowse, I think it is the opinion of the membership of the Association at large, that since we operate partly in the function of public interest, anything which might assist the journalist in delivering to the public as much information as possible, should be considered as an added advantage not to the journalist but to the public. As you pointed out with the medical profession, perhaps a similar thing has not been placed in the body of the law nor has it been with the lawyers with the privileges imbedded in the law. The thinking I believe amongst journalists is that if this privilege were extended to them they would be better able to serve not their interest but the interest of the public.

Senator Prowse: I am sure of that but I merely brought up the point I did because I think you are concerned about the present problems and that you fail to take the overall picture. And may I say this to you: I earned my living for eight years as a newspaperman and before I came to the Senate I had 14 years in the legislature of Alberta so I know something about the responsibility of being given information and having to protect the sources.

The Chairman: Well, I think if there are no further comments on this we can go back to—Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: Well, I take it then that the inference is you would suggest that you live within the law as it exists but you would like to see the law amended?

Mr. Waters: Well, I would like to see a professional who went to jail and earned his respect through his own strength of character. I don't think it is there right now in journalism. I don't think it is there to a sufficient extent. This is my own feeling and quite a few members have expressed this kind of attitude. Certainly in terms of our members I think the majority of them feel that they would like to have protection in law.

Senator McElman: I know that you appear to favour as a majority, a press council. But considering the geographic aspect of our nation and its diversity, would you also favour regional or provincial segments of it and a local segment and what would you suggest the make-up might be?

Miss Joan Fraser (Reporter, Financial Times of Canada): If I might just answer that question. I tabulated the answers to the questionnaires and what most people said is that we should study the idea of a press council for just these reasons. They didn't have the answers to those questions.

Senator McElman: There were no answers at all?

Miss Fraser: Not really. I think one person said we should have provincial press council and one or two people said we should have a national press council. They didn't really know enough about it and they wanted people to do—you people, senators—to study it. They weren't prepared to say flatly one way or the other.

Senator McElman: Paragraph 3 of your brief—you say that the federation sought your participation and it had to be as a group and not as individuals. Would you care to broaden on that?

Mr. Waters: Yes. The French journalists in the province have organized into unions and different types of associations so when they decided to try and form a federation for all they simply decided to form a federation of groups rather than of individuals. When they thought about us and wondered how we could join them there was no group to whom they could appeal beyond the Press Club, which had certain disadvantages because it was restricted only to men, for example. So they asked us if we would consider forming a group. It was really their request that started the formation of this association.

Senator McElman: You now have your group and you go on to say that for a number of reasons, including a financial one . . . What would be the other reasons?

Mr. Waters: Some reservations—we were mandated by the founding group to investigate joining the federation. We found two things right at the beginning; one was that we had a very difficult time building up membership. There was a resistance within the profession to join an association at all. Secondly, just the limited membership fee that we charged seemed to be a major obstacle and as soon as we began discussing and having talks with the federation, we began to realize that there might be merit to our staying as a group separate from them. We wanted to participate in all these deliberations but things like the problem of education for journalists in the province—this was something that we could probably best handle if we remained as an organization rather than just being consumed into the federation.

The financial one was that they were quite ambitious. They wanted a permanent secretariat in Quebec city and it was going to mean probably a charge of $40 per member—per individual member and we didn't think the English journalists had enough interest in the whole idea—neither the association or the federation—to pay that kind of money. The French journalists have a check-off system and we haven't yet approached publishers and asked if we could have a check-off system for our members. If we wanted to increase the membership it would be obviously much easier to persuade somebody to spend 80¢ a week than it is to sign a cheque for $40. We did meet with them and Joan went up on our behalf to Quebec City but they were considering their brief to the national assembly committee and we had certain reservations about that. They seemed to want some kind of a regulating body with very strong powers. The instincts I think of most English journalists was to perhaps want some kind of a press council or some kind of body but with largely moral persuasion power, power to investigate, and power to examine and to expose but not necessarily by power to regulate or interfere.

So there are certain distinctions of that kind that gave us some pause; we thought we wanted to get our membership up large enough to have a full meeting which would fully explore these areas before we decided to join.

Senator McElman: Within the context of unrest in the province of Quebec, and indeed within the nation, do you see any particular dangers to the freedom of the press, as you understand it, posed by government legislation at any level or from any other sources anything that is particular to your group that is not to the rest of the media in the rest of the nation?

Mr. Waters: I would say so. I would say most members feel this. They feel increasingly because of the influence of the mass media people rely to a greater degree—that as a profession we are going to become possibly more respected but also more hated. The feelings are going to be stronger, and the attempts to interfere are going to become more organized, more pronounced; and in this sort of thing there are a lot of people amongst the general public who probably feel that there are things we should not give too much exposure to because of the effects that they have. I am sure that there are quite a few people in government as in any other area who feel that this is to the detriment of a good society. Therefore, we would have to be somehow—probably not controlled—but certainly indirectly controlled. I think most of the journalists—at least in the Association—would feel that is a very serious threat.

Senator McElman: Within your respective organizations, do you feel any pressure from the top managerial level as to what you should or should not report upon in particular?

Mr. Waters: That problem is a very very difficult one to answer. It is difficult to answer for the reason that journalism is structured in today's society and the communications between various levels is possibly not the best thing in the world. Certainly the feeling that I get from the younger members in the profession who turned up at our meeting is that they are uneasy about the role they feel that higher management is playing. I don't think there is any consensus about this sort of thing, but higher management plays a role and there is not great communication or explanation between the various levels so they are uneasy about this. So those that turned out to the meeting expressed that kind of consensus.

Senator McElman: The National Assembly has been holding an inquiry of sorts into the freedom of the press. Did you present a brief there as a group?

Mr. Waters: No. We participated. It was quite early in our formation and we accepted the invitation of the French journalists to participate in their deliberations so that our contribution was largely through their brief. Joan was up there and I believe we did influence their brief in some way.

Miss Fraser: We did and I think it was partly because of the fact that we did not decide to submit our own brief. We disagreed with the recommendations for a Conseil de la Presse of some sort but there were a great many other things in the brief that we did approve of. We agreed largely with their observation on the freedom of the press. We liked the fact that they said that if you were worried about the ownership, you might try the Combines Investigation Act before you go off in all directions. Several other points that we made at that meeting were incorporated in their brief so that the need did not seem to be very great.

Senator McElman: In the face of the emerging Desmarais Chain in the province of Quebec, as I understand it—please correct me if I am wrong—there has been a good bit of representation from chains and multi-media ownership that such per se are not necessarily a bad thing. Some are almost at the point of recommendation that they are almost a good thing. Did your group subscribe to that, did you have a different view?

Mr. Waters: I think that the French journalists are dead set against it.

Miss Fraser: They were very alarmed about this trend and our position basically was...

Senator McElman: Excuse me, I wasn't only referring to them.

Miss Fraser: Well, in the Quebec case of the Desmarais group we agreed that there was cause for alarm—not that that was a malicious group necessarily, but that it was the kind of situation which could develop into something rather dangerous. Elsewhere our members seem to feel that they have no objection to this sort of ownership as long as it is not abused. They felt that somebody should be able to hold sort of a watching brief to see that it is not abused.

The Chairman: Who would that be?

Miss Fraser: They have not specified. I would hazard a guess, somebody like a national press council.

Mr. Waters: On the one hand somebody like a national press council and obviously for some of the younger journalists, something like they are doing at Stern where they have the ability to be their own watch dogs.

Senator McElman: Page 4, section 18 on the threat to freedom. You say that two-thirds of the respondents believe that the news to some extent is affected by commercial interest. Could you give any examples of that? I don't mean name names but could you be more specific?

Senator Prowse: Do not reveal your sources.

Mr. Waters: Perhaps I could expand on the philosophical aspect of that. I think the assumption is that our society is structured economically and these are hence most people's serious concern. Two things come into that. I suppose that one is that the higher one gets in society, whether it is within the media or elsewhere, the more one is sensitive to that area and the more one feels that price decisions will affect the economic considerations and commercial considerations. I suspect that most reporters and journalists, because they are at the bottom of not only the media pyramid but the bottom of the economic pyramid, do not share those feelings at all. There are probably cases where they feel that their judgment is not being respected and that the public interest is closer allied to their judgment than to the judgment that all other people are making in society.

Senator McElman: This would incline then towards the view that the principal interest of top management is more economic. Would you not suggest that this in itself, if there is validity in it, would make ultra-dangerous the protection in the law of sources?

Mr. Waters: I am not sure that I understand the implication you are suggesting there.

Senator McElman: Well, I am suggesting very simply that commercial interests can affect what appears in the newspapers. Those who are involved in the publishing of newspapers as well as reporting have a special protection or privilege that is not accorded to any other element of our society and their interests are principally commercial. I repeat, with those pressures you suggest are apparently in evidence, since they would not have been mentioned, those pressures could extend to protection of sources which are not in the public interest or in the interest of society, which we enjoy. In other words I am saying you have it two ways.

Mr. Waters: Well, I think that most of those who expressed a desire for protection were thinking of protection at their level. They would probably feel very definitely that protection should be given them because the majority of society probably would not feel and it would be in conflict with the decision of an awful lot of people...

Senator McElman: Where do you stop the protection. It is with the reporter?

Miss Fraser: May I add something to that? I have a feeling that given the situation that you just outlined, perhaps professional secrecy could work the other way. Take the case where you have a company which has a steady large advertising budget with a given daily newspaper and there is something that some reporter finds out which that company would rather have not known. I think perhaps the paper might go ahead and publish it more readily if it knew in law it was protected. I might be less apt to lose the advertising from the company if the company knew that everybody was apt to come under this sort of a situation. I am not sure but I have a feeling that this could work both ways. It would balance out.

Senator Hays: How long would the reporter last in his job?

Miss Fraser: I suspect that if the publisher knew that he was protected he would have his job for some time. The people who said that they felt commercial interests affect the presentation of the news did not say that they felt publishers are just money makers. It was more a helpless "Oh gosh, there it is." This sort of thing. The paper has to make money, to keep printing, therefore one way or the other on some newspapers at any rate you are going to be conscious of this problem.

The Chairman: We talked earlier as to whether you were a group or individuals; may I ask you four people as individuals whether you think the news is to some extent affected by commercial interests? I put that question to each one of you.

Miss Joan Fraser: In some cases, yes. More on some papers than on others. I don't know enough about radio and television to be able to judge.

Mr. Blaker: I think I would have to say the same thing as Miss Fraser. I think there are definitely instances. We have had several indications of them in private conversations amongst our members where amongst those in radio and television there are instances where commercial interests have definitely affected the distribution of news. Whether those are exceptional or whether they conform to an average I couldn't say.

The Chairman: Mr. MacDonald?

Mr. MacDonald: Yes, I think I would certainly have to agree. In the experience I have had, I think more often pressures from commercial interests have been applied by implication rather than directly and this stems certainly from what Mr. Waters has said about the economic hierarchy and economic structure of the media.

Mr. Waters: Yes, I do, and I resent it very strongly.

Mr. Blaker: Senators, if I might add a point. The expression commercial pressures can be taken in a second sense. There is the commercial pressure for example of an advertiser who applies whatever pressure he is able to apply to a particular medium. Usually, it is at the management level in order to make changes as he would like to see them and in some cases he does appear to be successful. There is a second kind of commercial pressure which applies particularly to the journalists themselves in which I think there is an element both of commercial pressures and of the freedom of the press which you were referring to earlier. That is a sort of tenuous, inexact, uncertain form of understanding that goes with the journalist in his years throughout the media that there are certain subjects which perhaps are better left alone, not particularly because they might result in the immediate firing but because they result in the necessity as it was put earlier of wearing a furrow in the carpet to the manager's office. You do not get paid for doing that. You have a job to do and it is not a particularly satisfying experience to be going back and forth and answering all sorts of questions. Again, there is a type of commercial pressure which results in the individual wanting to get ahead and of course in many substantial organizations of any decent size vertical movement does to some degree depend on playing the game. I am perhaps bringing out the commercial pressures brought not only from outside but also from inside.

Senator Everett: Unless you have some sort of a specific case to refer to it seems to me that the general charge that is being made may not be a very valid one. I just wonder if there are specific cases?

Mr. Blaker: I think, Senator, we have taken an agreement amongst ourselves for the consideration of those members who were so courteous as to answer the questions. Unless any of the other individuals here wish to answer with their own experience—but we have undertaken to leave their questionnaires and any subsequent discussion on this matter as being confidential.

Miss Fraser: I can give you one example.

Senator Everett: I would like that.

Miss Fraser: This is from my own experience but a slightly different thing. This was not, incidentally, on my present paper. It involved cases where an advertiser prevented a story from appearing but in one particular case I was sent out to do a story about a small and really by any standard an unimportant company. There was not that much space in the paper that day but that particular little company took up a quarter of a page because it had just signed an agreement to run ads for six months or something like that. That is biased news, because something else that was more important could probably have gone in that space. I feel that we were giving that company important publicity.

Mr. Waters: If I may sort of elaborate on a point here.

Senator Everett: Did it involve any particular area like travel where the papers generally do get space or are you talking about general news?

Miss Fraser: I was talking about general news.

Senator Everett: It was not a feature page?

Miss Fraser: Well, the rumour has it for what it is worth that the travel pages and the women's pages are the areas which are most vulnerable.

Senator Everett: Well, I think that is probably true.

The Chairman: But this was a news story?

Miss Fraser: Yes, this was a news story. It was a news story and was presented as such with a photograph and the whole bit.

Senator Smith: Mr. Chairman, on this very point I would like to have someone talk a little bit about whether or not this kind of pressure that we all have in our mind is of rather a subtle nature. It is there and we all know it is there, under certain circumstances; I was told that by someone in your profession who was following one of our meetings and said, don't let these publishers tell you that there is no commercial pressure, there is, and he described it in subtle language. He said, "You know what the publisher's view on things are and you know what he wants you to do. It is there." And he said most of us have to yield because we are commercially oriented ourselves, we want our jobs, we want to move, just to follow this point, vertical movement. They are interested in vertical movement as well and it is there just as plain as the nose on your face. Now, is it subtle or does it extend further?

The Chairman: Who would like to answer that? Mr. Waters?

Mr. MacDonald: Well, I would like to make a comment on that, and I am not speaking again of my present employer the Montreal Star. This goes back two or three years and it happens today in fact, I know it does. As Mr. Blaker was saying it is a kind of pressure which comes with understanding the situation; you become familiar with people with a vested interest in their particular community. I think more often than not it may be the middle management doing things which creates this kind of pressure because I found with this particular paper I worked for a couple of years ago that the middle management was pre-judging what the publisher might want or pre-supposing what might affect the newspaper. One specific example, and it was possibly one of the first instances where I began to get involved in what we might call today interpretive news. I suggested to the managing editor that I do a two or three part series on housing in our city and he said fine. I spent a couple of weeks gathering data, and going to tenants and residents as well as city authorities, and I produced what I thought was a fairly valid and critical two or three part series. By the time it appeared after two or three discussions with the managing editor it had been toned down considerably. In fact, it was a bland piece of news. It was a bland piece of writing because it was sensitive, because it might have been offending potential or existing advertisers or as the old saying goes, I was just rocking the boat in that particular community. It was a city of 60,000.

Senator McElman: Mr. Chairman, we are all familiar with this type of pressure and it does not apply only to the news-gathering business. It applies to any type of commercial operation. There is nothing new or different about that kind of thing any longer. It is at is—there is a reference here to pressures affected by commercial interest and what I wanted to find out, is there any broad-axe type of thing going on today that we all know did take place in the past years?

Mr. Waters: No, this is becoming much less and I don't think journalists are worried about that kind of thing any longer. It is much more an indirect thing now, where certain things will get a microscopic examination before they appear in the paper. Conditions are imposed in certain kinds of areas which make it very difficult. A journalist with very inadequate resources, for example, working in a judgment area there are a lot more grounds for looking very carefully into something where commercial interests are involved, whereas if you are writing on pollution in Latin America you know, it is carte blanche. It is a reasonable sensitivity and I don't think that many of us feel that the motive of the higher management is questionable there. They are responding to an awareness of society around them and an awareness of how that society is structured and they have to simply be more sure of themselves and more sensitive in certain areas.

Mr. Macdonald: I think you will find it applies in larger cities.

Senator McElman: In other words, if these things happen to be your biggest account—if Eaton's happen to be your biggest account and something happens in Eaton's store, the editor does not say to the newsmen, "Now, take it easy here." The newsman's mind says to him—take it easy—is that correct?

Mr. Waters: We say it is moulding the personality of journalists and it may be—this is something we do not know, and this is why so much information is needed. Are the journalists at the bottom of this media pyramid moulding themselves out of some misconceptions? To what extent is it valid, to what extent are they sensitive or aware of their own profession; these are very difficult things for us to decide and we have never really discussed them except in bars or else in the Press Club. It is based mostly on rumours and exchange of anecdotes. This is the situation.

The Chairman: I believe Mr. Blaker wanted to add something at this point.

Mr. Blaker: If I might in reply to Senator McElman's question. I was left with the impression, sir, that you indicated that direct commercial pressure exists more in the mind of the journalist than it does in actual fact. I hope that wasn't the impression that we have left with you. It exists as a fact. An outright, an overt fact which has become learned by journalists in the profession over a period of time. Simply because the average journalist does not go up four days a week fighting his managing editor, or as the case might be my own station manager, does not mean that recognition has been derived out of nowhere. It is derived from the known fact amongst the working profession that this pressure can exist.

Senator McElman: Well, does this have a very real effect on the day to day operations of the journalist?

Mr. Blaker: I submit a personal opinion only and I would say that in many cases it does.

Senator McElman: What corrective action would you suggest to overcome it?

Mr. Blaker: Well, the only one I have ever been able to think of, and we have had some discussion on this and again I would like to hear the other members of our executive comment on this, I don't want to be left alone away out in the field—the only type of corrective action I have ever thought of would be the growing realization on the part of the employers, as is done with the case of teachers for example, a certain degree of security is granted to those engaged and those hired. They are put on a trial period for two weeks or two months or six months or whatever it is, then put on an annual contract with a sufficient notice period. A man who can be dropped on two weeks' notice or one month's notice and who is married with three children tends to think a little bit unless he is one of the fortunate few.

Senator Prowse: Particularly when he is being paid at a level where he is waiting for pay day?

Mr. Blaker: Certainly.

Senator McElman: Would a system of shareholding and involvement over a period of time work towards a solution, do you think?

Mr. Blaker: Well, I would almost say or tend to say that it would aggravate the problem. I think certainly in some cases. I think there would be necessarily an interest in the success of the operation of the particular medium. I do really seriously believe that most people would not permit that to interfere with their reporting. I doubt if it would help in any matter.

Senator McElman: The reason I ask is because you mentioned the rather prominent Paris publication which moves in this direction. You do not advocate that?

Mr. Blaker: That structure is indicative of employee participation in a decision-making process. I am not sure it should be in the financial process as well.

Mr. Waters: I think that I would like to point out here that you are probably getting more and more of the four of us up here and I would like to point out that we feel a problem here because I don't think there is a consensus amongst our journalists in Montreal on this score at all. Certainly the younger journalists show a great sympathy for the changes which are taking place say at Stern or l'Express, but we in our recruitment have found that an awful lot of people say to us "We know what is going to happen, you are going to create a monster and there may be problems with the existing system but what you are doing is going to make it worse."

There are a lot of reservations that the cure may be worse than the illness. Certainly the younger, I think the younger and I don't only mean that in terms of years, but younger in terms of interest in change, favour seriously the investigation of these kinds of possibilities that are taking place in Europe as probably the way they would most like to—the area they would most like to see investigated first before others are tried but there isn't a consensus. This is why we have been quite careful in our brief because we want to represent a consensus and we want to work with a consensus in Montreal so we don't want your committee to misjudge that thing. I think ours would represent a pretty progressive view in terms of the consensus.

Senator McElman: I would have two other questions at this time but I believe Senator Everett has a question.

The Chairman: I believe Senator Smith has a supplementary question.

Senator Smith: No.

The Chairman: Well, then, Senator McElman would you finish your questioning please.

Senator McElman: Mr. Waters would you feel that it is essential that every working newsman in La Belle Province should be bilingual irrespective of the working language of the people he is with?

Mr. Waters: I think a good journalist in Quebec knows he has to be bilingual and if they are any good they are rapidly becoming that way.

Senator McElman: There is a tendency there?

Mr. Waters: Yes.

Senator McElman: At page 11, section 51, the first of your few simple recommendations, you say you could like an opportunity to study the information we uncover—that is the committee uncovers—and return to report what recommendations we would like to make based on your recommendations. Based on the information we have uncovered thus far through our tremendous research staff, which runs about that deep from the floor...

The Chairman: Senator McElman, I have been very carefully guarding that information from the press and here you are giving all these secrets away.

Senator McElman: That was just in volume, Mr. Chairman. Would you care to give an estimate, since we are having 150 witnesses minimum at 90 sessions, would you care to give an estimate as to how many years Senator Davey's committee would sit on that basis?

Mr. Waters: Well, what we are trying to get at is within a very short period of time you are going to be much more informed than we are. In trying to probe our own members, what we have found is that they haven't even thought about the possibilities of the information which will be uncovered and they have never thought to check into the things that are going to happen in their profession. Their opinions and their information is very scant and malformed at the moment.

Since we feel that we are most interested in us we would like a chance, one, to be more specific later on and to do more study ourselves, but two, we also feel there is a danger that your investigations will not get at the type of information that we want in the sense—I don't know how many associations of journalists exist in Canada. There are unions occasionally in Toronto but as far as I know there is no association which has professional interests—I use that term guardedly but I simply feel it has an important role to play in society, that it must investigate and think about its own role and discuss it extensively which is a totally new thing. In that context we are a little uneasy and you people are going to move much faster than we are ready to.

The Chairman: There is a like association to yours in Toronto. They are coming to the committee....

Mr. Borden Spears: In English Canada.

The Chairman: In English Canada, I am sorry. But are they mostly in Toronto?

Mr. Borden Spears: No. They are centred in Toronto.

The Chairman: I believe they are coming in January or February. If I could just make one comment on this it would be to say that I concur with Senator McElman's point but at the same time I have taken the position consistently, and will continue to take it, that when our study is completed, while I don't think we can comply with this request we certainly do intend to publish all of the research material which we can possibly publish—that is anything which is not too confidential which obviously we would not publish, but anything at all apart from that which we can publish we hope to make available and I think some of it will be useful certainly.

Senator Hays: I would like to make two quick observations if I may.

The Chairman: Are they questions?

Senator Hays: Yes.

The Chairman: You are not going to favour us with a speech, Senator.

Senator Hays: No, they are questions we have been working on quite long and I have never known a reporter or a politician to keep a secret, so I think that kind of takes care of that. The other thing is on page 2, paragraph 10, you speak of a code of ethics. This code of ethics—is this code going to be within your own association and have you started to work on this?

Mr. Waters: We have started simply I suppose by realizing that a code of ethics is probably impossible. There may be certain broad guide lines that we may work out but we are very leery of any kind of chatty version of the Ten Commandments because we do not think it would have any meaning. What we want to do is have the kind of discussion and constant self-analysis about the ethical issues in the profession so that our members would become much more sensitive to the problem, because it is easy to distinguish between a journalist who is trying to be honest and one who is clearly dishonest. It is not even worth discussing because it is such an obvious phenomenon.

What we are concerned about is where the honest man is failing and is puzzled about why he is failing and how he might do something to guard against it or to prove his ethical qualities. We realized in our initial discussions that this is going to be a very complex area to investigate. I think we will publish the information we find out in the discussions we have but it will be a long while.

Senator Hays: Could you give me an example of this code of ethics—something that would be taboo? I just don't know what you mean by a code of ethics. I am beginning to become very confused about freedom of the press because everybody has a different version.

Mr. Macdonald: Well, possibly we are getting hung up on the label. We are not actually talking in terms of a code of ethics. We are simply talking ethical matters pertaining to the profession of journalism.

Mr. Waters: At what point does a journalist who is working on a story whose implications are harmful to people, at what point does he decide that the story is ready for publication? Or at what point when a city editor is hungry for copy, quite reasonably, does he sort of say to him "Hurry up and finish that up, you are being overly sensitive, you are behaving like an academic". It is this grey area where good journalism exists or unethical journalism exists and I think they need a lot of discussion in detail of examples and instances where people can agonize over them.

Senator Prowse: Not like the restaurateur's code?

Mr. Waters: No.

Senator Hays: Do you have in the newspapers that any of you work for a code of ethics that is given to a reporter?

Mr. Waters: Not to my knowledge.

Senator Hays: No newspaper that you work for has a code of ethics?

Mr. Waters: In fact very rarely is there an attempt to instill any kind of ethical behaviour into individuals.

Miss Fraser: I think one of the problems you run into here is that people who have codes of ethics are usually people who are considered to be professionals. Here you enter into the whole business of what is the status of a working journalist—is he or is he not a professional. There are a good number of people who feel that he is a professional and is recognized as such. Myself, I do not because that means that somebody outside has to recognize who is and who is not a journalist and I do not particularly want that kind of distinction being made. I think it is very dangerous because it can be too exclusive and you are going to run into trouble operating a formal code that applies to the entire profession if you want to call it that...

Senator Hays: Well, let us take for instance the reporting of a suicide, this sort of thing. Would this come within a code of ethics?

Mr. Waters: I think what is happening, and I have mentioned the fact that times are changing. They are, and there was a time when this hierarchical structure in the media meant that decisions of this kind could be taken higher up and they were the keepers of the ethics of journalism. What is happening with the massive amounts of information that are coming out now and the massive speed with which things are happening, is that power is really becoming decentralized. A publisher today probably doesn't have time to read his own paper so that his influence on it becomes kind of spotty, kind of general guideline type of thing only, but the real decisions are being made much lower down and the ethical development let us say that a publisher might have had—this has never been done at the lower levels—it is necessary because that is where the real power lies.

Senator Hays: You feel then that there should be some code of ethics?

Mr. Waters: Well, I think there should be certain guidelines about certain kinds of thing, yes.

Senator Prose: An agreed understanding at any rate?

Mr. Water: Yes.

Mr. Blaker: If I might add, Senator Hays, to my surprise I ran across something along that line for the Television News Directors Association and there apparently exists a code of broadcasting news ethics, adopted January 2nd, 1966.

The Chairman: Could you file a copy of that with us? We would be most interested in it.

Mr. Blaker: Certainly.

Senator Hays: There is one other question that I would like to ask. For instance, you saw the story about Marshall McLuhan's son and this was the headline. "Marshall McLuhan's son is charged with pushing dope. He is 16 years old." Down goes the story. Would you think this is ethical reporting?

The Chairman: Who are you directing the question to, Senator Hays?

Senator Hays: To anyone.

The Chairman: Well, let us ask Mr. MacDonald.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, are we speaking as an association or as individuals?

The Chairman: I think as an individual.

Mr. MacDonald: I would prefer to have the association answer this one.

The Chairman: Well, why don't you answer that, Mr. Waters?

Mr. Waters: Well, I think when they refer to the razzle dazzle, I think this is what they are objecting to—the issue of dope in a society and the kind of people that are involved in it are the kind of things that reporters want to write about. They are less interested in writing about individual cases which are really just for entertainment purposes because of the big names involved and they feel somehow or other they are being shoddy when they are doing this.

Senator Hays: You say they feel shoddy?

Mr. Waters: Yes, I think so. The ones that came to the meeting expressed this feeling and do feel that way, yes.

Senator Hays: So you think that this should be in a code of ethics? Tommy Douglas's daughter is another example.

Mr. Waters: It is a question of the play that is given I think. It is one thing that the information be conveyed and it is another thing as to how it is played.

Mr. Blaker: The argument goes, Senator, that people who are in the public eye have a certain responsibility to the public. Their opinions and their impressions bear a certain weight in the public and their family lives can indicate whether or not one should give as much weight to their opinions as would otherwise be indicated.

In other words, a man who has a son or a daughter in trouble of one kind or another might be judged by some people accordingly. I don't think any one of us would agree with that because I think every one of us here would just as soon never see such a story.

Mr. Waters: There is a very literate rationale that you could justify it as well. We have discussed this for example with the Sharon Tate case. We are aware also that we perform not only the function of giving information but we are performing some sort of dramatic function to people and they have a certain desire to work out certain feelings by reading certain kind of things and in that sense you know it is a sort of certain experience they are going through. How public figures suffer you know—Sharon Tate is their King Lear so that there is a grey area there as to whether or not you are simply exploiting a thing or whether you are performing a function which is perhaps valid.

The Chairman: Well, I would like to ask you a question; because you referred to section 34, I would just like to ask you one question with relation to Section 33.

The article in Fortune Magazine, as I recall, and I read the article—I hope I am right—it made the point that the newspapers are not reporting the changes which are taking place and it used as examples, I believe the computerized society and I think it talked about the Negro revolution. These were the two stories which unfolded which the newspapers in the United States missed. I really have two questions. I think it also indicated a third story which the newspapers were not covering. I am wondering if you think that that is true in Canada—that is question A—and question B is what are the comparable unfolding developments today? Perhaps I am transgressing, passing you a question in your capacity as associate editor of the Montreal Star, and it might be a very unfair question. If it is please say so. What are the comparable areas in Canada today that are not being reported on perhaps that should be? Let us take the first question. Do you think the press does an adequate job of reporting?

Mr. Waters: No. At the seminar we held a number of people made the suggestion that it should be a regular thing in the newspaper, possibly every week or every day, to apologize for where we fail. To make the reader realize that the impression that the media was giving that it was all-knowing and all-wise—that we accepted that this was false and there was a great need to do corrective reporting and to say on that one, we missed it and we boomed it and here is now our revised version. We would do it as often as we thought it necessary so the public would be aware of what it is we are trying to do. That was one area that came up. As to the trends in Canada, we are not reporting, the problems that by and large if there is nothing reported it is because we don't know. We are aware that we do not have the resources or the time. The conditions under which the media work really preclude digging or becoming knowledgeable enough and sensitive enough to be able to detect these trends. In that sense we are victims of our own structure.

The Chairman: You haven't had time to be effective?

Mr. Waters: Not enough.

Miss Fraser: I think there is a tendency to un with the herd, to take the easy way out very often. One of the areas where I suppose that English language media in Canada have failed most badly in is interpreting Quebec to the rest of Canada. You know that is a cliché but we have not done it properly. It is evident every time I meet somebody from Manitoba or Newfoundland or wherever that he just has not been getting the message, the various things that have been happening in Quebec, and I think one reason for this is that many of us know there are certain things or certain pegs that you can hang news on and..

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Claude Ryan was here the other night and we spoke about this and he specifically exempted the Toronto newspapers from that charge. Would you agree with that exemption?

Miss Fraser: Up to a point. I think they are doing a better job than we are.

The Chairman: Why do you think the papers for example in western Canada are not doing a very good job in this area?

Miss Fraser: Well, for one reason I am not aware of any that have very many correspondents in this part of the country or in Quebec. At least, that I know of.

The Chairman: It is the absence of correspondents?

Miss Fraser: This is one of the reasons.

The Chairman: Well, why don't they have correspondents in Quebec?

Miss Fraser: Because they presumably are not setting their priorities the way I would like them to.

Mr. Waters: This is the problem, because if you are going to do this kind of reporting it stands to reason that you have to be advanced, and spend the money in advance on what your public is going to want. You are committing yourself to a judgment and you don't send staff into an area until the public is demanding that knowledge. You don't send them in until they are demanding it and the chances are you have missed it already in a sense.

Mr. Macdonald: The tragedy is that hindsight is one of the characteristics of our business.

Senator Prowse: Not yours alone.

Mr. Macdonald: I think supposedly we are involved in a very vital role in contemporary society and hindsight is something we can do without. There are so many examples—a national commission on violence in the United States has continuously pointed out that the media at large, not only the printed word but the electronics journalists as well are simply not anticipating, not projecting. For too long we have been after the fact; that is no longer sufficient.

Senator Prowse: May I ask a question?

The Chairman: If it is a supplementary question, Senator Prowse.

Senator Prowse: The supplementary question is this. Western Canadian papers have just been abused here and I would like to know how many eastern papers have people out in western Canada trying to interpret to Quebec and let them understand why western Canada feels the way it does?

Miss Fraser: Not enough.

Senator Prowse: Any?

Mr. Blaker: It works both ways, of course.

Mr. Macdonald: I think the state of our business in this country is appalling, the Montreal Star excepted.

Senator Prowse: May I suggest that maybe at least 90 per cent of the imagined problem results from the fact that nobody else is interpreting the other parts of Canada to Quebec and nobody in interpreting Quebec to the other parts of Canada.

Mr. Blaker: And the Maritimes to the rest of Canada.

Senator Prowse: Yes, we are all guilty.

Mr. Blaker: I think we might have a significant problem outside of Quebec to Canada rather than Canada to Quebec or the other provinces.

The Chairman: I am becoming increasingly discouraged by the moment but before I become too discouraged I will turn to Senator Smith.

Senator Smith: My questions are getting shorter all the time. On this heading of paragraph 33, the problem of relevancy. I have heard it said, and I do not have any assessment yet of circulations of the underground newspapers, but I have heard it said that one reason for the growth of the underground newspapers is because the daily newspaper is not really relevant to that kind of society. What do you say to that?

Mr. Waters: I think it is true. I think this business of decentralization I was talking about earlier is happening also. The bigger the establishment tends to be, the less, at the moment at least, it is sufficiently decentralizing both its coverage; so that when an editor sees a story come in about a university or sees a story coming in about a business, he does not have the rapport with the area necessary to make that readable or significant or relevant to the people who are reading his newspaper. Obviously they look at it and they say somebody has processed this and they must know and it is significant or relevant to the people who are reading his newspaper. Now, the underground press is appealing generally to specific areas where there is a rapport between the people of the papers and their readers. They are taking up a slack in an area where the media in general are failing.

Senator Smith: Well, I have read two underground newspapers. One I just found for sale down on Elgin Street just last weekend and I was quite impressed by the improvement between that one and the one that I read one time last year.

Now, this is an interesting point I think, but it served a very valuable service; in a rather large corner of that particular issue it gave what I felt were very sound medical and other reasons for the steps you should take if you get up with a case of an overdose of drugs or whatever it might have been. I believed it was mighty sound advice. If some young kid gets caught in this thing, that paper is really relevant to his awful position: I just cite that as an example.

Now, before Senator McElman gets his supplementary question in let me just move to two very short questions.

The Chairman: I believe I have to have Mr. McElman's permission to do that.

Senator McElman: Go ahead and I will come back.

The Chairman: Fine.

Senator Smith: I notice that you have spent considerable attention on the fact that you would like to see more education and training and salary improvements along with working conditions in general. Are you or are the members of your association also members of the Guild or some other bargaining unit in the province of Quebec?

Mr. Waters: No, there is no bargaining unit at all for journalists in the province of Quebec. There never has been.

Senator Smith: Well, I didn't think so but I wanted to be sure. My other and final question is, in view of the fact that the tone that I receive from your whole brief is one of a professional attitude it seems to me that you haven't, perhaps you should have, been considering the validity of moving into an area whereby you would give someone some advice some time with regard to licensing of professional journalism, particularly in the province in which you operate. I believe it is a subject that has been under discussion in the French section of the newspaper business, is that not correct?

The Chairman: Well, Miss Fraser looked at me in a way which leads me to believe she would like to make a comment.

Senator Smith: I would be delighted to have Miss Fraser answer my question.

Miss Fraser: Well, I think what you are getting from me is a minority position. I think perhaps Mr. Waters can give you the majority position. My minority opinion would be that the licensing of journalists would be a very very dangerous thing, mostly because it is a restrictive practice. It can be. First of all you have to find some outside body which issues the licences, then it has to decide who it is going to license. You were talking about the underground newspapers and I think they are a very good example. I am reasonably sure that it would take a very self-confident licensing authority to license the editor of an underground newspaper as a journalist, and let these papers do on occasions progress. Where do you decide that they have made it into the establishment range? I think that this is very difficult. I would not mind—you know do not object to the practice that they have in the press gallery where you have to be accredited to a specific organization but to just license journalists across the board, I think this could be extremely dangerous.

Senator Smith: The only comment I would like to make on that is I think the same anger is inherent with the system that licenses engineers and dentists and doctors and lawyers today, and I am a former member of one of those professions and I see faults in the profession in which I was for many years because of the licensing being in the kind of hands it is, which is in their own hands, therefore it becomes exclusive.

I can understand perfectly well from your answer what the difficulties are.

Miss Fraser: Well, I think there are differences in kind though between professions like engineering or the law where you really do have to go through a very rigorous specific course of study; when you say you are a lawyer you mean a very definite thing, when you say you are a journalist what do you mean? Do you mean you are a purveyor of opinion or...

Mr. Waters: Well, just perhaps to say that I think the minority opinion is the majority opinion. This was our recruiting problem as well. I think when we are talking about professionalism in journalism we are talking about the quality of the activities being done, not about any organized structures at all. Journalists are rather against any formal structures. They instinctively tend to react against them.

The Chairman: I think the reporter would like to have a few seconds so we will adjourn for 90 seconds and while he is making his change I would like to say that I do not think we will make it a late night, Senators. If you will perhaps organize yourselves for your final questions please.

Short recess

The Chairman: The questioning will be resumed with a supplementary question from Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: In your comment a few moments ago, you suggested that the newspaper must operate within the context but with an eye to what the public wants. I appreciate what is behind that but within the Canadian concept today—which some regard more seriously than others—do you feel that the media and particularly the printed media have the capacity to deal in detail and depth that the electronics media have not done, at least to the same degree? Do you think there is a particular role or a responsibility or duty to make a very good contribution to keeping this country together on the subject of Canadian unity and so on?

Mr. Waters: I do not. I will have to perhaps explain that answer. I think that the assumption on which the printed media have to operate is that if they are understanding what is happening and are conveying in a proper way what is happening—you have two nerves operating there—that the public can be trusted to make the right judgment. They do not have to shortcut their role by somehow channelling the information in a way which is either going to protect their inadequacies or going to protect what they might suspect is the public inadequacies and properly inform them and to make their own proper judgment. The assumption the media have to work on is their role to see that the people are intelligently informed and it is not their role to interfere with what they do once they have it. That is the role of politicians, it is not the role of journalists. That is my feeling on it.

Mr. Macdonald: I think if we are contributing to national unity, which I think personally the media should do, it is not necessarily in the content to provide and let the public make up its own mind, it is simply a matter of techniques or the mechanics of the media. We were referring earlier to the lack of east-west exchange of correspondents. The Vancouver Sun's total ignorance of the Maritime region and the Maritime's ignorance of British Columbia experience. I think if we are to contribute to national unity it will be through that kind of mechanical function.

Senator McElman: Then you feel that editorially it is not the purpose even in this important area

Mr. Macdonald: I am not talking about the media in terms of editorial pages, which I think are a separate category.

Senator McElman: Oh, I am sorry, I did not frame my question properly. I am speaking of both areas but let us deal with the editorial end of it. Is there a responsibility in this area to lead?

Mr. Waters: On the editorial pages, yes, I would say so.

Senator McElman: You refer to in-service and other types of educations for journalists and up-grading of their capacities and so on, and I take it you suggest this would be paid by the industry and not the state, of course.

Mr. Waters: I do not think anybody in the industry has answers to the question. For all we know the universities might provide it for us free. There are a lot of things we just do not know. We have not tried. We intend to approach the university to do things for journalists, like if a journalist wants to take a course in political science or urban management or in some specific area you will ask the university, which is presently structured for its own membership essentially, that they waive the credential if we can show that the person should be taking the course. In other words, we become a channel for that kind of request, an organized channel. We would like to be able to persuade our members to say what courses would they like to have and be able to go to the universities and say, "We can guarantee 15 people to enroll in it and under what conditions could you create this course for us and what would it cost?" At that point whether we could go to a foundation, or go to the government or the Canada Council or what have you, I do not know. We had a very pointless answer. We wrote the Canada Council and requested information about how much money they would give a journalist like this and we received a brochure back which really applied to academics and that sort of thing. We are going to take it up with them again. And now, quite possibly the industry will offer—because I think I should point out here that higher management is very much concerned with the same kind of problems we are, because relevancy is a problem to them as well. They are searching for answers and we hope there will be the kind of dialogue that will result in confrontation.

Mr. Blaker: If I might add a point with reference made to the Canada Council, Senator McElman, and also the reference to the obligation of editorialists to lead. I happen to be an editorialist. At one stage I was somewhat concerned, as I think many of these journalists in Montreal are, with the possible improvement of relations between the two cultures in Montreal via the media.

Another chap, a French Canadian chap and myself, made some effort to see if the Canada Council would accept our proposal to do a relatively brief but in-depth study of certain sections of the media in Montreal in order to determine whether or not the media were contributing to a better understanding or were, as we fear, incidentally contributing to a degree of misunderstanding. We offered to do this work at its secretarial cost only with no charge for our involvement or time. I have yet to hear from the Canada Council and the requests were made a year ago.

Senator McElman: To get back to this matter of education—in the matter of education training for journalists we have been given to understand that there are some pretty good availabilities for such training in the French language in Quebec. How is it in the English language?

Mr. Waters: Well, I think this question of training—again we do not know what our members think. It has been my experience and I was quite new to journalism recently that all the technical equipment and the familiarity with the media that a journalist needs can be properly given within three to six months on the job.

Senator McElman: I was essentially speaking of the formal training and education, the schools of journalism and the university availability and so on.

Mr. Waters: Well, they are not existent for the English in Quebec. There is a communications department at Loyola which is fairly recent but they are largely electronics, films and things of that sort.

Senator McElman: Is there any effort being made to bring about a change?

Mr. Waters: Sir George Williams I think is starting something—I don't think there is really anything in journalism. I don't think they are interested in journalism but in the whole academic field of communication which is becoming an area of great interest. This sort of investigation just was not done in the media in very philosophical terms.

Senator McElman: I realize that your group is very young but do you think this would be a very laudable objective on your part to get such training available?

Miss Fraser: Well, this is the point I wanted to make. In my experience, and as far as I can gather from the questionnaires we got back, most of the journalists in Montreal at any rate think that schools of journalism are ever so slightly irrelevant. They would not mind taking an inter-disciplinary course vaguely labelled communications which taught them something about economics and physics and biology and political science and everything that they are going to cover. But the actual craft of reporting does not take that long to learn and you can only learn it by doing it. It seems to most people to be pointless to go off and spend several years getting a degree in it.

Senator McElman: Well, we have had another view expressed and I wanted to make sure it was your view.

Mr. Blaker: I think the tendency of journalists today is moving much more towards a background in which there exists an area of potential expertise that can be tailored to meet the demands of journalism. In other words, perhaps as Miss Fraser pointed out the journalism aspect of a journalism school does not seem to be the greatest need and as the brief points out the needs of the journalists themselves seem to indicate a desire to get into other areas of specialization with which they can do a better job.

Senator Prowse: Well, is post graduate training really listed?

Miss Fraser: Yes.

The Chairman: Senator Everett?

Senator Everett: It is late Mr. Chairman, I think I will pass.

Senator Bourque: Mr. Chairman, somebody spoke a while ago about the confidence that is placed in a reporter.

The Chairman: The confidence?

Senator Bourque: Yes, about the confidence that they would place in a reporter. Well, as you know, I have been an alderman, a mayor, a member of Parliament, I have been president of many associations and I have never been betrayed yet by a reporter, by a newspaperman at any time. When they have come to me I have said to them, "Well, now, I cannot say anything to you about this but I will tell you in confidence what we intend to do, but this is not for publication," and in all the years I have never been betrayed. There was one man and he used to come to me all the time. He is dead now and was from the Montreal Star and for some 40 years I gave him all the news but he never published anything—but I always gave it to him first so the others would not beat him to the punch. I can say that I have entire confidence in reporters. I was in the newspaper and publishing business some 50 years ago, long before any of you ladies and gentlemen were in the game.

Senator Prowse: Well, long before that.

Senator Bourque: Well, I am 80 years of age so I am not a young man any more. I am particularly interested in paragraph 3 where you say "the initial impetus for our formation was the emergence of a federation of bodies representing the French journalists in Quebec." I believe in national unity. I am just wondering why you could not get together. I think if the English and the French press got together, I think it would be a great advantage for the province of Quebec considering the troubles we are going through.

I was just wondering if you could give us a few words about why. There must be a reason why you did not get together. Was it the fault of the French press or was it the fault of the English press or was it the fault that you were each keeping to one side? For the sake of national unity if we could get you gentlemen together it would be a wonderful thing for the province of Quebec.

The Chairman: Mr. Blaker, would you like to comment on that?

Mr. Blaker: Through efforts of my own I was successful in obtaining some time for the French radio journalist to whom I referred earlier. He became a guest on my particular radio station—I wish it were mine in the sense of proprietorship—and I specified to the English-speaking Montreal listening audience that his continued stay with us as a guest, where he began trying to explain the needs and demands and concerns of French Canada, would depend upon their reaction. I would not think there was any point in doing a soft soap sell because I thought it was up to them to get off their hands and let us see whether or not they were interested.

We received a very good reaction—an extensively good reaction. After some time the visits ceased. I am not clear why but we do seem to have a very small minority of people who take strong objection to this type of exchange. For a period of four months I was a guest on a French-speaking radio station where I did editorials in French.

Senator Bourque: Can you speak French, sir?

Mr. Blaker: I believe we all do, sir.

Senator Bourque: Do you all speak French?

Mr. Waters: Yes.

(A short French dialogue between Senator Bourque and the four panelists.)

Mr. Blaker: We found that after a period of some 3 or 4 months it was a similar reaction again. I think a rather small minority of people objected to having me on their airway and my days as a guest were dropped. The experiment has been attempted and there does seem to be some problem but we remain interested, I think, in carrying out the kind of suggestion you make.

Senator Bourque: Well, let us hope that you will be successful.

Mr. Waters: The founding people wanted I think, instinctively, to join the federation—the French Federation of Journalists—but I think it was primarily the question of money. We would really like to have for say a period of two years with them a system where we would give half our dues to their organization because they would be doing more and we would be able to definitely benefit from it. We would be on all their committees, perhaps in a non-voting capacity. We would like to give them say a third of our board of directors so that there is whole exchange but because of structures and a lot of other things, there are specific things which we should probably be still organized to handle, and we should wait until the French-English problem becomes more resolved, until we can arrange to have some kind of organization where we could do things only that way. That is what we are hoping for.

The Chairman: On this question of membership, why the failure to attract television people into your organization? I notice you do not mention that in your brief; is there any reason for that?

Mr. Macdonald: I wish I could answer that because I am supposed to be handling membership recruiting. Somehow both in radio and television, although radio has been slightly more cooperative, there is a great reticence to be a part of an association and the bulk of our potential television membership from Montreal would be from the CBC. Some of them at least feel that they are now capably represented in a professional way through a particular union which we do not enjoy. Perhaps the reason is that somehow the nature of broadcasting has always been one of transients and mobility and no particular feeling for an association, for a grouping or collectivism, and perhaps that is now the reason because radio is 50 years old and they are losing this characteristic and beginning to realize they are part of a larger operation. Perhaps it is television's infancy but Mr. Blaker is more familiar with broadcasting than I.

Mr. Blaker: I think part of the explanation of the lack of television people might be the fact that the director of news and public affairs of the private television outlet, CTV, considered the subject in an editorial broadcast and damned it as far as associations were concerned. He felt possibly that they were of no use whatsoever.

The Chairman: Who is that?

Mr. Blaker: A gentleman by the name of Mr. Bert Cannings. This could have had some effect, perhaps.

Mr. Waters: I think we have prepared the time well now and I think if we were to go into the CBC there are some 15 or 20 members we could pick up quite easily now, so it may cease to be a problem.

Mr. Macdonald: It takes a great deal of persuasion.

Senator Prowse: Well, the first question has to do with joining the Quebec people. I am wondering if perhaps you are not taking the attitude of the fellow who waits until he has money or waits until he can afford it, until he gets married. Do you think this is what you are doing?

Mr. Waters: Well, we have thought a lot about it but it is a very sensitive decision to make. It involves both an understanding of the nature of the French journalist and the nature of the English journalist, of their employers and a whole lot of things. It involves the educational scene in the area and it's a qualified judgment that we have made so far and we are not making it on behalf of the association and manage to expose our thinking on it. The fact is that they may just decide to marry.

Senator Prowse: The next question has to do with paragraphs 46 and 47 which outline the Stern proposals and the charter there. Paragraph 47 says:

"The Board must be consulted by management on any change in ownership, and on the appointment of an editor-in-chief, who cannot be dismissed if the Board disapproves such action by a two-thirds majority."

It seems to me that there might be merit in this. Can you tell us what there is in your experience that makes this either necessary or desirable? Have you gone that far?

Mr. Waters: I would be guessing at this point what I think about those who are in favour of it or why I would seriously consider it. The reason would be, I think, the strength of journalism is in the reporters and I think they see a need for structures that would give them a much greater confidence in what they are doing and the demands they would make on resources on the media; this sort of thing. Dialogue might be better if they felt that the structures were designed to be more responsive to them. Now, this again would vary very greatly amongst them depending on their attitudes to a lot of things. In some papers this is not a problem; management is responsible; but in general and in the higher structures in the media at the moment and the resources available to it, there is this generally expressed lack of dialogue between levels of management, hence a lack of confidence.

I think it might help seriously in that way.

Senator Prowse: The other question has to do with the matter of your concern about the acceptability of the press as a reliable medium. Do you think that perhaps your problem rises entirely out of the fact that because you have so much news and such limited space, you have to select? Now, for example, for reasons which are quite obvious, I picked up six papers which covered our hearings yesterday afternoon.

Now had I not had that experience as a newspaperman and to me the fact that there was a political feud on in New Brunswick—it is no news to me, believe me. To me the important thing of course was what we were trying to do here, to establish some information to enable us to come to some conclusion as to what useful recommendations we might make in dealing with this important matter.

Some of the papers carried nothing about that. Now, I do not complain about any of the reporting and I do not complain about any of the reports, but a person reading those six different news reports—it's just like getting six witnesses to an automobile accident which I get in law. These people are not liars, as you know some people say somebody is lying here—and they are not, they are doing the best they can. I do not think that anybody who wrote these stories yesterday—there was nothing there that I would say was a deliberate distortion, but there was of necessity selection, and different people selected different things, which I think is a healthy indication. But to the ordinary person—I remember as a reporter how you go out and cover an accident and somebody breaks a leg and you write it was the left leg because that is what they told you from the hospital, and you run into somebody who says: "Those darned reporters, you cannot trust any of them, it was the right leg that was broken."

Now, you have had that same kind of thing; do you think that is the area? Do you think maybe you could help yourself if you write some stories about yourself?

Senator McElman: Mr. Chairman, before that question is answered I would like to correct something for the record. Senator Prowse has referred to a feud, a political feud in New Brunswick. I deny such is the case; it was a difference of opinion.

The Chairman: I think Senator Prowse was referring to several headlines which used the word "feud".

Senator McElman: There you go you see, he is being unduly influenced by the press.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Waters, would you care to comment on that?

Mr. Waters: Yes, I would like to comment. I remember when we had our first ethics seminar I started off by sort of saying that I believed I was born on such and such a date because I saw it in the birth column in the paper. People tend to believe what they see in print. It is a fact. As I have become more experienced in journalism, I have come to doubt the fact about even one's own birth. I do not think these kind of accuracies when you are talking about the right or left leg are possible in today's journalism. I think the public has to be made aware of the limitations that the journalist works under.

Senator Prowse: Well, I do not think they are.

Mr. Waters: Well, I do not think they are either. This is what I think the younger journalists are expressing and when they are talking about the question of relevancy. The public is damning them for doing something they can't do or at least try to do any more accurately than they are doing now because there are more relevant and important things such as why the leg was broken and how well the leg was healed and so on. Journalism is still hung up on the business of detail and the superficial facets of our society and I do agree with you that I think the problem of credibility is still with us.

Senator Everett: I stated before, Mr. Chairman, that I would not have to ask any questions but this section on multiple ownership on page 5, Paragraph 21, just too fascinating to let go by. One of the statements is to the effect—"However, half of those who approved said that in such cases owners should be regulated so that no monopoly is created and that editorial freedom is preserved". Do you know what is meant by monopoly in that context?

Miss Fraser: I think they were talking about something similar to the situation in New Brunswick or the situation in Quebec before the Desmarais group split up; before they got rid of their television holdings a couple of weeks ago.

Senator Everett: So that would mean in a certain fairly wide area every certain form of publication being owned by one group?

Miss Fraser: Yes, or supposing one wild day you woke up and every daily newspaper in Canada was owned by the same chain. That would be a danger, a monopoly.

Mr. Macdonald: I think we find ourselves sometimes getting confused about the definitions, multiple ownership versus concentration of ownership, I personally would not consider it necessarily bad that one man or one company could have ownership of various media in various areas of the country. When it is concentrated in one region, it is deplorable.

Mr. Blaker: I wonder if I might also reply to that question. There would seem to be in the broadcast media two features which go to this question of either multiple ownership or concentration of a diversified interest. First that unlike the newspaper or at least to some degree, it is virtually impossible to get a grip on the eyes and the ears of the people within any particular locality. With respect to television—cable television is becoming a very common feature in the urban centres. As to radio of course, it is virtually impossible to stop the input into a set. You are crossing boundaries and as a matter of fact a $50 short-wave radio can pick up Radio-China if it exists. I think in that sense of a monopoly this doesn't quite apply—certainly not to radio and perhaps not as much to television as it might to a newspaper which has the additional difficulty of transporting its particular product. The other aspect of multiple ownership is that—I do not now speak for the entire membership but I have the distinct impression that quite a number of us felt—that with the workload, we found that chain operators tend to provide greater resources and staff and to improve the quality of news. That is a very wide and not particularly defined judgment on my part.

The Chairman: Are you talking in broadcasting or in newspapers?

Mr. Blaker: I am now speaking of broadcasting.

Senator Prowse: You are speaking of CTV.

Mr. Blaker: In my last comment I was referring to radio.

The Chairman: You were thinking of Standard Broadcasting?

Mr. Rod Blaker: Standard Broadcasting or it could be Geoff Stirling's total operation but I don't recall the corporate name he uses for it. I believe there are two or three other chains; then you have the repeater stations which is a chain concept which simply feeds and additional area.

Senator Everett: Than, you would almost all agree that monopoly has to be a very pervasive thing to be called a monopoly?

Miss Fraser: In Quebec the particular area which alarmed people was Sherbrooke and that is not a large area—Sherbrooke is not a very big town.

Senator Everett: No, I was not really talking about its geographical size. It might be a small area.

Miss Fraser: Yes.

Senator Everett: We would only be dealing with a limited number of situations and possibly only two which would come under the heading of a monopoly in your mind then gather?

Miss Fraser: Yes.

The Chairman: Well, I would like to have some clarification on that. When you say only two in Canada and Miss Fraser says the situation in Sherbrooke by her definition could qualify as a monopoly, then, I would suggest that there are more than two such situations in Canada.

Miss Fraser: Oh, I was saying yes to a very low. I do not know the exact number but as I pointed out I do not know anything about the test.

Mr. Waters: I detected that at least most of the members were not interested in the problem because I do not know whether they distinguished or saw that much of a difference between working for one paper or working for a chain. It didn't affect them significantly in their work. They were still subject to the same kind of pressure, they were still confronted with the same lack of resources by and large. So it was not a critical issue to them. Obviously it would be if it became a massive problem. But in working for a single owner or one that owned ten papers, working conditions were not that different, what was demanded of you was not that different and what you were able to do was not that different.

The Chairman: Are the members calling on their experience prior to their working in Montreal or were they calling on their experience in Montreal?

Miss Fraser: I think that I might say that I work for a chain—I work for a newspaper which is part of a chain and I don't feel restricted in any way. On the contrary, it is very nice to have a large corporate organization behind you that can feed you with enough money to maintain a library and what not, but if I were in one of the several cities in Canada where the only two newspapers—morning and afternoon were owned by the same man and have the same staff but pretend to be different then, I would be quite perturbed.

The Chairman: What if those newspapers were members of the chain for which you worked?

Miss Fraser: I would rather not comment on that.

The Chairman: I am not trying to be difficult as I am sure you will appreciate it is not a hypothetical question.

Miss Fraser: I realize it is not a hypothetical question...

The Chairman: By all means don't answer it.

Senator Everett: Then your general view is that beyond monopoly situations the concentration of ownership is not a bad thing...

Miss Fraser: Not per se.

Senator Everett: And it may be perhaps a good thing.

Mr. Blaker: I wonder Senator if you wouldn't define concentration of ownership?

Senator Everett: I guess I would have to use your term multiple ownership-similar investment pattern.

Mr. Blaker: Well, with respect, I am afraid you have thrown back a question at me. I will if you wish use any definition we can agree on for the purposes of establishing what a concentration of ownership is. Do you mean by locale, do you mean across several media, do you mean a vertical integration or...

Senator Everett: Let us use FP as a case in point.

Mr. Blaker: I don't know the case.

Senator Everett: Well, FP would own several newspapers but none of them to my knowledge—well, just let me restate this. FP, as I understand it is a newspaper chain that owns newspapers but all of them in different localities.

Mr. Blaker: Then, I think of the reaction of the members of the association would tend to be that the services provided by the chain would more than offset the disadvantages of the chain. This would be from the point of view of the working journalist.

Mr. Macdonald: That would explain it in the case of FP publications which may have something to do with the standards set by management or by the administration.

Senator Everett: But you might not lend to criticism brought by virtue of the fact that they are chains but some other reason?

Mr. Macdonald: That is correct.

Senator Everett: Not because they are a group?

Mr. Macdonald: Not necessarily.

Mr. Blaker: If I might return with respect to a somewhat different relationship in terms of a chain which has to some degree the same effect on the news—Standard Radio News Service to which if I recall correctly are attached or involved approximately one dozen other radio stations across Canada. This of course is a service which these people pay for, and use if they see fit. In a sense that has the chain implication. It is a single source of accumulated information which is passing down an entire broad band conveying information to stations which can in turn, if they choose, convey it to the public. I would consider that as having absolutely no disadvantages and all the advantages.

The Chairman: Just on that point would you not be concerned about the widest possible dissemination of divergent views and the fact this might be limited by the kind of broadcasting structure which is described?

Mr. Blaker: Well, I think you would be running into more of a commercial question of what is within the feasible budget range of any individual radio operation, in that nothing would prevent a given radio operation—to use for example NBC on the one hand or Standard Radio on the other or Reuters on the other hand—I have wound up with three hands—I am sorry, but the point is that it should not prevent development of additional information other than as an economic matter for the owners and management of the particular station.

Mr. Waters: I should perhaps emphasize the point that the twelve people pointed out that the concentration of ownership can lead to the stifling of opinion by the standardization of news and such concentrations would increase the pressures towards conformity. I think probably they are generally zealous in a sense that they would like to see a thousand competing chains across the land. They do not like conformity imposed by organizational means. If that doesn't happen too much then they couldn't care less what structure is employed.

Senator Everett: Well, I can see where you would be concerned about that but I gather, from reading the rest of those two paragraphs that most of the journalists who are applying are saying "That is not true in my case." They are saying if it is true in other cases we are concerned about it but in my case, in my newspaper or radio station, I am not treated that way.

You make a very interesting point in items 46 and 47 regarding the situation in West Germany to which you make the point, if you follow through your argument, that chain ownership is not a bad thing, but whatever might be bad about it, or bad about the fact that newspapers have to be owned at all, can be corrected by some sort of management and editorial writers association as is mentioned here.

One of the things that we might look for is more competition or single ownership. There are various ways of attempting to protect the public and I gather your way would be not to get too worried about that aspect of it unless it goes too far. You would say a good way to protect the public is to have the editorial writers involved in the management, having the real say of how management operates the newspaper. That would be your solution?

Mr. Macdonald: I would think that more participation upwards would have a great deal of influence on middle management and would perhaps inspire middle management to realize that outside interests then can have very little influence on the reporters—and it would be protection for them as well.

Miss Fraser: I think it is question of not just the editorial writers and management but of everybody and management. I realize that in a large organization it cannot be literally everybody; but the reporter on the floor is the person most isolated from the managerial aspect.

Senator Everett: You mean editorially in the broadest sense?

Miss Fraser: In the broad sense.

Mr. Blaker: I wonder if I might follow up on that as well, Senator Everett. In theory the accumulation of facts should be the same no matter who is reporting them. Obviously here is going to be some differentiation because of the human element, interest, and particular expertise.

The editorial aspect, and I mentioned earlier that I do essentially editorial work on a radio station—the editorial aspect has been found in radio to be a not particularly transportable commodity to other areas.

In general, the system of circulated editorial seems to be now giving way to a demand for more local editorial material which would reflect presumably some of the more local needs of the community. Perhaps this would then come back to your earlier question and also the Chairman's question with respect to a kind of standardization of information in this particular circumstance. It is very difficult to standardize an editorial opinion and push it across a broad band. It doesn't seem to be working very well and many people do not seem to be terribly interested in that type of material.

On the last point, some of the points you have been making, do of course apply to newspapers and to publishing generally, where the editorial staff is operated usually through a board—if the newspaper is large enough for that purpose—and answers to, I would presume, general guidelines of policy. The people who editorialize on radio are operating on such an immediacy basis that there is no hope to clear a policy three or four times a day. They have to be relied upon to express a sensible opinion and if their opinions are deemed in due course not to be particularly sensible the only result is that they have to be removed. You don't particularly run into Stern and this L'Express problem so much in the electronics media.

Senator Everett: I think you said that one of the reasons for the growth in the underground press was the failure of the established press. Would the growth of the suburban press be for the same reason then?

Mr. McDonald: Well, I think the growth of the suburban papers—and they are spreading out across the country in fantastic proportions—is well, due to two proper reasons—one, the large metropolitan daily, in the case of some cities, or by and large the daily newspaper is trying to deal with entirely too much information on a regional, national or international or global level. Also somehow in our changing society there is a new emphasis on the community, the whole populous spirit is growing and sooner or later the large metropolitan daily newspaper such as the Montreal Star becomes irrelevant to the younger people I talk to from time to time.

By going to their underground papers, they are reading things to which they can relate. They are not necessarily getting this over to your society which the daily newspaper might be missing out on, I am not sure, but certainly it is the spirit of the community which is bringing about this.

Senator Everett: So it might not be so much a failure as an impossibility due to the make up of the large daily newspapers?

Mr. McDonald: That is correct.

Senator Everett: Well, to come back to this item on page 6, item 26.

"A number of respondents were worried about the working reporters' difficulty in communicating with middle management, especially with the editors and desk men who handle their copy."

We have talked about being concerned about the commercial pressures that are put on by advertisers and the pressures that are put on through the public. Are you talking about pressure that is put on by the publisher with commercial interests through the editor, or are you talking about the pressures of the editor himself?

Mr. Waters: My understanding of the answers that were made to that question was that it is the judgment being exercised by the middle management, the desk man. It is simply a problem of desk men getting their copy, they edit it, they do all kinds of things to it, they see so much coming across their desk and they are working at such a pace, that the possibility of sensitivity to the writer is simply not there.

As a consequence, you wind up with a kind of anaesthetical relationship. You care about your copy but he does not. He is making judgment which probably has very little to do with the publisher because I think publishers are becoming much less influential in their papers than a lot of people realize. These people are making all kinds of judgment as to what story is important—this sort of thing. They will take a 15 paragraph story and cut it down to four and there is no communication as to why they are making this judgment to the reporter so that there is this lack of dialogue.

Senator Prowse: It is just like taking your car into the garage and getting it fixed and just receiving a bill. You can't find out what happened to it?

Mr. Waters: Yes.

Senator Everett: This item 46, then, would tend to cure that?

Mr. Waters: Yes.

Senator Everett: One last question. One of the things that I have noticed in talking to editors and managing editors since this committee started their hearings is what I detect to be reluctant to tell it like it is. I do not know if they are too close to their publishers and indeed if they are, they become part of the structure. I am not interested particularly in breaking that down but you do make an interesting suggestion in item 53, page 12. You say:

"We urge that the committee go out in the field to talk with journalists across Canada to gain a feeling for their world and their concern. We believe this is especially important because your investigations should be centred on them. The media is not machinery but people, and journalists are the most essential people within it."

If we do that are we going to run into the same reticence. In other words, would we really get a greater answer in your judgment from working reporters than we would get from managing editors and editors?

Mr. Waters: I think if you want a cross-section of opinion you obviously have to go into the working field. There may be some obstacle in the very simple fact that you are sitting up in Ottawa attracting and inviting various groups of managing editors, publishers etc. But because of our lack of organization you won't really learn that much from associations with journalists. Hence our suggestion that it might be worth while to get out into the field and talk to the working reporters. I do not think you will find much reticence.

Senator Prowse: Where they are not organized across the country, who do we talk to? Suppose we go into Edmonton where there is one newspaper. Now, how are we going to get reporters to come down and talk to us?

Mr. Waters: I would think your research staff would be doing some advance work on that.

Senator Prowse: They have.

Mr. Blaker: The Press Club is probably your most suitable location and if I might add a personal opinion I think you would get a zero reading on reticence if you sit down and talk to people who will flood you with complaints.

Senator Everett: But you must remember that we operate in public...

Miss Fraser: If you could remove this kind of gentleman who is reporting everything you say you might get a freer response. If you could go out with some informal sessions.

Senator Everett: Well, the press would raise heck with us if we were to do that.

Mr. Waters: On press secrecy, I think that the reporters—I understand that you are going to tape confidential conversations...

The Chairman: May I say that if any member of the working press is interested in giving us information in confidence, we are interested in receiving it. However, I am taking the position consistently and continue to take it that these hearings will be open unless otherwise requested by the witness, but I might add I am only one member of the committee and the committee might easily decide that that is not the proper decision but hope they won't. We have taken the position that the hearings will be open.

While I take Senator Everett's point and I understand it and I am sympathetic with it I think through our research, and in the course of the hearings, just as we have tonight, quite frankly we are able to get some of the attitudes of the working press. Perhaps we should consider ways of getting more. I take the point but I must say as far as the hearings themselves are concerned here in Ottawa, I would want to keep them open if it were possibly could.

Senator Everett: Well, assuming that the hearings are open and our Chairman has just stated the point that you make here is still valid.

Mr. Waters: Well, I was thinking in the nature of rapping with journalists, I was thinking very informally and I was not thinking of open public hearings.

The Chairman: Would you like me to explain the verb "to rap" in this context?

Mr. Waters: Well, to talk with rapport.

The Chairman: I think all of us doing that to an extent. We all have I think contacts with the working press across the country and I think in the community we come from it is fairly well known that we are members of the Senate. It is an interesting suggestion and I think Senator Everett—I am grateful to him for drawing our attention to it.

I have only one more question. On page 7 at the top you say:

"If a major tonal characteristic emerges from these questionnaires it is the strong strain of self criticism they expressed."

I would like to ask you, Mr. Waters—I will ask you and if your colleagues have any opinions they wish to express by all means they may do so—do you think that same strong strain of self-criticism exists in the Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association and with publishers generally, collectively and individually

Mr. Waters: I am working on a rather limited knowledge there. My impression on my very limited knowledge would be no. The self-criticism and the agony would be much greater at the level of the reporter than it would be at the level of the editorial staff.

Miss Fraser: If I might comment.

The Chairman: Please.

Miss Fraser: On my own paper it does exist with my publisher, it really does. We have sessions where we tear apart every issue of the paper and try to find out what was wrong.

Mr. Macdonald: I think by and large it exists on our paper as well. One example where it does not exist—I was doing a rather extensive piece a year ago on the future of the newspapers and communications generally, for the Star's one hundredth anniversary issue in fact, and in the course of my research which was fairly extensive I wrote to publisher associations, the head of newspaper chains etc. Of the three or four respondents most were limited to five lines. Most indicated little if any interest on the state of the business and I was really quite sad about that.

Frankly, particularly, with reference to the FP publications it was the most negative letter I ever received. It was rather discouraging to start off my research on that plain, needless to say.

The Chairman: Well, may I on behalf of the committee thank the four of you and perhaps on our behalf you will thank the rest of the membership, Mr. Waters.

I had written down a note or two to express at this time even prior to Senator Everett's comment a moment ago about going into the field. So I was going to thank you and suggest that there is one obvious benefit already of your organization and that is that it brings working press people like yourselves before a committee like this. Because I do take Senator Everett's point, I think it is very important that this committee has access to the kind of thinking which you and others like you can provide—so we are very grateful to you. I think it is imperative that the committee gain some insight into the attitudes and the problems of the people who are actually working in the press.

I can only say again, and I am sure I speak on behalf of the committee, that we are grateful to each one of you. Please convey to the membership our appreciation.

The meeting is adjourned.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Thursday, December 18, 1969

The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 10 a.m.

Senator Keith Davey (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, if I might call this meeting to order. This morning we are going to receive two presentations.

The one we are about to hear now and another one at 11.30. I indicate the time just so that you will be aware that we will be hearing a brief at 11.30 from Mr. Charles Templeton.

The brief we are about to receive is from the Canadian Council on Rural Development. Sitting on my immediate left is its executive director, Dr. Tom Espie and sitting on his immediate left is Dr. Helen Abell who is a professor of sociology at the University of Waterloo.

If I may say, Dr. Espie, and Dr. Abell, that the brief as we requested has been received three weeks in advance. It has been circulated to the members of the Committee. It has been studied and read by the Senators and we propose now that you may wish to take a few minutes to explain it, expand upon it, review it, summarize it or indeed to say anything else which may be on your mind. Following that we will turn to the Senators who, I am sure, will have some questions for you.

I don't say that you must use the 15 minutes but you are free to do so.

Dr. Tom Espie (Executive director, Canadian Council on Rural Development): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Honourable Senators, the main purpose of our arrival here is obviously the presentation of the brief which has been in the members' hands or Senators' hands for some time.

However, maybe I could use as you suggest about 10 minutes or so to review some of the points in the brief that we have submitted and to pull them together at this time.

First of all, perhaps a word or two about the Canadian Council on Rural Development which we are presenting here.

The Canadian Council on Rural Development was established in 1965 by the then Minister of Forestry and Rural Development, to act as an advisory body with regard to the formulation of national policy on rural development. The Council continues to serve the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, The Honourable Jean Marchand in a similar capacity.

There are currently 31 members of the Council from all parts of Canada, either representing associations and organizations active in rural areas or distinguished by specific professional knowledge of rural problems. I think it is fair to say that no other body speaks for so wide a range of rural interests as does the CCRD.

The Council has, in recent years, come to the realization that development in rural Canada can only be premised on the provision of adequate flows of information and the establishment of properly functioning channels of communication. It, therefore, is anxious to ensure that any enquiry likely to have an effect on national policy with regard to the mass media give due weight to the interest of Canadians living in rural areas. In the view of the Canadian Council on Rural Development the present national pre-occupation with economic disparity is an indication of a heightened sense of national capacity and an increased regard for equity.

The establishment of the new Department of Regional Economic Expansion, with the avowed intent of reducing inter-regional economic disparity, is a welcome development. It should reduce this kind of disparity to some extent.

However, in the view of the Council, concern for the economic gaps existing between the various regions of Canada, must not divert attention from the most glaring disparity of all, namely that separating the income and living standard of rural Canadians from the income and living standard of urban Canadians.

Rural Canadians everywhere are largely missing out on the comfort and conveniences of our new affluent society. The government is cognizant of the economic and social problem in rural areas and has introduced programs of farm consolidation and re-training aimed at ameliorating the situation.

But the overall problems of rural Canadians persist—the problems of small communities living in relative isolation, faced with stubbornly low prices for what they produce, losing many of their best young people year by year to the city. Although programs of government support can help, in the final analysis these communities can only survive by reason of their own determination and their own ability to marshal and organize their own resources.

Of course, it would be possible to affect an amelioration of living conditions of rural Canadians by some extension of our already widescale welfare system. But this in the long run can only be uneconomic and even demeaning.

Rural Canadians have no inclination to become the pensioners of their wealthier urban counter-parts. In the view of the CCRD the answer to the problem of rural Canada can only be sought in programs of social and economic development. Not enhanced welfare programs. The demands on rural Canadians at the present time are onerous indeed. To survive they must increase the efficiency of their production in agriculture or the fishing industry. They must be flexible adjusting to changing markets and to volatile public demands for taste for what they produce.

They must seek out new products and they must learn new skills whether they are to stay in rural areas or move to the city.

They must adapt to new productive processes and new ways of working and new ways of living and they must change their attitudes and change their ways of thinking. Economic development, indeed economic survival of rural Canadians will increasingly depend on their capacity for social change. Here is a policy and a functional role for the mass media—an essential role, a strategic role which the mass media can play in relating social growth and change which has for some years been recognized by development experts in every part of the world and by the United Nations.

I might add there that Dr. Able has worked on such a program, financed by the United Nations, concerned with the establishment of mass media facilities in West Africa. This was part of an overall development effort.

The brief presented to this Committee is a summary or resume of some of the programs in which the mass media have been used as tools of development. Interestingly enough and this is also brought out in our brief, the first pioneer advance in a socially responsible use of the media was made in Canada.

The CBC Farm Radio Forum programs were a brilliantly cultivated step in media use of which this country might rightly be proud.

Unfortunately, this series has been discontinued. However, Canada is still the scene of considerable imaginative media programming, particularly with regard to the needs of the native people. Some account of this excellent work is included in our brief.

The point is that so much more needs to be done. A concern voiced in our brief to the Committee, that a more essential role be assigned to the mass media in Canada's Rural Development effort, has been felt for some time. It has been felt for some time by our Council and it is a concern which we know to be shared by many rural Canadians. We stress in our brief that the mass media performs precisely those functions that we wish them to. As a society we can use the media as we wish.

Two quotations from my report covering a piece of mass media research with which personally was associated a couple of years ago are relative here.

Traditionally television—and this project was concerned with the use of television—traditionally television uses scatter-gun technique. It hits the largest number of viewer by aiming squarely at the centre of the mass. It might be well argued that for the mass media this is the most apt policy. Certainly most people are pleased most of the time with most of the fare offered by television.

In general terms the scatter-gun technique works well; but certain sub-populations miss out because they are too far from that central point of which programs concentrate their aims. The sub-population are inadequately served. The world portrayed on television is not their world. Its problems are not their problems and its news has little bearing on their day to day lives.

Because of this, television, rather than tying them in to the totality of society some extent, even operates to reinforce and underline their separation and isolation from society. Television in this context ceases to be a tool of socialization and acts rather as part of the mechanism of alienation. I should perhaps add that the point of the question was concerned with measuring the effectiveness of television as a vehicle for raising information in such levels as budgeting, shopping, health, diet and so on amongst the urban poor.

We called this project Operation Gap Stop and it was rather a successful project. One thing clearly demonstrated by Operation Gap Stop is that television does have an alternative available to the scatter-gun approach. True the scatter-gun approach is likely to remain of prime importance to the television industry but the mass public demands such generally acceptable anodines as the Beverly Hillbillies and the Andy Griffiths show.

The television industry will continue to provide these but while at the same time performing its other vital functions of moving mountains of detergents, kitchen cleansers, aspirins, stomach remedies and so on.

There is an alternative of growth, and we call it the rifle technique. Operation Gap Stop can be used to pick out a specific target population and hit it successfully with exactly the kind of material needed in exactly the kind of format preferred.

There are many such specific sub-populations whose real needs are marginally met by the scatter gun technique. The old, the sick, the young and the housewife in this context is the royal poor, along with their particular problems and highly specific information needs.

Also be it noted that there are now 48 positions on the T.V. dial. Does the same mass public have to be assaulted at the same time by 48 scatter guns? This carries communications overkill to the point of absurdity. Surely it is not too much to ask that one of those 48 positions on the T.V. dial be reserved for the poor. Another for the old, another for the housewife and so on.

The central point in the brief presented by the CCRD to this Committee is that we are only partially exploiting the potentialities of the mass media because we are neglecting certain relatively isolated sub-public in particular rural people.

In fact, the mass media insofar as they provide information to a large extent do not function as a mass media at all but they tend to cater to the special tastes and interests of the more highly educated. The information needs of the less educated are marginally dealt with so those who have ample stores of information and many sources of information available to them are better served by the media than those for whom they are the sole source of information.

This is not only inequitable but socially irresponsible.

The federal government and the media themselves must assign a higher level of priority to special informational needs of the sub-public, thus far to a large extent neglected and disregarded by the media.

This kind of special attention among rural Canadians is in the view of the CCRD particularly pressing. The brief we have submitted is primarily intended to draw attention towards that need.

The Chairman: Thank you very much Dr. Espie.

Dr. Abell do you wish to add anything to that or should we proceed to the questioning?

Dr. Abell: No, I wouldn't add anything to that.

The Chairman: I think perhaps Senator MacDonald will ask the first question this morning.

Senator Macdonald: When you talked about the mass media you seemed to be talking mostly of television and radio. What in your opinion is the function of the newspaper and the press?

The Chairman: I think, Senator MacDonald, some of the press people would like you to repeat that because they couldn't hear you.

Senator Macdonald: I would like to know what in your opinion is the function of the press in regard to what you have been commenting upon or what might be called the social affects of the mass media. You mentioned television and in your brief there is a considerable amount of attention paid to radio programming. Has the newspaper as such a part to play as a tool of development in rural Canada?

Dr. Abell: I would like to try and answer that. I worked for 11 years as a civil servant in Ottawa. In fact, I was hoping that you were going to be meeting in the Senate Building so I could look out the window at my old office.

What I wanted to say is that back in 1951, we had a study in Alberta where we looked at a great variety of variables including how farm people learn, where do they get information to do with agriculture per se, to do with homemaking and so on. I repeated these sorts of questions and studies in different parts of Canada over the years; a study which we did in Ontario in 1959 we are repeating now. We find the greatest main source of information has been traditionally the press but specifically the farm press. The farm press is the one and those of you who know the rural areas know that when the Family Herald died a tradition died in rural Canada.

There are other attempts to fill that gap but the ordinary press, in the sense you know of the daily newspaper, is not the common source of information to the rural poor because first of all they don't get it. When they do get it it is a day old. People's sense of community is rather a narrow concept—where they live and move through. A weekly local paper is much more apt to be read. I am sure you Honourable Senators...

The Chairman: We are also people I can assure you.

Dr. Abell: I am sure you people are familiar with the generally lower average educational levels; so that the type of information, the way it is written all are a fact in the mass media reaching the rural people.

So, my answer to your question would be that they have traditionally relied on the farm press specifically, but the weekly newspaper when it will print government handouts and other handouts also is a source of information.

Senator Macdonald: What about radio—I notice you mentioned that the Radio Farm Forum has been discontinued. Are there other programs taking its place?

Dr. Abell: I wish I were absolutely certain what is currently going on today but I do know that the Farm Forum per se was discontinued in 1965 I believe—in the spring of 1965 as a national thing. But in terms of what took its place—an hour long program was put on by the C.B.C. probably in the same time slot but the format was changed and there was no organized listening group as part of it. They changed completely. One of the fascinating things that came out of that was that in two of the Ontario counties Gray and Bruce, where this organization had been particularly strong, I was told, and I have been told this by many people, that there were at least 60 of these organized groups that continued after the official program went off the air. The people had gotten into the habit of meeting and discussing what they were going to do about these counties. There was a really strong community spirit—and you know the areas, I think you know what I am talking about.

It performed a very real function. I do believe that MacDonald College at Ste. Anne de Bellevue continued promoting English-speaking forum groups in Quebec for some years and to my knowledge it is still going on but I am not absolutely certain.

Now, these are attempts to keep on a thing that officially was discontinued. I can also add a few words about the introduction of the technique of the Farm Radio Forum in other countries but this would take the rest of the day and unless you want me to I won't go into that.

Senator Macdonald: Would you like to have seen that program continued?

Dr. Abell: Well, personally, I think the germ of it—the seed of it has been sown in Northern Canada—Northern Ontario specifically. The Indian-Eskimo association have a start on this using the same general principle but I don't believe they have the group listening. What I am talking about, you are probably familiar with, where they do have the C.B.C. facility in the North. They do have a small government grant I believe and they are using Eskimo local people to do the broadcasting. They are using tapes and getting a feed-back and this is an attempt to carry on this sort of thing. They don't call it Farm Forum up there but...

Senator Macdonald: That is just for select groups?

Dr. Abell: Yes.

Senator Macdonald: Whereas the Farm Radio program was Canada-wide?

Dr. Abell: National. Personally I think it has a potential need but I think it has to change with the times of course and I think—and I am speaking very personally here—the content wasn't responsive enough for the needs of the people; because the people were sick of hearing the sort of things that I was asked to speak about and I say that with some feeling. Not sick of it, but there should have been many other things that they were talking about. They should have been talking about marketing instead of production.

Dr. Tom Espie: If I might add to that, Dr. Able. I at one time inquired from a senior officer of the CBC, the reason behind the discontinuing of the series. While in no way repeating the reasons, I was told—I was told that the series had not done the job that it was intended to do. I am not too sure whether that was the most valid reason for the discontinuance. The problems of rural Canadians seem to have multiplied in intensity and in variety since the discontinuance of the program and I would suspect that the need for support from the media and the need for the increased flow of information to rural people has in fact increased since that time.

Senator Macdonald: Do I take it from your brief that you believe that the media has a dual function to perform? Generally speaking you expect that the drift from rural areas to the cities will continue and consequently one function of the media is information for those who remain and the other is to assist those who have moved into the cities to adjust themselves to industrial life?

Dr. Espie: I think these would be two very, very important ways in which the media could assist people in real need. There is no doubt I think that economic pressures, which are currently resulting in a flow of population from rural areas to the cities, and this is a dramatic flow as I think we are all aware, that the same economic pressures will continue for some time; this flow is a fact of life which regretfully to some we will be living with for quite a few years, although eventually, obviously, there must be some equilibrium arrived at.

However, the sheer human distress occasioned by this flow, I think, is not perhaps as well known as it might be. The pressures on families resulting even on the occasion, in broken homes, the sheer bewilderment of rural immigrants to the cities—there are real human problems and finally result in the measure not only in terms of human distress but in hard-nosed economic terms because the rural immigrant to the city will be unhappy, but he will also find trouble in finding work.

There is a real danger that not only himself but his whole family might end up on the welfare rolls. This will be sheerly because, in many cases, there is a lack of information as to how he can and how his family can mesh into the highly complex urban way of living.

I think that many of us really do not realize exactly how complex is the way of life we have put together in the city. How alien this is for some people in isolated rural areas.

Senator Macdonald: In your brief on page 7 you set out certain objectives which the mass media should perform. Do you think it is possible for them to perform such functions without governmental directions? Is it possible for them to perform these functions through the present set-up and ownership?

Dr. Tom Espie: Senator, with regard to page 7 of the brief there are listed six functions of the mass media. Now, these functions are functions operated out from the operation of the media by a long tradition of sociological research these are the logical functions of which the media are capable.

Now, this is the spectrum as it were of the functions which the media can perform. News is mentioned as one and the drawing together of society and society realizes that it is a totality. These are functions of the media. Now, as to which of these are accented—which particular function in the range are stressed, this would depend entirely upon the way in which any particular society would choose to use the media.

As we well know in Russia the media are used in a very different way to the way in which we use the media in this country. This is the spectrum of the way in which we could use them. I think that government intervention could certainly have an effect on the function of the media in the society. On the other hand even without government intervention the particular genesis of any nation or society are resolved in a particular set of functions peculiar to that society.

Senator Macdonald: I am interested in one part of your remarks where you mentioned that "although programs and government support can help".

The Chairman: Where is this, Senator?

Senator Macdonald: Page 4, "in the final analysis these communities can only survive by dint of their own determination and their ability to marshal and organize their own resources". What happens if they don't have sufficient resources to organize and marshal to keep them going?

Dr. Tom Espie: It is a horrible thought. I think what is mentioned here is that finally, any amount of government help or help from the outside will only be effective if there is a certain minimum of internal resources within any particular community.

Now, there will be communities and we must face this, that rural Canada will be fading out in the next five or ten years. We know this and it is sad and it is tragic; but there are some on the margin I suspect which can be kept alive usefully, economically, and productively with some degree of government intervention.

The resources do have to be there in the community.

The Chairman: I was going to ask Dr. Abell a question. Would you care to comment—and it is such a broad question—it is one of these questions that you could spend all afternoon on but fortunately we just can't do that. Would you care to comment, as related to the people in your organization, on the role and the function and the service provided by the weekly newspaper across the country, and particularly newspapers which serve rural communities. Are they helping to meet these problems you describe here?

Dr. Abell: Well, I cannot speak with authority on this. All I can say is that people get a great variety of news from a great variety of sources such as the farm press.

The Chairman: Well, that was going to be my next question. I was going to ask you about the farm press but I purposely asked you about the weeklies first.

Dr. Abell: Well, they get the weekly but what they read in the weekly is another thing.

The Chairman: What do you think of the weeklies?

Dr. Abell: Well, I used to read the Stouffville Tribune when my family lived there and I knew who had tea with whom and I occasionally saw something broader than local concern; but local concern was what the local people wanted and if they wanted national concern they would turn on the radio news.

They had a variety of ways of getting information but this is a small town near Toronto. This was different from some place in an isolated community, because they had these facilities.

The Chairman: Well, let us talk about the farm press. What do you think of the farm press in Canada today?

Dr. Abell: Well, I am speaking as a world sociologist, a person who looks after poor people and their point of view and not the point of view of the press but the user's point of view...

The Chairman: That is exactly what we want.

Dr. Abell: It is an important part of life, where homes at a very low income level traditionally were able to get one or another of the publications; and the one I mentioned, which is unfortunately dead and buried, was the commonest at that time. But there are a few others that come. Most of them are from associations or special interest groups, as you probably know. We know they are read and we know that by asking people "What do you read, what do you find out what is helpful to you and what else do you want?"

About my only summary comment on farm press would be that people will read this material as long as it meets their needs. What they look for are things that will help them in the business, the economics of farming. They want new information, they want market price, all this sort of thing.

Farm press no longer meets that need because they can receive it instantaneously every day at noon but they do want an understanding of what is going on. Where do you find out what is going on? Why in the world are people starving and we have wheat we can't sell? These are the questions that the people are asking.

The Chairman: Dr. Abell, I know that the Senator has some questions but I would just like to ask one more if I may. I happen to know, as we discussed earlier, that you spend a large part of every summer on Prince Edward Island and I wanted to ask you what do you think of the media which serves Prince Edward Island?

Dr. Abell: What do I think of the media. Well, I go there as a Canadian enjoying a rest and I rely on radio for news. I deliberately don't have television and yet the neighbours do. The CBC as far as I know is the only television that they can receive. In other words they don't get American stations—they don't pick it up. So you, in effect, have a captive audience; but I frankly have a high opinion of most CBC programming. I am saying that as a citizen because I think we have some excellent material and the Islanders do see this. You have tied the Islanders, just through hockey games if nothing else, to television.

The Chairman: What about the newspapers, do you read them?

Dr. Abell: Yes, I do. I make it my business to look at them but I can only look at them from the point of view from a professional centered in Ontario. So I don't have the same interest in them as a person and I don't want to go on record saying what I think should be done to correct the newspapers down there.

The Chairman: Why not, why don't you want to go on record?

Dr. Abell: Because I haven't studied it thoroughly enough and as a sociologist I should have figures down to the decimal point. What I really am saying is don't think basically the public in Prince Edward Island is informed. I know they are not informed about what ways in two years, hundreds of thousands of dollars were spent on the so-called development plan. There was no public participation in that and even people who belonged on the local committee weren't informed of what was going on. The man who was in charge has since gone but his name was used—a chap by the name of Gallagher, I believe. But I use this in a roundabout way of answering a question, sir, because I think the media could and should have a responsibility for letting people—in this case of the Island—know exactly what was being done and planned in terms of so-called economic development. I don't think the planning should be done in secret. I think the press could have had far more coverage of the pros, the cons and what is going on, a feedback if you will...

The Chairman: Are you talking about the newspapers or the press generally?

Dr. Abell: Of the whole media. It could have done on radio, television, and certainly in the press. I feel rather strongly about this because we do have information on the lack of this application of participatory democracy, which is a great word but it is pretty tough to apply, but it can be done and the media are one way of doing it.

We should let people know what is being planned and the press can do this.

Senator Prowse: Why wasn't it done? Was it because the media refused to carry any information or because the people who were conducting the surveys quietly conducted their survey and never told anybody?

Dr. Abell: Well, here again, I only have a personal knowledge of this—no real knowledge I suppose—secondhand information but the latter point is true they didn't want the news out.

Senator Prowse: So it is not the media's fault?

Dr. Abell: Well, I think that it probably isn't but I would say that a good radio man, a good television man or a good newspaper man gets the news.

Senator Prowse: If there is enough staff.

Dr. Abell: Well, if there is enough staff and he is devoted enough.

The Chairman: Dr. Abell, I am not trying to put you on the record having you say things you don't want to say so please answer as you will. You did say a few minutes ago that you thought that the people on the Island are not well-informed. Would you care to expand on that?

Dr. Abell: Well, not well-informed in the sense that are they aware of the alternatives that exist for them in the case of, we will say, "The causeway". The alternatives for example, if a causeway could be built and possibly some day it will be, how this fact will change their lives. I don't think they really understand this because the minute you make the Island more accessible, naturally tourism will increase, naturally people will demand a different pace of life, they will demand better food, more and better restaurants, more liquor outlets and all of the things that modern life demands.

The Chairman: All of the great benefits of the cities?

Dr. Abell: Yes. I have a feeling, and I am saying this with more emotion than logic, that the Islanders themselves basically are fearful of change. Yet they know things have to be done and they are not really being given the free and open sort of information about alternatives, which would help them to realize that if large outside interests buy up large amounts of land and go into large scale vertically integrated production, this in turn is going to put a lot of independent farmers out of business. This may be good or bad but at least the people should know that this is a possibility.

I don't think they realize what will happen when urbanization, heaven forbid, really hits that Island or any other isolated place—what this means in terms of cost, cost to taxes, what urbanization means in terms of increasing the inner structure, buildings that go up, the sewage plants and water and all of the things that are part of the planning process.

I think the media can, and by media I mean the press, radio and television and one of the best we have in Canada the National Film Board which hasn't been mentioned. The National Film Board has done a fantastic amount of good of development in this country. I personally hope that it doesn't go by the board. In case you are interested, as a university professor, I use NFB films because we have many excellent ones.

Sometimes we have to wait two and three months because they haven't got the staff to send them out. I think this just body should be aware of this. I am speaking from the user's point of view. If you want to get a feeling for rural people there is a recent NFB film called "Wilf"—it is a man's name and I showed it to a bunch of sophisticated urban students and half of them were men and they were really affected.

Now, what am I saying about Prince Edward Island? I am saying that I don't think that the Islanders, as I understand he or she, really understands the economic and social forces that are at play. I think part of the reason is that it needs to be out in the open and I think this is where the mass media has a responsibility.

I am talking about the press, I am talking about radio and I am talking about television.

The Chairman: Thank you. You were talking about people who understand rural Canada. I think one of the Senators on our Committee understands rural Canada, Senator Hays and I believe he is next. Oh, I am sorry, Senator MacDonald.

Senator Macdonald: Apart from minority groups being neglected, you talk about rural Canada. Do they not nowadays have practically the same advantages as those people living in the city?

Dr. Abell: Well, here again it depends on which part of Canada you are talking about.

There has been of course a great surge in educational facilities offered. With the minority groups, the isolated groups, one of the problems is no matter how good the facilities are, that are offered in terms of school buildings, courses, teachers and this sort of thing, sir, that the attitude of the parents is—well, that is another world, that is not for me.

You as a Metis or an Indian or any one of the people who are in this minority category, and even if you do go through this school system there is nothing at the other end of it. There is no job for you, there is no opportunity. You do go through say a regional school system but where do you go from there? How do you get a job? These are some of the real problems.

Senator Macdonald: Well, these are special problems but I was talking apart from those.

Dr. Abell: Yes, in general, educational levels are rising and we are one of the few countries in the world with free and compulsory education at the elementary and secondary level but many of our people don't realize that means free and compulsory for the student and not the taxpayer. At least, the possibility is there and I have evidence of this as does anyone who studies Canadian society. We all do by simply looking at the census figure which shows these increases.

Senator Hays: Dr. Able, you speak of poor people in the rural areas. If they are poor I suppose the problems are economic. In your opinion, what information are we not getting to these people in so far as economics is concerned, that may be available?

Dr. Abell: Well, I think it is the same old story. If, for instance apart from the media, if you assume that Canadians belong to a variety of organizations, as I am sure everyone in this room does—you know if I sat down and did a little survey, for example, as to what groups you belong to, you would name service groups of one sort or another. I don't know if Senators belong to the Rotary Club but many adult Canadian males belong to service clubs and alliances and this sort of thing. If you are a rural person you might belong to the Federation of Agriculture or the Farmers Union and there are many others.

The Chairman: Political parties?

Dr. Abell: Oh, I have never heard of those. But, at any rate, presumably because of your special interest you belong to various groups and because of your race and religion you belong to certain church organizations as well as the rest of us.

One thing that has been documented in this country, in the United States and all over and Europe, of course, is that the poor, the economically poor do not tend to belong to organizations because this is a middle class and upper class phenomenon. It is not characteristic of the lower income level.

Senator Prowse: Nobody asks them to join?

Dr. Abell: This is one very real fact. Also I don't know how a man feels about it but if you didn't have the right clothes to wear would you go? It is certainly true of women and I assume it operates the same way with men.

When you say: "why don't they know about programs", one reason is they don't have the same channels of communication in the interpersonal sense. Another is, in spite of my comment on the use of the farm press and the national mass media, not every rural person or every urban person is capable of understanding the reading level even of the ordinary newspaper. It is a problem when you look at educational levels. For instance, look at the educational levels of the Metis and the Indians. At what reading level are these people—at grade two, three, four,—this is a real problem.

Of course, it costs money to even buy a weekly newspaper. These are all facts of life but I must tell you that one way that rural people certainly are being reached is television. I did some interviewing recently and I have for years in various parts and I was in a very low income area of this province, not more than 50 miles from here, incidentally, and I was trying to find my way. I had an interview at a certain home which was a farm home and I had to knock at different doors to ask if I was on the right road. I stopped at at least four different homes and they were all what would be described as rural slums. They had all the attributes of a slum, the house falling down, the broken-down cars, machinery, all of these things which would indicate a very low level of income. In every case I had to knock many, many times and always on the side door, never the front door and why? Because of the noise of the television.

In one case it was an elderly man and the other cases there were women in the home glued to the television set and this was during the morning. Now, what am I saying? They can be reached, but what were they looking at and what were they listening to? They were looking at something that gave them entertainment...

Senator Prowse: They were probably watching "As The World Turns"?

Dr. Abell: Yes, that would probably be one. I am not saying that that is good, bad or indifferent but I am saying it is a fact. They are looking at it. They can be reached but they are not being reached with something of an educational or helpful nature but that doesn't mean it has to be dull.

Senator Hays: Are we not getting through to these people that which would make them better off? Let me explain for a moment. You take Hutterite families who have no newspapers, no weeklies, no radio, no television but they are the best farmers in Canada.

Dr. Abell: No question about it.

Senator Hays: And the most wealthy.

Dr. Abell: Yes.

Senator Hays: They have this information...

Dr. Abell: I don't consider them poor, do you?

Senator Hays: No, but they use the tools that are available. If you go to a research station you will see them there more than anybody else. If there is a good farmer in the neighbourhood, they are there all the time. If he is growing a new variety of wheat, they are there all the time. This is the sort of information it seems to me you have to give these people. How do you get this information to these people in your opinion?

Senator Prowse: Through motivation.

Dr. Abell: Yes, motivation—I think you have hit on a very important group of people—the Hutterites. We have a group of people at Bright, Ontario, which are similar to Hutterites but they call themselves the Brothers of Early Christianity—I am sorry I can't remember the exact name but I take grad students there every year. The reason I am familiar with this is that I have been in Alberta, in fact, I was born there and my family made a horrible mistake, they brought me to Ontario at a tender age but anyway, the Alberta situation of the Hutterite colony I am slightly familiar with.

The difference there is that religious beliefs not the agricultural fundamentals compel those people to the land. It doesn't say we should be excellent farmers. They do adopt new technology, but socially, they have their own rigid set of ways of behaving and family relationship but that doesn't mean they are not good farmers.

I don't consider them poor in any sense because their own self-satisfaction isn't based on money.

The Chairman: I think perhaps the point that Senator Hays was making, Dr. Able, if I understood his point, was that these people have attained this degree of success if you will without any access to the media at all.

Dr. Abell: Yes, in this case I agree with you. They deliberately do not want access to the media. That in turn introduces new ideas, new aspirations, changes, to the young.

Senator Hays: They have all the new ideas. I think they have sex because I have never seen so many children.

Dr. Abell: Well, Senator, you don't learn about this from reading the paper.

Senator Hays: There is no cost-price squeeze for these people. They use all their own logic that is available and to visit them is an education. They are not poor.

Dr. Abell: I agree with you, Senator.

Senator Hays: Their basic education is only grade 9 and they don't go to school any longer than this.

Dr. Abell: Yes.

Senator Hays: But how do we communicate this sort of information to the people? How do we communicate this type of information to the other Canadian farmers? They are not using the right tools that are available and these are available to them. If they use them they do well, if they don't use them they fail.

The Chairman: Perhaps I could sum up this question by saying if the Hutterites can do this why can't other farmers?

Dr. Abell: One reason goes back I think to the motivation. Why is a Hutterite a Hutterite? Socialization process is what keeps them as a colony and a group? They want to be good farmers because this is being close to God amongst other things. There is a strong motivation and reasons for being what you are.

Most other Canadian farmers are farmers with very few exceptions because their fathers were farmers. It wasn't a free choice.

Senator Prowse: That is why the Hutterites are farmers as well.

Dr. Abell: Yes. A Hutterite doesn't question this. Today's young man is questioning it. That is one of the reasons for the flow from the farm to the city. The traditional attitude that you have to stay on the farm, no matter what, because this is your duty, this attitude is changing. It is changing drastically. You are saying—how do you reach the people, who are still on farms and who are poor by any standard if you take the twenty-five hundred dollars more or less or whatever. How do you reach them? I don't think you reach them with pleas to become better farmers. I think you reach them with information that maybe there is no future for you as a farmer. Maybe there is a future for you as a hired man. That is a dirty word in this country.

Try to get a farmer, an employer of other farmers to even talk about the possibility of organizing farm labour and paying them a decent wage. I tried it for years and if I weren't a woman I would have probably had tomatoes thrown at me by farmers groups right across this country.

Some of those people, who are struggling on small farms as entrepreneurs, cannot see it. They haven't the capital, they haven't the knowledge, they haven't the motivation, they haven't the help and they would be far better off working at something they know on a paid basis, which is where I see them as a potential farm labour force. This is one of the ways in which they can be helped. Not by trying to make every farm an economic, self-sufficient unit because that cannot be today.

Senator Hays: You are still not answering my question.

Dr. Abell: I am sorry.

Senator Hays: This information—I am thinking about the mass media—this information should be getting to agriculturists; they are not receiving it. There is a great vacuum today and there are not many farm newspapers. When we do read, we read cultural things and that sort of thing but nobody is telling the farmer, that if you grow

Manitou wheat, instead of Thatcher you are going to make another $15 an acre. If you grow Grizzly oats instead of some of the old fashioned variety like Banner you are going to get another 50 bushels. If you use this much fertilizer, this is $50 an acre. This is the information that it seems to me we are not getting over. I am wondering in your opinion, how do we get this information to the farmers of which they are just completely ignorant?

Dr. Abell: I would say that there is something drastically wrong with the agricultural extension services and as you say farmers don't know some of the very important things you just mentioned.

What is wrong with the large number of men that we have in every province. To my knowledge they are called Ag Reps or agents or whatever depending on where you are?

First of all, these are the men that we as tax payers support to transmit the very information you are talking about to farmers but they traditionally have worked only with certain farmers.

Senator Prowse: The ones that come to see him?

Dr. Abell: Exactly. The low income group.

Senator Macdonald: That doesn't always necessarily follow.

Dr. Abell: You feel that some men are making the effort?

Senator Macdonald: I know some of the agricultural representatives really go out and work amongst farmers all the time.

Dr. Abell: Well, this is what I think they should do, sir. I think we all agree that this is their role.

Senator Hays: Do you think that for instance, T.V. and radio are monopolies. If you get a licence and you are able to carry it on, economically you are not going to have a problem if there are not too many licences given. Do you think that where we say there must be so much Canadian content to reach these people, should we also say that as well as Canadian content there must be more time for say, agriculture or the very things that you are speaking about? Do you think regulations would be the answer?

Dr. Abell: I think that the possibility is here. The potential is there. You talk about Canadian content—I understand you could bring a program from New Zealand or Australia, put it on the air and this is called Canadian content. I may be wrong but that is my belief.

The Chairman: Yes, and also the world series.

Dr. Abell: Well, you are saying if I understand you, sir, should some of this so-called public time, time that is not used to sell...

Senator Hays: Or additional time.

Dr. Abell: Or additional time. Should this be devoted to specific purposes and I am saying that that is exactly what our brief tries to say.

Senator Hays: You feel that radio or television as a term of their licence be required to have so many hours a week devoted or assigned to agriculture. We are talking about poor rural people, aren't we?

Dr. Abell: Yes.

Senator Hays: They are all agriculturists.

Dr. Abell: And fishermen.

Senator Hays: Well, do you think that this is a possibility?

Dr. Abell: Well, I think it is a possibility. I think it should be looked at seriously because the content of the program is the whole thing. Rules and regulations could be passed but unless the spirit of really getting meaningful information in a meaningful way is present, it would just be dead time. Because people wouldn't listen. If it were dull at the beginning they would just turn it off.

If you had a high quality type of program with some vitality in it, something that is meaningful and related to the people—remembering the income and the educational levels that we are talking about—and involve some of them in these programs—the National Film Board does this all the time—I think it could be helpful.

This is very much like the experience I had when I was asked to evaluate the introduction of Farm Radio Forum in Ghana, in Africa. Out of 20 programs, every fourth program was what was called a feedback, chiefs, women, men from far away—some of them who had never been to the capital, were brought in and were used on live programs. The people in the villages—and we were out studying the reactions—were just thrilled to the core. It was real, it was meaningful, it was our people and you reacted to what was going on. It wasn't just a lot of people who weren't—I am not able to find the right words, I feel so strongly about it.

I don't think it can be, for instance, a man like this handsome character sitting here talking to the world people. I don't think they would relate to Mr. Templeton.

The Chairman: Do you mean Mr. Spears or Mr. Templeton?

Dr. Abell: Well, isn't that Mr. Templeton?

Senator Smith: But the other one is Mr. Spears.

Dr. Abell: Well, they are both handsome. I don't mean this in any negative sense at all but I mean that the kind of people we are concerned about, if you will, the world poor, the Indians and the Metis will be much more apt to react if for instance Mr. Templeton had with him one or two of the same people that we are trying to reach. It would be on some sort of an interview program where the program took place in their home, this sort of thing. It becomes real and meaningful. That is why I stress so much that you can pass all the rules and regulations you want, but unless the people responsible for running those programs, operating those stations and getting those licences do so in enlightened self-interest—not just you know humanitarianism on cloud nine, enlightened self-interest you will not have good programs.

Senator Hays: Well, Dr. Able, four good cows will produce $2,500. Now, in Japan the average farm is only two and a half acres and these people are self-sustaining. So this old $2,500 is just a miss as far as I am concerned because I just don't believe it. Four good cows will produce $2,500 at today's depressed prices. Now, a man will get his four cows on 50 acres but he isn't doing a very good job, is he?

Dr. Abell: Well, many of these people seek part-time employment. This is one of the phenomena of how these people try to meet this. You can't get it through government transfer payments...

Senator Hays: Well, he is a part-time worker, not a farmer.

Dr. Abell: Well, you are a fundamentalist. According to the census if he sells...

Senator Hays: Oh, that is a lot of bunk. I just don't believe that.

Senator Smith: I would just like to ask Dr. Able or Dr. Espie a question on the very points that Senator Hays has just brought up. How can you relate that a little farmer who only has four cows on 50 acres is that bad of a farmer? How can you relate that to the lack of access to the communications media in general.

Now, let's leave the native people aside because they are a special problem and they don't enter into this generalized picture. How can that be related to the lack of access to the news media, to the kind of program which is available to them through local radio station and through certain other television programs. There are all kinds of great farm publications and weekly newspapers. In this modern day and age, surely with to-day's educational programs, the rural kids, who are being brought into the consolidated high schools, are getting special education in farming and in fishing. So how can you relate this to the situation that he is talking about.

I am concerned as well with the low income fishermen in my province, Nova Scotia. If you would care to comment on that.

Dr. Abell: Well, it is a very good question so why don't we have Dr. Espie handle that one.

Dr. Espie: I was going to sort of weasel a little bit there and I was going to reply some what about what Senator Hays just said. Mentioning for example the situation in Japan. Very small acreages do in fact sustain large families and very successfully. It may or may not be significant but the Radio Farm Forum programs which were originated in Canada were transplanted to Japan and continued in Japan in a television contest. As Dr. Able is aware, because as a United Nations project this has also been done in Ghana, the Japanese experience from the farm forum was very, very successful. It is known to have acted as a vitalizing force in rural areas.

I think it would probably have been a significant role in assuring that in a Japanese context these minute farms are capable of sustaining large farm families.

We, for one reason or another dropped the particular series. The facilities are there for everybody—in a sense we can say that the facilities to become a millionaire are available in our economy for everybody. This is true. It is possible, or logically possible, for anybody to become an Onassis; and in the same way, it is perfectly feasible for anybody given the means and the communication facilities we do have that are available to everybody, to seek out that information and to become a very successful farmer.

Too many of those are not particularly adept at seeking out information and they don't get that extra little push which might be given them by a judicious combination of the Ag Rep with the fishery oriented program. I think this may be the way to success here. This has been done by the U.N. and the problem has been, in peasant agriculture, to somehow motivate the peasant agriculturist or fishermen. To somehow tell them that you can grow Mexican dwarf wheat and it works and this has happened in India. T.V. and radio have been very successful spreading the notion of this successful wheat.

Now, India is finally self-supporting in terms of wheat, so I think the right kind of mix, the real push in an Ag Rep's direction can do the trick and has done it in quite a few areas in the developing country. It is an extraordinary thing that India's grain production has zoomed to the extent that, being a country subject to frequent famine and vicious famine, they are now approaching the point to be able to support grain.

Senator Hays: Well, getting back to the mass media program, the programs that most of the farmers see are showing the poor farmer. You don't show the good farmer. You ever say, well here is a man that is making success of this; but it seems to me that that type of program is an important part because people learn a great deal more if they can see—and I go back to the Hutterites again. You are a neighbour of a Hutterite and you grow 130 bushels to the acre, every other Hutterite within 300 miles is there to see it. The first thing you know he is trying to get some seed and so on and this is the way he operates. What they do in real life, I just don't know. It seems to me there is a place for programming and getting it through to these people, rather than all of us talking about the poor fellow who is only earning $2,500. I must go back—that is only four steers, you know—$2,500. The farmer who can't grow four steers is not a farmer.

It seems to me that instead of always showing the poor, let us show some of the successful people in this sort of programming. It gets across to these people.

Dr. Abell: Yes, I think you are onto the point that I was trying to make earlier. You need to change aspiration levels and obviously people have to want it or else they are not going to change. They have to want something and their aspirational level has to be something that they can see is manageable within their limitations.

In other words you couldn't show and expect a real change if you showed the biggest and most prosperous farm in Alberta—I have been on some of these, as I have in Ontario and other places—because it has to be something in the nature of a progression.

I would think you would destroy the very thing you are after if you showed an extreme type of operation—a quarter of a million dollar capital investment and this sort of thing. I think you reasonably could show different levels, that is really my only point here. In terms of another very relevant point you just made, people like to see. In this early Alberta study that I referred to, when we looked at how people do learn in terms of farming information, the most common one was from other people. It turned out to be the wife. Now, she wasn't born knowing all this but she in turn had access to radio during the day and she read more. Her educational level in general as you know, was a year and a half or two more years in school, which means she has a greater facility with language. That was the way most people said they got their information.

They got their information by talking to somebody, usually a relative and in most cases the wife but she in turn got it from somewhere else.

The next most common method of course, was mass media and this was radio and farm press in the days when we did that study, which was before you were born, way back in 1951.

Senator Hays: Thank you very much.

Dr. Abell: You are welcome. The third most common way was the one you just talked about which was observation—where people went and looked. You didn't ask, you looked. You looked over the fence, you went to the experimental stations. But not many people bothered going to the experimental stations because it is the smaller groups that do that.

Many—about 28 per cent was the figure—of the people would come to meetings—the Ag Rep would call the meeting and they would come. Now the people that visited the meetings did all these other things, it is what we call a scale and you are pretty familiar with that term. If you did this, you did all the other three steps. The very people you were trying to reach would never go beyond the first step.

In other words, you would talk to somebody locally who may not be a very good source of information but he may. This is very chancey—but they don't make the effort to seek it in other ways.

Your point, you know, about what mass media can do about the very poor—first of all, apart from inspiration and changing aspirations and this sort of thing—just straight information giving. We have knowledge from studies that have been done that a great many people, in fact, the vast majority, haven't got a clue of what ARDA is all about.

Senator Prowse: They believe it is a girl's name?

Dr. Abell: Yes, it would make a good name. My point here being that there are certain government programs with potential to help some of these people, to be aware of their potential. Now, this is an information service simply making it clear that a program exists, this is how it works and this is what it is all about. I see the media playing a very important role there but not the only role because there has to be the personal contact.

The Chairman: I would hope that we could conclude this session in about 10 minutes so that we might adjourn for five or ten minutes to give the reporter a break and come back at 11.30. So with that in mind, I am wondering if you could organize yourselves for your final questioning.

Senator Prowse: When you are talking about the media, Dr. Espie, you talked about 48 channels on the television.

Dr. Espie: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Now, the people we are talking about don't have sets equipped with UFC. How many UFC sets are there in Canada?

Dr. Espie: Yes, I realize that.

Senator Prowse: So that what we have is 12 or 13 channels. They are all taken up within limits right now and even if you made one of them available from the CBC and if "As The World Turns" happens to be on the other one, which one are they going to watch?

Dr. Espie: Well, may I just react to that. Again, talking of 48 channels this is a potential obviously because this is not the situation we have. But right now we still have more and more stops on the dial and I think that most rural people have T.V. I don't think they can go from 1 to 13 and get a different program on each because it is just not available.

You say, very, very validly if you have a soap opera on the other channel they will not listen to a rather high level documentary on how to produce better wheat. What do you do? You do what I think—in fact I was involved in doing it—and that is produce a soap opera which contains that particular information. I think the point here is government information efforts generally are conceived in terms of additional ways of issuing information to the public which are brochures, which are releases. If you are stalking any particular beast you learn its habits, the way it eats, the way it lives but if the population you are concerned with, happens to be like soap operas, well, you are in the soap opera business if you want them to get your information.

You can ram particularly good information into a soap opera. It is an excellent vehicle for transferring this information, it does work.

Senator Prowse: Well, it is going to cost $1,000 a minute to produce the kind of program you are talking about.

Dr. Espie: Oh, I have my doubts.

Senator Prowse: Well, I am not talking of the side of my ear. I am saying that this information that is absolutely sound at which you will find out is correct. This is the average cost of producing a useful documentary and a soap opera with actors and everything else which you are going to have going to cost a heck of a lot more.

Dr. Espie: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Now, from a practical point of view you are talking about spending enough money to improve these people but it may not work.

From a practical point of view—the Indians and Eskimo people were in here yesterday and they were suggesting that ten to twenty thousand dollars could provide low cost transmitters to the communities you are talking about. They could bring their people in and the Ag Rep could make use of it. Don't you think then rather than trying to do things which nobody is going to do i.e. insist that so much newspaper space be given to printing stuff that people aren't going to be able to read because the people for whom it is printed don't get their paper; or insist that very expensive radio and T.V. national time be dedicated to something which isn't going to bring in a cent and probably isn't going to be watched, we could do, for a fraction of the cost, something which is similar to the set up in India.

In other words to set up in a community, a way in which these people can talk among themselves with a little bit of assistance from the people who are already there in their own language. Don't you think this might be a more effective way of reaching them than trying to use an ideal situation which isn't going to work for practical reasons?

Mr. Espie: Well, I think, Senator, first of all, our brief does in fact say this is the way it should be done, for example with a complete network. Any innovated way of exploring potential of the mass media in the development context I think is certainly worthwhile doing.

I think precisely what you say the native people have done, I would like to see more of. I think it is an excellent idea and I would thoroughly endorse what you say. I think this is an excellent way of doing it—the community itself using its own station with its own resources. As you remember we do say in our brief that people of these communities are dependent on other resources and if they can be given a little bit of help to have their own station, with their own programs, with its own unique flavour, by golly they will listen to that. They will listen to that very much more readily than something that is nationally or mass produced.

Senator Prowse: Then we can sneak in some of the extra information.

Dr. Espie: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Well, for example, if you continue the Farm Forum you are not suggesting that we wouldn't have the same problems that we are talking about today?

Dr. Espie: No.

Senator Prowse: You would have a useful and interesting program but you wouldn't be solving the problem.

Dr. Abell: It might.

Senator Prowse: Well, it might have made it a little less.

Dr. Abell: It might have presented alternatives in terms of occupation other than the agricultural fundamentalism approach. It might have been able to get people to realistically talk to one another about the possibility of moving off the farm or staying on the farm as a chief secure living place and renting out the land and moving into part-time work to increase this.

Now, I know Senator Hays says they are not real farmers but they are real people.

Senator Prowse: Well, may I ask you one more question. Would you say that basically our problem in this area is a problem of motivation?

Dr. Espie: Yes. I think...

Senator Prowse: First of all, you can get the other things if they are motivated. Isn't this true?

Dr. Espie: I would say a very loud yes and I think Senator Hay's Hutterites are distinguished by the fact that they are internally or specially motivated because they have some special vitamin in their souls that could be working for them in this regard. Most people, most agricultural people are not so fortunate and they perhaps need a little bit of a push to get that motivation. They may need a little bit of a push to get that internal dynamic something.

I think we have in the media the tools to produce that internal motivation and that heightened aspiration that Dr. Able was talking about. As long as the aspirations are not way out of their prospectus.

Senator Prowse: In other words you hitch your wagon to the fence post and you pull yourself out of the mud hole but if you hitch it to a star you are going to be in the same place for a heck of a long time.

Dr. Espie: Aptly put.

Dr. Abell: There was a relevant bit of information on this aspiration aspect. On the study I refer to that we did in Ontario in 1959 at the request of the Ontario Department of Agriculture when I was a federal civil servant—it was a joint effort—we looked at the aspirations that parents had for their children and we looked at the aspirations that the children had—the children who were still living at home. We then looked at what actually had happened to the older brothers and sisters who were out of the home. This has all been summed up in a few paragraphs talking about occupational reality instead of aspirations.

The thing that was absolutely amazing was the aspiration level—in other words this is the parent speaking—we want Johnny to be a senator, lawyer, merchant, doctor, chief—high professional aspirations and the same with the girl. We then looked at what was actually the occupation of the older children in the same family—nobody ever wanted to be a clerk but an awful lot of the women were clerks. A lot of the boys were driving trucks and this was the limitation of educational opportunity which has changed over the years as one of the gentlemen pointed out.

I am analysing data right now which is tracing those same families over the nine years to see what has happened.

Now, to what extent has that aspiration level that everyone wanted them to—certainly some of them said they wanted them to farm and this was really a major finding...

Senator Prowse: That was after the depression as well?

Dr. Abell: Yes. This was in 1959 and we had gone through all of the depression, the war and the bit. Are these aspirations, whether they be high or not, shared by the low income fraction; this I doubt very much. I don't think they feel this way. They feel, well, we can't do that, that isn't for us. If those aspirational levels can be changed at least you aim high, you may not get there but you are at least going that way rather than accept as gospel that nothing can be done, nothing can change, why doesn't the government give me something.

This to me is a tragic thing in a democratic country like ours where the people reach the state of mind where there are no opportunities, where there is no hope, and I hope I am not being too pessimistic, but I think we are destroying one of the strongest parts of the Canadian character.

When we destroy the aspiration to prove oneself we are destroying the basic character. Quite often it is measured with a dollar but the dollar in turn reflects our value to society—that we are paid for certain products, if you will, from the farm, for our skills or whatever.

The Chairman: Thank you. I just have one last question—Senator MacDonald, do you have a question?

Senator Macdonald: Yes. On page 10 of your brief I notice in the third line down, there is a timely reference to members of the Company of Young Canadians. In view of the fact that you are the first witness to mention this I wonder if you might expand on what you mean?

Senator Prowse: What does that have to do with the media?

The Chairman: Well, I think we will accept the question. Your point is well taken, Senator Prowse, but if Senator MacDonald is interested in the answer, I think we all are.

Dr. Espie: I think our knowledge of this problem is just about limited to what we say here. Far be it from me to make any comment on the Company of Young Canadians at this time or at this situation.

However, what I have heard regarding this particular project has been nothing but good. Although, I don't think they have been as successful as I think they could have been or would like to have been, I think the project was staffed by two or three young fellows who were really out to do a very good job. From what I hear and from what I have learned, they have gone some way to producing the kind of things needed and should be congratulated on doing so.

The Chairman: Perhaps as a last question, could ask you this, Dr. Espie. Yesterday when some of the groups were here representing the Indian and Eskimo and Metis they expressed some concern about television portraying into poverty stricken homes degrees of affluence which might be regarded by those people as the accepted norm. They considered this quite a problem, do you think this is a problem? Dr. Able mentioned going to the homes at 10 o'clock in the morning and finding that they are watching the television set. Is this a problem that they see the false standards of affluence on those television programs?

Dr. Abell: Yes, I agree 100 per cent with this. As I told you I am a great user

National Film Board films for teaching purposes to share Canadian knowledge with students who are relatively young in the third, fourth years of university. One shot that I shall never forget showed people in an extremely well kept kitchen, a husband and wife and someone talking to them; this was a kitchen that I would assume you people would be able to have in your homes as would most professional people—but not the majority of Canadians—and yet this was presumably a poor home. Now, this was one of the few faults that I would find with that particular film. I think this is found all the time on radio and television. I think Dr. Espie made reference to the Beverly Hillbillies as something that at first—well it is still very popular I guess but this is the extreme, the wishful dream you know that we are going to strike it rich that we are going to live in a mansion. This is one of the points that I think is important—realistic programming, showing in degrees what it is really like in the city. Go down to Kensington in Toronto and look around and you will see. You have nice little homes and well kept. It is not a slum. That is much more within the limit of the income range. They are full of Portuguese at the moment as you probably know and they have cleaned them up and they are nice looking little homes. They could have been slums.

Dr. Espie: Yes, I think this is a bad danger. I think that even in our presentation we mentioned for example, the alternative to the scatter-gun approach which is a rifle approach.

If you program in terms of a scatter-gun and you advertise in terms of a scatter gun you will be hitting very poor families with very well designed motivations to go out and buy themselves or acquire in one way or another a cadillac, holidays in the Bahamas, etc. which they can never ever do. Finally they end up breaking a shop window or walking off with a coloured television. I would rather suspect that a detailed analysis of the total motivation behind the urban riots in the States would show this. I think you can't go on motivating someone to buy a coloured T.V. and say you can never ever have one.

The Chairman: Well, Dr. Espie and Dr. Templeton, on behalf of the Committee I would like to thank you. We felt as a Committee when we were in our formative stages that our study of the media would benefit if as well as talking to media people from across the country, we could hear from representatives of groups like yours and nationally known news commentators like Mr. Templeton. We are particularly grateful that you were able to come to the Committee to bring us a point of view which we perhaps wouldn't have otherwise.

On behalf of us all I do want to thank you both.

Senator Smith: Mr. Chairman, could we have a five minute break instead of ten because some of us are afraid that Mr. Templeton might be cut short.

The Chairman: Well, I know Mr. Templeton well and he is seldom cut short. It is 11.25 and we will adjourn until 11.30.

—Short adjournment.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, if I might call this session to order. The next witness as we have mentioned several times this morning, Mr. Charles Templeton. Mr. Templeton is a personal friend of mine but that is certainly not the reason he has been asked here. I think even without the biography which has been distributed in advance to the senators, most of you are familiar with his background.

Really, the reason we wanted him here today, and we are so grateful to him for coming, is I think, there are few other people in Canada who have enjoyed successful careers at senior levels in several media—in television, newspapers, magazines and even in radio and I suppose in radio primarily as a performer.

We won't have many witnesses who have perhaps the background in depth in as many of our media as does Mr. Templeton.

He did not prepare a formal written brief for us but he does I understand however wish to make a preliminary statement. It isn't a long statement and following that statement, Mr. Templeton, we will proceed to the Senators who will question you on the things you say and indeed may well question you on things that you don't say.

Mr. Charles Templeton: Mr. Chairman, gentlemen. In the instructions that were sent out it was suggested in the beginning to define your own position in the mass media. I think there has been a biographical statement sent out as Senator Davey has said. I should add just one thing to that and that is that I am also a former employer of the chairman of this committee in a freelance capacity of course when he was a columnist in Maclean's magazine and in his case personally handled his copy—a fairly formidable task, I might mention.

We also have had other associations, your chairman and I, and have made a little news in the mass media. Most recently in relation to what can only be described charitably as his recent abortive attempt to find a candidate for the Liberal party for the mayoralty in Toronto.

I am going to if I may, read briefly for about seven minutes.

The Chairman: I think you should clarify that last statement.

Mr. Charles Templeton: I think it is common knowledge.

The Chairman: I attempted to persuade Mr. Templeton to be the Liberal candidate for the mayoralty in Toronto but there has been subsequent events which may indicate that he made a wise decision.

Mr. Charles Templeton: If you will allow one additional word. You attempted not only to get Mr. Templeton to do it but a number of others.

The Chairman: Well, you were very high on the list.

Mr. Charles Templeton: I am not going to speak here in my initial statement on the suggested topics but I would suggest to you, if you wish to address questions to me on numbers 3, 6, 8, 13, 16 and 20 I would be pleased to speak to them because they are questions which interest me a great deal.

The Chairman: I think it is most unlikely that the senators have that guideline but do we have one which we could perhaps let them see.

Mr. Charles Templeton: Well, I could refer back later because I haven't got them with me right now.

The Chairman: Right.

Mr. Charles Templeton: As the chairman has said I have not prepared a brief but what I would propose to do this morning, if it suits your purposes, is to make a relatively short and somewhat general opening statement in which I shall touch on some of the areas that interest or concern me and may be of interest or concern to you. I will then be responsive to any question which has been suggested arising from what I say or indeed apart from it.

Just a very small preamble. The news media are undoubtedly in the midst of a crisis of credibility. Will Rogers used to quip that he only knew what he read in the papers. Now of course, Rogers used the phrase as a springboard for his own particular brand of humour but in deadly seriousness it is a fact, that 99 per cent of Canadians as they contemplate their world could accurately paraphrase Will Rogers and say "I only know what I learn through the media." How else?

Now, we speak a great deal to democracy about the right to know; but the right to know is meaningless unless you are able to know—and our ability to know is essentially in the hands of those who own and run the news media. If they do not do their job well, we are uninformed or misinformed.

Whether it may seem desirable to some or not, willy-nilly we are in their hands. It is troubling then to observe that the news media in this country, in the United States and in the number of other countries of the free world are facing a crisis of credibility. You would not be holding these hearings were you not deeply troubled about the press, unless you believe others were.

Vice-President Spiro Agnew would not have attacked the press, particularly television journalism, did he not feel he was articulating what millions of Americans are thinking. The surveys indicate quite clearly that increasingly mass numbers of people are questioning the accuracy, the objectivity, and the freedom from bias of the various news media today.

Even television, through which most people get their news these days, is suffering from a loss of credibility. Now, inasmuch as an informed electorate is fundamental freedom, it is a profoundly disquieting matter when millions of people come to doubt their principle sources of information about the world in which they live. Consequently, and personally, at the time of my resignation as editor of Maclean's Magazine last September, I was in the process of preparing a major 20 page treatment of the news media in Canada under the working title—"The news—What is it? How do you get it? Can you trust it? It never got done. Well, I hope it will.

Nevertheless, let me comment briefly on the question raised in the title, by giving you as one who has been both inside and outside of all the major media in this country, my opinion of the job being done by journalists in Canada. It is this. By and large, Canadian journalists seek to report the news accurately, fairly, and without bias. Most of the time they do. Their lapses are exceptional rather than normal. In my experience, a great majority of the people, who own or control the media, respect the news and do not try and fashion it to serve their philosophical, political or personal ends.

In my association with the Toronto Star as executive news editor, the Canadian Television Network as director of news and public affairs, television station CFMT in Toronto, as program host for radio station CFRB in Toronto and Standard Radio News as commentator, I have almost without exception been entirely free to report any news or to speak to and examine any subject that seemed to me as a journalist needful of being published or voiced.

Now, the same conditions obtained in the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the work I did with them, there being one exception. I emphasize one exception. In 1958 when I did an extensive film report on Swedish morality as related to sexual habits, abortion and birth control, the program was never carried. The situation when I was editor of Clean's Magazine however was quite different. There was regular and unwarranted interference in the editor's function and freedom. That led, and it is hardly a well-kept secret, to my resignation.

You will understand then from this background why I am of the opinion that in general Canadians are well served by their news media. Having established this however, I could just like to repeat it. There are a number of weaknesses within the various news media structure which need to be noted and which should and can be corrected. I shall mention a number of them within a brief compass of a few sentences on the assumption that those which interest you will stimulate questions and lead to the opportunity to expand on the original comment. And they are these:

First, there are no adequate professional standards in journalism and there should be. It is the responsibility of the owners of the news media to begin to establish such standards. Until they are established we will be afflicted with a great deal of second-rate reporting.

Two, it is always—I repeat it is always in the public's interest to have competing news media in a community. My experience has been that monopoly is in no area of our society more objectionable than in the reporting of the news.

Next, one of the great weaknesses of the Canadian news media is their reporting of international news. It is intensified by the often uncritical, unedited carrying of foreign wire service reports.

Next, the statement of the publishers that they do not interfere with editors by telling them what to write should not be too readily accepted as the whole truth on editorial freedom. Much of such control of the news as there is, is indirect and unspoken rather than expressly stated and often takes place at the middle-management level. It is my observation that the influence of advertisers on the news and on television—commercial supporting so-called—diminishes in direct proportion to the economic strength of the news media.

In other words, journalistic courage sometimes has a direct relationship to financial solvency.

Next, the commitment of most managing editors, desk men and reporters to objective reporting is genuine—unfortunately impossible of realization under the present situation. There is all the difference in the world between the ideal and the real in the publishing of the news. Total objectivity is the impossible dream.

Next, the great problem in the television news is not so much a lack of zeal or commitment by staff it is a lack of the commitment of enough dollars by management.

Next, a way must be found whereby an ordinary citizen who has a valid complaint against a newspaper or television news and public affairs program on a local station can register effectively that complaint. It is often said that you can't fight City Hall. It is a hell of a lot easier to fight City Hall than it is to fight a newspaper or a television operation.

Next, a question for the Committee. Why is it that almost no small "c" conservative has become a journalist? Most of them being liberals, what effect has that fact on the treatment of the news?

With those preliminary statements I would like to now respond if I may, Senator, to your questioning.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Templeton. Would you be good enough to indicate the sections you listed at the beginning and I will just indicate to the senators what those sections deal with.

Section 3 is the section about newspapers in the United States being required to publish a semi-annual list of their owners and is this a good idea in Canada?

Section 6 is on technology. Section 8 asks what are the prime functions of the mass media? Section 13 is the Walter Lipman quotation on the fact that television is adding to the irrationality of the world and so on, and Section 16 is related to pressure groups and Section 20 an increase or a decrease in the degree of credibility according to the public by news and its opinion disseminated by the media. The senators might find those references helpful.

Senator Hays: Maybe Mr. Templeton would enlarge on those right now. I think we would like to hear more on them.

The Chairman: You would like to hear him on these?

Senator Hays: Yes.

Mr. Charles Templeton: On the sections or on the...

Senator Hays: Before the senators start making speeches—then we won't have time to hear you.

Mr. Charles Templeton: If I may be permitted, Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to you if I may that the initial statement that I read would seem to me to cover some of them but more than that perhaps it would be more relative as to the purposes of the Committee. That is a judgment that you gentlemen will have to make.

The Chairman: No, I accept that. I think that you are right. I think that most of the material which Mr. Templeton referred to in the specific sections has been covered in the introductory statement and that being so I think perhaps we are ready for some questions.

Senator Macdonald: Would you expand on some of the ones that were mentioned. For example, that there is no end to professional standards in journalism?

Mr. Charles Templeton: Anyone who has been in politics as you gentlemen have been or have been in public life knows that from time to time he will argue that he has been misquoted. Many times he has indeed been misquoted. Many times he has not been misquoted but has been hurt by what has been published and the best defence in that instance would be to say that he was misquoted.

One of the reasons that men who are in public life are often misquoted, and some bear bruises because of it, is because there are not, it seems to me, sufficient professional standards in journalism and there should be.

News men refer to themselves, and I have done the same thing, as belonging to a profession but in point of fact they don't. They belong to a vocation. A profession, by definition, is a calling requiring specialized knowledge with often long and intensive academic preparation. That does not obtain in the newspaper business. The qualifications for a reporter are not determined by set-down standards. There are not academic qualifications other than, of course literacy, and some other acquired knowledges.

There are a very few times when specialized knowledge is required to deal in increasingly complex questions of the day so that there is an understanding of them—for instance in some things such as the labour beat, the education beat, the financial beat or whatever it might be.

Moreover, there are very few acquired skill which are required as mandatory. For instance, it seems to me that it must be absolutely mandatory for a reporter to be proficient in shorthand. I think anyone who has been in public life, if he cares about precise English and is explaining an attitude which he may have and which may be controversial would be concerned to be clearly understood—to have the reporter talk to him who makes no notes, trusts his memory or makes swift and partial notes and misses the intricacies of the statement, which are absolutely fundamental to what one wants to say if one wants to communicate.

May I suggest to you that there are, of course, exceptions. There are some extraordinarily brilliant reporters who have great native gifts and who are able to quite literally translate not only precisely what was said but the intent of what was said. I am afraid that as I have travelled across Canada—it has been my lot to be interviewed a great deal by the press as well as work a great deal with the press—that I must say that I flinch more often than not if I am interviewed on a complex question because I find that it chances are very great that I may not be accurately reported.

Of course, the question of misquoting has a humorous side to it and that is when 50 million people were watching Neil Armstrong step down the ladder onto the moon, he made a statement which was reported on television and was heard by 50 million people and picked up by the press in which he apparently said "One small step for man and a giant leap for mankind." Now, here it was, it was live and everybody was there; there was the reporter and as he says, he was still misquoted. He said "one small step for a man"—so there is no solving of the problem. It is nevertheless there.

I have in the course of my own experience, working within a newspaper and hearing the complaints from people who say that they are not accurately reported, found that in many cases it is true. It is true because in my judgment there is a lack of professional standard on newspapers as to staff. I could give you story after story but I shan't trouble to do that.

The problems are—this becomes a very serious thing because as I took the pains to say, almost though it is known as well as we know the alphabet, virtually everything we know about the world, we know about the world because of the media. Therefore, if the media does not report accurately that which is said, then I think it poses a very serious problem in terms of the communication of ideas in a society.

Senator Macdonald: You mentioned now one thing about reporters knowing shorthand. Would you go further than that and say he should attend a school of journalism or something of that type?

Mr. Charles Templeton: I think that in addition to such training that he may bring to his job, I think it is the responsibility of a publisher to among other things pay sufficient salaries to provide the incentive for people to prepare themselves in this field. I think if they are going to put a man on a beat, that man should be given time off to prepare himself for that beat so he would understand something of the very specialized knowledge that any beat requires in our complex society.

I think that newspapers should institute training programs—these are costly things and they hinder the normal operation of the newspaper but I think they are necessary. I think that reporters should be subsidized by owners to take academic training so that they are able to keep abreast of the enormous flux that takes place in most of the major concerns of our society.

Again, I think salary incentive would have a good deal to do about it.

Senator Macdonald: Well, that would only be for the major large newspapers, Toronto and Montreal and places of this type. You wouldn't expect a small town paper to have the same opportunities?

Mr. Charles Templeton: No, I wouldn't. Don't think that it is likely that it will happen. However I think that an increase in salary would perhaps draw a more academically qualified man to this path and does perhaps improve the standard.

Senator Everett: Mr. Templeton, I think you said that in any community there should be competition between the news media. Would you tell us what you mean by competition? That is what you mean—does it have to be competition between two newspapers or does radio provide that in the form of competition?

Mr. Charles Templeton: One of the benefits of competition is that you then have a standard against which you can measure the performance of either of the competitors. That is a very important thing. Take for instance, just to digress for a moment, it is relevant I believe to what you are asking—in the City of Toronto to have three dailies and in my judgment three extraordinary fine dailies. They are in a very real battle for ascendancy. As a consequence of that battle, they spend large sums of money, they purchase all of the features and all of the services they can or see fit so to do—to the advantage of the person who reads that paper.

Moreover in a competitive situation, as anyone knows who has worked for a newspaper, the staff by virtue of a competitive situation tries for a beat over the other newspapers. There is nothing that lifts staff moral better on a newspaper other than a raise and beating the other paper. This is a very real factor and the excellence of reporting that goes on because here are other standards of judgment on how well you cover that story. You observe them, your editors observe them and if the public is looking carefully it observes them. The beat on a daily newspaper today is really not a terribly important thing unless it is an exclusive story. Simply because radio beats you with the news anyway. That is why there are no extras published any more, even though sometimes on television films you will see a boy shouting, "extra, extra, read all about it." They never do that any more, of course, because radio will beat any newspaper and television will beat any newspaper in breaking the news.

But competition is the stuff of which good journalism is made and without it, a monopoly community doesn't tend to strain every sinew to do the best possible job. It is almost intrinsic within the situation itself and more than that the publishers real or presumed real attitude will tend to affect coverage in the monopoly situation. There is no other criterion by which to judge and, as a consequence, I would think that it is always to the advantage or always in the public's interest to have competing news media in a community.

I don't suggest to you that it is going to happen because it is desirable but I would say it is one of the most desirable things that I can think of in terms of effective operation of the press.

The Chairman: I am not sure that you specifically answered Senator Everett's question.

Senator Everett: No, he is doing just fine, Mr. Chairman. Are you referring more specifically to newspapers in this situation?

Mr. Charles Templeton: Yes, but not necessarily. If there is an aggressive television station, and/or an aggressive news program on a radio station, and the sense that they are going out and getting the news becomes believed and recognized—this will have an effect on a newspaper's operation. A newspaper, if it is not careful, can look stodgy and not "with it" as the saying has it, and I think that any kind of competition to bring the news to the people is to the advantage of the public.

Senator Everett: You talk of the Toronto situation and I agree with you. You have a situation there where I suppose you have a single ownership newspaper...

Mr. Charles Templeton: Well, one of the newspapers belongs to a chain.

Senator Everett: Well, one belongs to a chain and one belongs to a chain that owns television stations as well. When you contrast that with Winnipeg where you have two chains in competition with each other and then Vancouver where you have the same two chains in competition where they have agreed to print the paper out of the same plant. Is there competition in all of those three situations?

Mr. Charles Templeton: I think there is—certainly to my knowledge and mind you not living in Winnipeg, and although from time to time I read the two newspapers there, I would say that "yes" there is competition there and it is healthy competition.

It is my understanding, not founded on hard facts and I would equivocate in that regard, that the competitive situation in Vancouver leaves something to be desired.

Senator Everett: So, chain ownership as long as the chains don't agree with each other as they might have done in Vancouver doesn't worsen the situation in your eyes?

Mr. Charles Templeton: No. In my view chains fulfill a very important function in certain situations. They certainly do because they make possible coverage which is not possible in the budget of an individual newspaper on some occasions.

Senator Prowse: If they do it?

Mr. Charles Templeton: If they do it.

Senator Everett: In certain communities the process of competition is gone because there is only one newspaper left—we are not talking about the situation where an owner owns the two newspapers, because there is just the one newspaper there—and Mr. Claude Ryan when he was here said that there ought to be some means of government loans to enable new newspapers to start or to carry on. Is this the sort of thing that you might be talking about?

Mr. Charles Templeton: Well, there are problems of economics in publishing or operating a newspaper at a profit and this is a perfectly legitimate desire in a rough business. The evidence of that is the number of papers in this country and in the United States that have failed; and it is why you have in so many cities a monopoly situation simply because there was a time you know when all the news you got you got only from the newspaper and that time has not long gone. That has now changed. There is a sizable amount of competition in the community apart from the printing press. We still call it the press but it is an anachronism, the term. Presses are not used.

I would think that anything that could be done that did not in any way directly or indirectly inhibit the freedom of the publisher to publish the news and to treat the news—anything that could be done that did not inhibit that, with all things being equal and I can't speak to all things in a limited time of course, nor am I capable,—would be advantageous. I think any community which has two newspapers is the better for that fact. The economics is the great problem.

Senator Everett: I think you made three statements which I will read to you. I hope I reported them reasonably correctly.

Journalistic coverage varies in direct proportion to solvency.

Mr. Charles Templeton: I am afraid you did not report me accurately. I said in other words journalistic courage sometimes...

Senator Everett: It is my writing that I couldn't read.

Mr. Charles Templeton: Sometimes has a direct relationship to financial solvency.

Senator Everett: Owners respect news and do not try to fashion news to fit their ends.

Mr. Charles Templeton: Well, let me speak to it without making reference to this specific statement. It has been my experience...

The Chairman: I think that there was a third one he wanted. Do you want to bring them all up?

Senator Everett: There is an unspoken editorial control.

Mr. Charles Templeton: Yes, I did not quite state it in that way but let me speak to the point...

The Chairman: Well, I think he wants to put a question to you based on those three points.

Senator Everett: Not at this point. I wanted to say that there are three statements that are not on all fours with each other. At least, I don't think they are. I would like you to enlarge on all three of them.

Mr. Charles Templeton: Well, it has been my experience and I speak from that primarily, that the publisher of the newspaper or the person who controls it, though he may not be the publisher as such, that the interference which takes place under those circumstances is very small to the point of being negligible in the terms of direct interference.

It is however something always to be borne in mind that if a publisher says, "I do not interfere with the operations of the newspaper" I think he should personally, but that is not the whole case. The problem more often arises at the senior editorial level, at what you could describe as the middle management level, where the publisher's concerns are well known. Those concerns are stated daily in amongst other things, in the editorials where the gentleman's position or the company's position is stated on virtually every question. These facts are well known to senior editors, the people responsible for the actual publication of a newspaper, and sometimes they will seek to interpret the publisher's attitude towards stories which may relate; and rightly or wrongly this unspoken aura of direction becomes a very real part in the production of a given newspaper or the attitude towards a story or the amount of coverage given to a specific thing.

Let me use a positive rather than a negative example. I could use a negative but let me use a positive because I think it says it equally well. I was, for instance, executive news editor of the Toronto Star. It was common knowledge among all staff and very definite knowledge among senior editorial people that anything dealing with the intrusion into the Canadian economy of foreign capital was a cause very dear to the editorial director's cause. It was also known that statements that Mr. Gordon might make at that time in his career on that subject, were regarded as being almost automatically important; and therefore there was a real tendency on the part of the man who was making up the front page to carry Mr. Gordon on the front page on that subject.

Now, sometimes, the normal news judgment that a senior editor might make, can be impinged upon by his knowledge of what the publisher believes to be of enormous importance. Now, that question is of enormous importance and perhaps the most explicit statements on that general subject by public figures, were made by Mr. Gordon.

So, I do not suggest what I say critically, but I merely say that these are the factors which are at work, for good or for ill within a newspaper, predicated on the knowledge of the senior editor related to the attitude, ideas, philosophy, political biases or whatever of the publisher of a newspaper—and they inevitably have some effect.

Senator Everett: Let me interject there. You say that we suffer from liberal...

Mr. Charles Templeton: I didn't say that, sir.

Senator Everett: Editorially.

The Chairman: I don't think he used the verb suffer.

Mr. Charles Templeton: No.

The Chairman: I think he said we have a preponderance of liberals.

Mr. Charles Templeton: I raised it as a question to the Committee: why is it that in journalism you have an almost total preponderance of liberals and an almost total absence of conservatives?

Senator Everett: But I suppose in publishers there is preponderance of conservatives and an absence of liberals.

Mr. Charles Templeton: I don't think I would necessarily—I don't think I would agree with that as a matter of fact.

Senator Everett: You wouldn't?

Mr. Charles Templeton: No. It would certainly not be so in the Toronto Star.

Senator Everett: My question then is this. In this unspoken editorial control more the realization by the senior editor in the middle management group what the publisher wants or is it more what the editors want?

Mr. Charles Templeton: No...

Senator Everett: Or is it not related to what the publisher really wants at all?

Mr. Charles Templeton: I think where the normal news judgment of an editor is touched by factors other than that judgment—and it is touched in terms of his treatment of a story or his treatment of a subject—if that treatment is touched, it is touched I think more often than not by the recognition that the publisher or the boss has certain views and those views are not forgotten. They are in somewhere behind the frontal lobe as he goes to work on the news on a given day.

Senator Everett: Is the only prejudice the editor has, the bosses' view?

Mr. Charles Templeton: Heavens no.

Senator Everett: Are those his only prejudices?

Mr. Charles Templeton: No, sir. That is why I said to you earlier that total objectivity is the impossible dream. Every reporter who writes a story about anybody brings a degree of subjectivity to that story. And every editor who handles a story is more or less subjectively dealing with that story. Every treatment of every story in every newspaper has had subjective judgment made on it and they are not properly described as truly objective. There is an attempt to be objective by good journalists and I feel most of them seek very zealously to be objective.

Senator Everett: Is this interference, this unspoken editorial control exaggerated? I am not talking about the competition situation or the lack of competition. I am talking about a chain ownership?

Mr. Charles Templeton: I would think not.

Senator Everett: Just one last question. I think you seem to think that one of the solutions that we should seek is competition and another is disclosure of information—ownership information. We have had two suggestions along these lines, one from Mr. Ryan in which he said that there should be community participation in the ownership of a newspaper and one of the ways to solve the chain ownership problem was to have community participation say up to 50 per cent. Would you comment on that?

Mr. Charles Templeton: I fear my comment may not be very useful because I haven't really thought very seriously about the question. I would make an immediate comment if you will accept it as that and that is that I would doubt that it would make much difference because I think that the determination of the way a newspaper is going to be, or the kind of newspaper that it is going to be, is determined primarily if you have an active publisher—and a paper is lucky if it does—by the publisher and by the senior editorial staff. I think there would be interesting suggestions that would come through that participation and there might be, for instance, a calling to task or points may be raised but I would think, essentially, it wouldn't make very much concrete difference. That I am afraid is a tentative opinion.

Senator Everett: So it would be fair to say in your mind, that there really isn't much to fear from chain ownership as long as there is competition within a community and as long as there is some sort of disclosure of that ownership?

Mr. Charles Templeton: By and large I think it may be said as fundamental that chain ownership brings more to journalism than it may withdraw from it. I think the economics of news coverage are a very real problem. They certainly are in television and they certainly are in the newspaper business. And if more dollars are available, as I think Charles Lynch I think was saying as I read him reported in the Globe and Mail, I would think there is much to be said for the fact that the capacity to cover, and therefore giving you the ability to know, is enhanced by the availability of dollars. There are more dollars available by and large within a chain than there are in individual operations.

The coverage would tend therefore it seems to me to be broader.

The Chairman: Could we return for a moment—I know Senator Hays would like to ask a question—but just to your conservatives and liberals and I would like to ask you two questions.

Number one, from your knowledge of the press gallery—I know you have never been a member—but you have had people out of the press gallery responsible to you on occasions. Would you say that the press gallery is peopled with liberals as opposed to conservatives?

Mr. Charles Templeton: Mr. Davey, I am not in any way avoiding your question but the people in the press gallery change a great deal. I am not that familiar with many of them. I know a number of them, but I would say, that of those I know, the same general statement that I made would apply.

The Chairman: Well, let me—because according to the rules of the game we play you can't ask us questions—let me ask you the question.

If we were to concede your point that more members of the working press are liberals than conservatives, why do you think that that is the case?

Mr. Charles Templeton: I made a note or two on this. I think perhaps the reason is because a small "I" liberal tends to be committed almost by definition to the need to change society. A conservative tends to be committed by definition to the conserving of values within a society. I don't suggest that there is an unwillingness to change but the willingness to change is less than it is in the liberals more often than not and I am using the small "I" here so that there is no confusion.

I would argue entirely out of context that it is also true in terms of a large "L" liberal but that is not the matter.

Senator McElman: You better watch that.

Mr. Charles Templeton: Yes. I will withdraw that comment, sir. It might muddy the waters. The small "I" liberal seems to be committed to the idea that society needs to be changed and sometimes perhaps this has led to undue emphasis on the efforts to change society in the media—whether those efforts are too violent or otherwise. I think this may be one reason why the press has on occasion and I wouldn't argue they have done so on a broad scale—but have on occasion, given more attention to an objection to what is eventuating in a society than the objection may have legitimately merited.

I think that perhaps would be true because of the desire to change and/or reform society, which is part of the intellectual makeup of a small "I" liberal. The conservative I don't think feels the same kind of passion in that area. Therefore, he does not thrust himself immediately into the area where he is a communicator in terms of the news.

The Chairman: Well, following up then on that answer, I would like to return to Senator Everett's question. I believe it was Senator Everett who thinks then that most publishers in Canada are progressive reformers?

Mr. Charles Templeton: No, I wouldn't say that. I would say unfortunately not enough of them are. I would say there are a number who very definitely are. I would say that where they are, I think that would serve the community well.

I am not one who believes that because a newspaper espouses a cause, the cause is therefore espoused by the people. There is plenty of evidence, when newspapers trouble themselves, for instance, to make slate of candidates in political elections, that they are notoriously unable to sway the general public to buy their slates.

The Chairman: Well, what about the comment then, which is often made, that the publishers and the owners of the media in Canada are all the same kind of people anyway. Whether they are big "L" Liberals or big "C" Conservatives or, as doesn't seem to be the case, new democrats. They are all the same kind of people; they all belong to an establishment. This is a point made eloquently by Desmond Morton in an article which appeared, I think in Forum. I don't know whether you are familiar with that article or not...

Mr. Charles Templeton: Well, I don't believe it. I would just simply illustrate my statement, that I don't believe it, by drawing your attention to Toronto. Would you say that Beland Honderick is like John Bassett? Or that John Bassett is like Mr. Cooper? I think these are three absolutely different kinds of people in character, in background, in attitude, in philosophical outlook, in political alliance, in virtually every way in which you might categorize a man.

I would say that you couldn't find three more different people although they do have certain things in common.

The Chairman: Well, one of the things which concerns me in the course of our study—and I shouldn't say concerns me, that is not right—I think that it is quite understandable—that there are repeated references by witnesses and by senators and by the press and so on to the situation in Toronto.

Let us go outside of Toronto, let us look across the country. Will you say that same disparity prevails? Would you say that that same disparity prevails as related to publishers?

Mr. Charles Templeton: My judgment on this is partial or my information on this is partial. I would say that it wouldn't obtain to the same extent across the country as it does in Toronto but would obtain.

Senator Hays: Mr. Templeton, do you feel that there should be a national code of ethics for the mass media in the grey areas where things are published that some newspapers feel are fair game. I mentioned the reporting of the case against Mr. Tommy Douglas' daughter in California.

Mr. Charles Templeton: Do you mean a code of ethics that speaks to such questions as to whether or not who will cover a story?

Senator Hays: Report certain stories or cover a story, yes.

Mr. Charles Templeton: No, I do not think so. I think it is in the public's interest to report the news and if the news has about it aspects, which to some people are not good, not too desirable, I don't think that that is a judgment that ought to be a conditioning judgment on an editor. I think he must concern himself with the public good in that he exercises his sole control or some control or how he treats a story or the play he gives a story.

Perhaps I can illustrate that by a specific story. There was a case in Hamilton, Ontario about five or six years ago of a rather unsavoury trial where the details were something less than the kind of reading you would like your 13-year old daughter, to use the hypothetical person, to read. Some papers played it to the hilt and put it on the front page and elaborated it enormously. Other papers in my judgment—quite properly—carried the story because it is a part of society, and you are not the judge of society, you are the reporter of society; but the way the story was played was the important matter and I think this is a judgment that has to be made by people who are making those judgments.

For instance, it is a common practice that suicides are not reported by newspapers. I rarely is not observed except where there is a factor beyond that. Then an individual judgment will be made by the persons who are putting out the newspaper as to the wisdom or the lack of wisdom of carrying the story. There are checks and balances in our society. If a newspaper in its approach to its job involves itself in a kind of shall we say, judicious pandering to a certain segment of society, I think the other people in that society will begin to make judgments about the newspaper which will relate to how many people buy it; and when people don't buy it the advertising suffers and the advertising is the revenue on which newspapers operate more than sales.

I don't think that a code of ethics would be a practical thing. I think these must be judgments made by the publisher and the editor and that the public will make their judgments on those judgments.

Senator Hays: Then do you feel that a newspaper in its own group should have its own code of ethics?

Mr. Charles Templeton: A stated code of ethics?

Senator Hays: Well, a certain code of ethics. I have used this example before—where a man is charged with rape and it is on the front page and three weeks later he is found innocent. Do you think there should be a code of ethics for his innocence to be published in the same spot in the same newspaper in the same size and that sort of thing?

Mr. Charles Templeton: I would think that that—I think what you have touched on there is a very difficult problem within the newspaper business.

Senator Hays: I know it is a grey area.

Mr. Charles Templeton: No, I think, sir, it is a very specific and worthwhile point, if you will allow me. That is that almost never does a retraction or the ultimate statements about a story that may have received enormous publicity in its original version or beginning—almost never is the retraction or the subsequent story given the same prominence.

I would think that all publishers should be seriously concerned about a question like that. I think that many an editor has felt his own conscience troubled by virtue of the fact that what you say is often the fact. It is also a fact that people, who have sometimes been injured by newspaper stories but not injured at the point of their being able to institute libel suits or a suit against the newspaper, have very little recourse in this area.

As I said earlier it is hard to fight City Hall. It is harder to fight a newspaper; it is harder to fight a television station if you feel an injustice has been done to you. Many people quite warrantably feel that an injustice has been done to them. There have been many cases sometimes where an injustice has been done but I do not think that the media pay enough attention to righting those injustices or correcting any misapprehension that they may have in the first place where it originated.

Senator Hays: If they don't, does it not then follow that a certain code of ethics within the newspaper...

Mr. Charles Templeton: It does indeed. I wouldn't like to see it codified.

Senator Hays: Would you like to see the libel law given a little more elbow room than?

Mr. Charles Templeton: I think that is a very complex question, Senator.

Senator Hays: If you libel someone...

Mr. Charles Templeton: If the libel laws are broadened there is also the danger that you will diminish the amount of news you will get out of fear.

There are some among the publishers who are very timid at this point. There are some who write who are very courageous and I think that any extension of it might have deleterious effects as well as such benefits that might be gained.

Senator Prowse: How do you measure damage to reputation in dollars?

Mr. Charles Templeton: You don't but the court sometimes tries to.

The Chairman: I would like to ask you a question, Mr. Templeton and then I will go to Senator Prowse. This is a question which you should certainly feel free not to answer but I would be curious to know—you mentioned editorial interference during your career as the editor of Maclean's. I would be curious to know how quickly after you joined Maclean's was it apparent to you that there was going to be this kind of interference and secondly how was it translated to you? How did you become aware of it? If those are questions you would rather not answer I think the Committee will understand. On the other hand, the answer might be helpful to us.

Mr. Charles Templeton: Well, very soon after I joined Maclean's. If you will allow me when I resigned from Maclean's...

The Chairman: Are those fair questions?

Mr. Charles Templeton: Yes, I think so. However, you can understand having gone by an unpleasant episode one does not wish to necessarily dwell on it, or I don't want to stand as the accuser of a great institution which Maclean's is. I would suggest to you if it would be useful to you that when I resigned, I very specifically stated the reasons why and the form of editorial interference in a four-page memorandum. I would be pleased to supply that...

The Chairman: Well, we have that on file but I just wondered if you could elaborate on that.

Mr. Charles Templeton: Well, I have nothing more to say. It was quite clear. You pay no attention much of the time to editorial interference. If you are a serious journalist and you believe in what you are doing you pay no attention and I paid no attention to the first 30 or 40 things which were passed to me by way of a memorandum or a comment. I just went ahead and did what I thought I should do, whether wisely or not. I have done that, not only in Maclean's but other places where I have been asked to do things which I didn't think was in the best interest of the publications or the broadcasting enterprise to which I was related. I just didn't do it. I just let it go by.

It however became so serious a problem that I brought it to a confrontation and as that confrontation did not bring a change, then I felt there was no option but to resign and very reluctantly I resigned noisily. I resigned noisily because Maclean's is too great an institution to suffer from unwarranted interference in the publication of the magazine. Too many good people have done too many things there and I felt it was necessary to say that if it couldn't be achieved during my editorship—perhaps it could be achieved in some subsequent editorship.

The Chairman: Senator Prowse?

Senator Prowse: Mr. Templeton, how serious is the attempted pressure or attempted influence by advertisers to influence the news or for people who are interested in the profit of the thing to be concerned about the interests of the advertisers in dealing with the news?

Mr. Charles Templeton: Speaking to that question initially—would you mind if I read that paragraph and then speak to that question?

The Chairman: No, go right ahead.

Mr. Charles Templeton: It is my observation that the influence of advertisers on the news and on television's so-called controversial programming, diminishes in direct proportion to the economic strength of the news media. In other words, journalistic courage sometimes has a direct relationship to financial solvency. I have been fortunate in that I have worked for strong companies who were able to resist any attempts that may be made to influence what that company does. There are attempts from time to time. I would not have it misunderstood by saying constantly, regularly, and repetitively; but from time to time there are attempts not only by advertisers who have a stake in what may or may not be recorded—a stake which is important to them and in their judgment is important. It is also sometimes true I regret to say, that advertising people within a company will speak to you about something which is deleterious to their client and they want of course to have their client happy.

But to give you some instances—we did a series of programs on CTV which related to a major national event and in that series of programs we were quite critical of some of the things that were happening. One of the regular sponsors of that program thought to get us to state the case perhaps more placidly. Interestingly enough it was rejected out of hand by Mr. Chercover, who is now president of the network, and by myself.

We made a film on Canadians in Hollywood, in the course of which there was an expletive in the nature of an obscenity voiced by one of the people. It was suggested by the advertiser who was thinking about buying the program—and there was a lot of money tied up in the program—not only to me but also to the program manager and the advertising people that we should delete it. In my view it was fundamental to what was happening at the moment in the film and so I refused to do so. The company never challenged me and never suggested anything else and I stood with it.

On CFRB I do a daily radio program called Dialogue with Mr. Pierre Burton. We say some very rough things from time to time. There have been occasions when advertiser who felt they had been touched have called up and asked for a transcript of the show and the station says in effect, "Go to Hell" at the time and in those words.

There are sometimes the beginnings of pressures—if pressures is the word—or at least the suggestion that it would be better if it were not done that way and done in another way. I would say that in strong organizations that these pressures are ineffectual and insignificant. In a company which is close to the vine economically, in a company whose existence may be dependent in large part on a major advertiser—I am talking now about the more difficult task of the small company: the small newspaper, the small radio or television station—I cannot give you chapter and verse so you will understand that I am not stating anything specific here—but I would think that it would be extraordinarily hard to fly in the face of a very heavy advertiser because it has to do with your existence.

It is not difficult to make a rationale which says your existence is more important than a single issue and that is not an unreasonable thing to do in my view. But to repeat, journalistic courage sometimes has a direct relationship to financial solvency.

Senator Prowse: Sometimes in the weaker situation you are talking about do you know any instances or would you think that perhaps the overconcern with their weak financial position might blind the publisher of the paper in those circumstances to the fact that the advertiser really needed him anyway?

Mr. Charles Templeton: That the advertiser needs him?

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Mr. Charles Templeton: Well, maybe he does.

Senator Prowse: But sometimes they forget that fact.

Mr. Charles Templeton: That is correct.

Senator Prowse: The other question comes and it is not quite the same thing but it still has to do with influence. You were talking to Senator Everett about claims and by this I take it you were thinking solely in terms of link newspapers that had common services. Suppose you had one of those big diversified conglomerates today that then starts to acquire newspaper chains and they have very large economic interests that could be something that also affects the welfare of the country and I will state an example.

I don't know whether General Dynamics is but suppose we had the General Dynamics Corporation in Canada and they were providing a very large part of the segment of our economy with things, employment and everything else and they were to acquire a newspaper, say a chain of newspapers as well. Would you think that that would be a potentially dangerous situation or not? Would you class that along with your general statement that chains would be a good thing?

Mr. Charles Templeton: I would think that where a newspaper is owned by a conglomerate which has very large interests which is its responsibility to protect and to enhance, I would think, that there would then arise a potential problem in terms of the zeal in which their newspaper might pursue certain questions which would have a deleterious effect on that conglomerate.

Senator Prowse: Now, the second thing was, or the third question was this. We heard from a group of journalists last night and in their brief they included a very brief description of a contract which the editorial workers—and this includes all the news people of the Stern Publication in Germany—they have a contract now whereby a publication can't be sold unless the sale to the particular purchaser is indicated to them and then they vote. Unless that particular sale is approved by two-thirds—I think this was the figure—of the employees or the board who were elected by the employees—that sale can't then be completed.

Senator Everett: Perhaps I might be able to read it.

Senator Prowse: Would you read it, please.

Senator Everett: The charter declares that no editor or staff member can be compelled to write anything against his own conscience and the charter goes on to specify that the board must be consulted by the management on any change in ownership and on the employment of an editor-in-chief who cannot be dismissed if the board disapproves such action by a two-thirds majority. An editor-in-chief is empowered to make personnel decisions in the editorial department but he cannot make changes in managing editors, department heads or political contributors without a two-thirds vote of approval by the board.

A seven-man editorial board has been established which is elected annually by secret ballots. A new election can be called if 30 members of the editorial staff request it. All staff members are eligible to serve and everyone has a right to vote if he has been a member for more than half a year.

Mr. Charles Templeton: Well, that is news to me.

Senator Prowse: Would that be helpful in maintaining independence?

Mr. Charles Templeton: Will you understand that I am saying this fresh from hearing it. My first reaction would be that there would be all kinds of problems related to it but certainly it sounds to me as though it certainly would be a method whereby editorial freedom would unquestionably be preserved.

Now, that is just a snap judgment.

The Chairman: I would like to ask you this. You mentioned the program you do on CFRB and I know you have a big audience. I know you have done television programs which have been highly rated. You were at the Star which I guess has the biggest circulation in Canada and Maclean's and so on. How do you compare—I was going to put the question, which media communicates most effectively—but obviously the answer I would assume is that different media communicates most effectively to different groups of people—but how would you compare the ability of each media or contrast the ability of each media to communicate?

Mr. Charles Templeton: Well, in order for any media to do its job well it needs to recognize its own strength and its weaknesses and they all have their strength and weaknesses. The great advantage that radio has is that radio is the breaker of news today. It is so simple. All you do is turn on a microphone and announce it. It takes no preparation other than a piece of wire copy or a phone call by a reporter or what have you.

Stories are broken today by radio and this advantage lies almost entirely with them although television is beginning to challenge it by spot bulletins.

Radio's capacities in the area of news remains essentially what it was but I think it is not as impactful as our newspapers or television.

The effect in television in communicating the information of course has about three aspects to it. The first is what is called actual programming. In other words the news is being reported as you watch the man walk on the moon. There is no one in between you, there is no one interpreting it. There is the news, you are the observer and you will make your own judgment about that event.

The same thing is true of the riots in Chicago. There were factors that relate to what you were seeing that you were not aware of, but you see the event and you will make your own judgment as indeed a reporter will.

Now, reporters will subsequently come on to talk to you about it, comment on it or give you information to which you could not be privy, but actuality news has the advantage that you are there and there is no one between you and the news. It has the disadvantage of the fact that the actuality is never only what it seems to be but it is a great deal more than it seems to be.

The impact of television is enormous. It is not a matter of fact that you have Video plus Audio 1 equals 2. It is Video 1 plus Audio 1 equals 5. All the emotional and other factors are at work in that presentation.

Television news also seems to have an authenticity which every survey on the subject reveals beyond other media. In other words, each survey has indicated that people believe television news more than they believe newspaper news or radio news or magazine news or whatever other media you may be speaking about.

In my judgment this is an error on the part of the public. It is predicated I think on the belief that they say, "I heard Mr. Benton say that" "I heard with my own ears Mr. Benton say what he said about that." But to come to the point, the public is not aware of the fact that what they heard was a part of what Mr. Benton said; that rather than an editor's pencil touching it the film editor touched it. I can be—I don't suggest it is—let us be clear on this, it can be so rearranged that it comes out in such a way that it may not be in anyway an accurate representation of what he said although the listener believes it is what he said because he heard him say it.

Therefore, television news is the more credible with the general public. I don't think it should be any more credible. I think it should be equally credible, good television news coverage with good newspaper coverage.

The newspaper gives you more. The newspaper gives you more news than any other media. It gives you more news in greater depth than any other media. Except where television mounts what is called the special makes some major treatment of a specific subject or does major covering of a subject. Each of them has their own advantage, each of them have their own influence.

There isn't much doubt according to the survey but what today most people get their news from television and most people believe television.

The Chairman: Well, which medium does Charles Templeton enjoy working in most?

Mr. Charles Templeton: The one I am working in at the moment. Quite seriously.

The Chairman: Which is?

Mr. Charles Templeton: Well, I do a television show once a week and I do a radio show five days a week and so on but I didn't mean that in that sense. I mean that I have no preference for the media.

The Chairman: The one at the moment?

Mr. Charles Templeton: Yes.

Senator Everett: Mr. Templeton, the United States seems to have a history of creating personalities that have a full-time job of commenting on the news and trying to interpret the news to the public. When newspapers were the main mode of communication, there were men like Lippman, Pearson, Alsop, Weston and I suppose they were pretty powerful but it wasn't a very persuasive power. It wasn't a very persuasive power or at least didn't seem to be a persuasive power. But now we are into television and men like Cronkite, Lawrence and Smith and Reynolds who seems to have enormous power in interpreting the news to the American people and of course this is what Mr. Agnew appears to be worried about; and I suppose in this country there are men like Mr. Berton, Mr. Lynch and yourself who come as close to the American counterparts. But your views haven't been too—maybe in Toronto when you and Mr. Berton over CFRB which had nearly 50 per cent of the audience and you might have a great deal of influence but should we attempt to prevent people like you from getting too much continuous coverage on television giving your views and your interpretations to the public?

Mr. Charles Templeton: No. I think what needs to be done—television has yet to find its counterpart of newspapers in two particular areas that seem to be very important.

One of the areas in which television has not found the counterpart of newspapers is that there is no way for the public, no fundamental way for the public to express its view on what television does, no direct way. The newspaper has the letters to the editor.

Television needs to find the letters to the editor format so that the public can respond to that which the television station or network is saying. It seems to me that this is one of the very great needs that television needs to address itself to and some thought has been given in that direction.

The deficiency, in my judgment, on television is that you do not get in this country a great deal of personally expressed opinions on the news and I would ask you, sir, if you could think of programs where you do in this country. You don't. You do get some in radio and so on...

Senator Everett: Well, I am thinking of—I don't know what the CBC call it but following the 11 o'clock news.

Mr. Charles Templeton: Viewpoint?

Senator Everett: Yes.

Mr. Charles Templeton: But that is not the viewpoint of any broadcaster. Those are independent people who are hired on a nightly basis, all of whom are individual citizens of no particular avowal to a cause or philosophy or a political leaning.

Senator Everett: That is right. That seems to be the attitude that the CBC takes. They do not seem to be following the crowd in creating giant personalities like Templeton who will be able to influence broad sectors of the public. They are going to allow various or a wide-range of people to come and comment on the news.

Mr. Charles Templeton: Let me speak to that point. For instance, the thing that Mr. Berton and I do every day not only in Toronto but it is syndicated across the country as a matter of fact, it is clearly identified as being the individual opinion of two men. I think that any time that any editorializing is done, that in effect is editorializing, but it must be done by those individuals. In a newspaper there is an editorial page under a masthead where a man or a group of men say what they believe about the news or about government or about senators or about whatever. It is their privilege and it is specified as being an opinion and the names of those responsible for it sit there on the same page.

Across the way opposite the editorial page or page 7, as it often is, are bylined articles with specific points of view put forward. Now, the same is true—I don't want to act offensively about this but perhaps I shall, in what Mr. Berton and I do. That is that it is clearly understood that it is the opinion of the person speaking that it is no more important than you hold that person to be important.

It is subject to challenge one from the other at the same time or challenged by the viewer in a thousand different directions and I think frankly that this is not a bad thing in a society. And I think as a matter of fact that that program, if it has any virtue—I think the primary virtue of that program, is that about 60 per cent of the time you hear and disagree. We have a rule never to state anything we do not believe. We never take a side just to be in opposition.

Sixty per cent of the time you hear two sides—there may be twenty—but you hear two sides related to that question. I think it stimulates thoughts on it that oftentimes are not discussed and I think it serves a useful purpose. To forbid it—I don't speak personally now—I think would be a mistake.

Senator Prowse: The one question has to do with the question of a decreasing credibility which we hear so much about. It is rather my opinion—and I am just going to ask you whether you think I am right or not—that a great deal of this credibility gap between the media and the reader is the result of the fact that so much happens that only a portion of it can be printed or reported by any means. Therefore there has to be selection and there is also the natural fact that two people looking at a single incident will almost invariably carry away different ideas.

Now, is this where the problem lies or is there something more serious?

Mr. Charles Templeton: I think that is one of the reasons. I think another of the reasons for what I suppose you can call the credibility gap between the public and the newsman has to do with the kind of news we have been having the last number of years.

Our society is in a state of flux and it is fairly fundamental. The changes which are taking place today are enormous and they are profoundly disquieting to great groups of people and to individual people. The reporting of it has, let me say, not been spared as a consequence. I think people who believe that that reporting has been out of proportion grow resentful of the press. That initial resentment makes for some questioning about the judgments which are also hinging on all of the other things which are carried by the media—by way of news, or features or treatments.

Senator Prowse: Is there anything the media can do to correct this situation arising from either of these cases?

Mr. Charles Templeton: I think it is true to say that the people who are in charge of the media are constantly conscious of the fact that they exist by virtue of the public acceptance of them. And if they begin to see in any one of a number of ways—by measuring the rating of a television program, the purchase of a newspaper, the number of letters to the editor which begin to flow, the comments they hear in their own social connection—rejections of things they may be doing are heard. Now, you hear those all the time but they change in terms of their ebb and flow and you exist by virtue of acceptance as a commercial commodity which would be true of everything except the CBC.

You must be very concerned about these things and I think it is true to say that these things are scrutinized rather carefully by those who do own or control the media.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Templeton, on behalf of the Committee I want to thank you for coming here this morning—I have some idea of how busy you are—and for finding the time to prepare yourself so well; I apologize that perhaps not all of our questions were as loaded as those you receive on a daily basis from Mr. Pierre Berton.

I should say to you that Mr. Berton is going to have equal time before the Committee as he will be coming after the new year.

As I said when I introduced you, I think you have a unique position in the media structure of Canada. I think your views have been valuable and on behalf of the Committee I thank you.

The Committee adjourned.

Upon resuming at 2.30 p.m.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, this afternoon we are to receive the brief, and representatives from The Thomson Newspapers Limited.

Sitting on my immediate right is the Executive Vice President and Managing Director of The Thomson Newspapers Limited, Mr. St. Clair McCabe.

Mr. McCabe: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: On his immediate right Miss Margaret L. Hamilton, Vice-President Thomson Newspapers Limited, and on my immediate left is Mr. John A. Torry, Q.C., general counsel, Thomson Newspapers Limited.

If I may say to our guests, as requested, you received your brief some three weeks ago; in fact, more than three weeks ago. It has been circulated to the Senators, presumably it has been read and studied, and now we are, I think, ready to turn to an oral statement; and it is my understanding that Mr. Torry is going to make the preliminary statement. You are ree, John, to summarize, expand, explain; indeed anything you may wish.

Now, following that I understand Mr. McCabe would like to make a much shorter statement, and that certainly is permissible as well. Following those two introductory statements the Senators will proceed to ask you questions on the contents of your brief, on the comments you might make, and anything else that is on their minds if that is satisfactory.

Mr. John A. Tory, Q.C.: Mr. Chairman, and Honourable Senators: As Senator Davey has indicated I am the General Counsel for Thomson Newspapers Limited; however it is not in that capacity that I am appearing here today but rather as a Director of Thomson Newspapers Limited, and as solicitor for Mr. K. R. Thomson and members of the Thomson family who, as was pointed out in the company's brief have a substantial interest in the company. I am also a trustee of various Thomson family trusts, and member of the Boards of Directors of other Thomson companies including Thomson Newspapers Inc., a subsidiary of Thomson Newspapers Limited which publishes newspapers in the United States.

Mr. St. Clair McCabe, the Executive Vice-President and Managing Director of Thomson Newspaper, is the senior officer of these companies and responsible for their operations. Mr. McCabe has spent all his life in the newspaper business. He joined the Galt Reporter in 1937 where he was employed in various capacities including that of general manager until 1950 at which time he moved to the company's head office in Toronto. He was succeeded as general manager of the Galt Reporter by Mr. K. R. Thomson.

Miss. Margaret Hamilton also worked for the Galt Reporter for a number of years, and in 1954 she succeeded Mr. K. R. Thomson as general manager of this newspaper. In the following year she was transferred to the company's head office in Toronto to become executive assistant to the general manager. She was appointed Vice-President of the company in 1969.

Mr. K. R. Thomson, the President and controlling shareholder of Thomson Newspapers Limited, moved to England with his family several years ago where he has assumed the position of Chairman of Times newspapers Limited which publishes the Times of London, and the Sunday Times.

The duties of that position and his desire to familiarize himself with the other family interests in the United Kingdom have restricted his participation in the affairs of the Canadian company in recent years; however, he has remained in close touch with the North American operations, and I believe ultimately he intends to return to live in Canada.

I would like first of all to give you a brief outline of the current operations of The Thomson Newspapers Limited. The Company operates 28 daily newspapers in Canada; however because all of these newspapers, with one possible exception are purely local in character, they account for only about 8 per cent of the total Canadian daily newspaper circulation. The company also publishes 15 weekly newspapers in Canada—The Vernon News, a weekly newspaper published in Vernon, B. C. was acquired in November of this year after the submission of the company's brief. Twenty-eight daily and 15 weekly newspapers are published in 42 communities located in 7 provinces.

A list of their circulations and dates of acquisition by the group is given in Appendix "A" to the brief. The weekly newspapers were acquired or established with a view to their eventual conversion to dailies. Of the Company's 28 daily newspapers, 9 were acquired as weeklies and have been converted to dailies in line with the Company's policy of progressively developing its properties.

In every case the Company's daily newspapers are the only ones published in the cities or towns in which they appear. With the exception of the two newspapers in Charlotte-town, each of the Company's daily newspapers was alone in its field at the time it was acquired by the Company. As pointed out in the Company's brief, this is primarily a reflection of the fact that very few centres in North America are now served by more than one local newspaper.

It has been suggested that the prevalence of "one-newspaper" cities is disadvantageous to Canadian society, on the ground that two newspapers are better than one due to their ability to provide diversity of viewpoint. While this may be theoretically true, two factors should be noted. Firstly, the choice in smaller communities such as those in which the Company's newspapers are published would, in practice, be between one strong, profitable and hence independent newspaper and two weak and dependent ones. Secondly, no newspaper today has anything approaching a monopoly of information or opinion in any local area. Competition in supplying information and opinion and in carrying advertising is provided by metropolitan and regional newspapers, magazine, radio and television and weekly newspapers. Details of this competition are given in the Company's brief.

You will be hearing this evening from publishers of two Thomson newspapers selected by your Committee who, like all publishers of Thomson newspapers, have full responsibility for the gathering, editing and presentation of news and information for their own newspapers. In addition, written briefs have been submitted by these two publishers and also by publishers of other Thomson newspapers at the invitation of the Committee. As you are no doubt aware from having read the briefs submitted, the basic philosophy of the Company is that the publishers of the individual newspapers and their editorial staffs should be completely independent of any inference from the Thomson head office in matters of news presentation and editorial policy.

In fact, it is fair to say that one of the fundamental ingredients in the success of Thomson Newspapers has been its insistence that the publishers of the individual newspapers should themselves decide how best to inform and serve the communities in which the newspapers are published.

The other ingredient which is basic to the Company's success has been its policy of making its individual newspapers independent and financially strong. A newspaper which is unprofitable or which has insufficient staff, or inadequate facilities and equipment, leads a precarious existence, often unable to increase the number of its readers and dependent for financial support upon various interests, some hostile to a free and unfettered dissemination of news and opinion.

The Company believes that editorial independence and public service lead to a financially strong newspaper. The Company's policy has been constantly to improve the quality of its newspapers and the Company believes it has been successful in so doing.

Since 1948, the Company has made capital expenditures on its Canadian newspaper properties totalling over $13 million. It has replaced the buildings and much of the machinery and equipment used to produce over half its daily newspapers and made substantial renovations to the plant and equipment of most of the others.

To further improve the quality of its newspapers, the Company makes available to them a variety of centrally provided services such as columns dealing with provincial, national and international affairs, and news stories emanating from Ottawa and Toronto of local interest to the communities served by Thomson newspapers. Also, a wide range of feature material is provided. Each Thomson newspaper is, of course, entirely free to publish or not publish any of the material supplied.

To train staff in news presentation and the development of feature material the Company provides the publishers of its newspapers with training material prepared by experts in this area and makes available to them the services of on-staff consultants with considerable editorial experience.

In addition, the Company conducts periodic measurements of the news content of its newspapers to help ensure that sufficient stories and pictures are carried. The Company's brief contains comparisons of the number of news columns carried by Thomson newspapers in Canada and similar circulation newspapers in Canada and the United States. Comparisons are also made with United States newspapers as to numbers of pages printed, news and editorial expenses, numbers of editorial employees and salaries of editorial employees.

In each case the Company's newspapers compare favourably with their Canadian and United States counterparts. Information as to the average salary paid to Canadian editorial employees of non-Thomson Canadian newspapers of comparable size is not available but the Thomson editorial employees in Canada enjoy an average salary within $90 per year of their United States counterparts despite generally higher salary ranges in the United States.

The Company recognizes that production of a good newspaper is to a large extent dependent upon the quality of staff. The Company follows two important policies regarding staffing. One is to make no changes in the staff of a newspaper upon its acquisition by the Company, and the second is to provide the best possible training for its staff. The Company believes that the average length of service of its employees provides an indication of their level of experience and competence and of their awareness that the Thomson group provides attractive opportunities for career advancement in the newspaper business. Publishers of Thomson newspapers in Canada currently have an average length of service with the Company or a predecessor of over 24 years while the average length of service of the editors is over 16 years. The average length of service of all Canadian staff employed by the Company, including female clerical staff, is 9 years.

Perhaps the most objective measurement of quality of a newspaper is whether people buy that newspaper instead of a competitive newspaper. Examples are given in the Company's brief of the increased share of the market which Thomson newspapers have been able to obtain in various areas over competing metropolitan and regional newspapers. The Company recognizes that its newspapers must serve the people in the communities in which they are published, or perish. And it is, after all, the people who should be the judge.

Perhaps it would be appropriate now to say a few words about the trend toward group ownership of newspapers. In common with other businesses, the owner of a newspaper may have a number of reasons for deciding to sell it. In the first place, he may wish to retire and none of his family may be interested in continuing it. Secondly, he may feel that he does not have sufficient managerial or technical knowledge to continue to operate the newspaper. Thirdly, he may not have sufficient capital to provide the plant and equipment required to develop the newspaper so that it may adequately serve the needs of a growing community. I mentioned earlier that last month the Company acquired the Vernon News, a bi-weekly newspaper which has served Vernon, British Columbia for the past 78 years. The Company plans to convert this newspaper to daily publication in 1970. In announcing the sale to his readers the former owner made the following statement:

"Expert techniques and strong financing are the urgent requirements in giving birth to a daily. Thomson Newspapers will be in a position to fill both demands."

Lastly, and perhaps the most important reason why the owner of a newspaper may decide to sell it, is to pay or provide for death duties. It is my view that the trend towards the owners of small businesses selling them to larger corporations will be accelerated by the recently announced proposals for tax reform if these proposals are implemented. This is because the combined liabilities for death duties and capital gains taxes in respect of privately held businesses will make it increasingly difficult for such businesses to be passed on from one generation to another. Also, the Government proposes to remove certain tax advantages presently enjoyed by small businesses.

Having decided to sell the owner of a newspaper has two basic alternatives:

Firstly, he can sell it to a newspaper publisher who is large enough to be able to pay a fair price and still have money left for development of the newspaper. Or, secondly, he can sell it to some organization totally unconnected with newspaper publishing—a grocery chain, a brewery, a bank, a newsprint manufacturer or some other organization likely to have the money and interest in controlling an organ of communication, information and opinion. He may very well question whether such an organization will have the knowledge and ability necessary so that his newspaper will be able to continue to serve the community in the manner which it did under his proprietorship. This, of course, is a consideration of prime importance to a man who has spent most of his life building up his newspaper to provide the highest possible standard of service to its community. Accordingly, it is likely that he will seek out a newspaper publishing organization with a reputation for running good newspapers.

In conclusion, I would like to read a few extracts from a letter written by Mr. C. J. Rowland, the Publisher of the Penticton Herald, to the Chairman of this Committee. This letter was written entirely of Mr. Rowland's own volition, and a copy sent to Mr. McCabe. I think it serves to counter many of the irresponsible and unsubstantiated statements made by persons such as Douglas Fisher who, for their own personal reasons, have set themselves up as critics of Thomson Newspapers. Perhaps I should mention in passing that Mr. Fisher himself admitted to this Committee that he never reads any of the Thomson newspapers, and I would therefore suggest to you that he is in a very poor position to judge their quality.

Reading now from Mr. Rowland's letter he says:

"This letter sums up hopefully in a short outline the convictions of my own 30 years experience in an admittedly modest sized market and newspaper, but one which duplicated so many times across the nation, should justify these few paragraphs, and the interest of your important Committee.

"My experience briefly is this: for many years I was the sole owner and publisher of the Penticton Herald. Since 1956 when I sold to the Thomson Organization I have remained as the publisher. I have thus been able to study both phases of ownership. For the first seven years of the new ownership there were no profits whatsoever. Losses in some years were formidable. From 1964 onwards modest net profits have accumulated, but not until this year could it be said that the total net gain in operating statements offset accumulated losses, to say nothing of requisition costs and capital out lay. Meanwhile the community has had a regular annual infusion of much larger wage payments to a much larger staff, the basic cause of the draught in profit which I doubt would be contemplated by any other type of investor in this sized community.

"In knowledge of this background you may perhaps appreciate my recoil from the superficial type of criticism that the Thomson Organization, which has dealt so much with this size of the market, is cheap and repressive with regard to trend. I was the one who as publisher made more profit in my last year of publication as an owner than the Thomson interests have made in overall net in the past dozen years. And why? Basically because I had to overwork the smaller staff I underpaid.

"I cannot focus the whole matter more sharply than by confessing that. Thoughtless critics of any such group as the Thomsons should study parallel conditions in similar markets in independent newspapers."

Mr. Chairman, that concludes my remarks, and I believe Mr. McCabe would like to make a few comments.

Mr. Chairman: Thank you. Mr. McCabe?

Mr. McCabe: Well, Mr. Chairman, and honourable senators: I would like to make a few comments regarding the freedom of the press. The meaning of "freedom of the press" has been subject to considerable public discussion during the last few weeks, and it will be examined and discussed further by this Committee.

It is, of course, one of the human rights and fundamental freedoms guaranteed by the Canadian Bill of Rights. It implies a right to gather and transmit public news anywhere and everywhere without fetters. Thirty-one years ago this freedom was discussed in the Supreme Court of Canada by Chief Justice Duff. In his decision, which I understand held unconstitutional a provincial law which was passed, and I am quoting the words of the Act, "to insure the publication of accurate news and information," in the course of his remarks...

The Chairman: Excuse me, Mr. McCabe, some of the people at the back of the room have asked that you speak a little louder.

Mr. McCabe: In the course of his remarks the Chief Justice pointed out that freedom of public discussion was, of course, a freedom governed by law. That this is subject to legal restrictions based upon considerations of decency and public order, such as those against defamation and sedition. He acknowledged that even within its legal rights it is liable to abuse. Nevertheless, he said, and I quote, "It is axiomatic that the practice of this right of public discussion of public affairs, notwithstanding its incidental mischief, is the breath of life for parliamentary institutions".

Now, it is against this background that we submit that any attempt to legislate separately for the press as against industry in general, would be deplorable in that it would strike at the whole principle of an independent press free from special administrative or judicial interference. We believe this to be the case whether the legislation is intended to provide a special benefit to the press, or to regulate, or restrict the press, or the ownership thereof in any way.

To give the Government of the day the right to interfere in the organization of the press in accordance with what may, for some reason of current political philosophies, be regarded as the public interest, is a principle with inherent dangers to freedom of thought and opinion.

Mr. Chairman, if there are any questions I would be delighted to answer, and if I may the questions could be directed to me. My associates and I are more or less here as a team and possibly we shall pass them from one to the other.

The Chairman: Senators, you have heard the request that Mr. McCabe would ask that the questions be directed to him; and feel free, sir, to ask the other members to answer them, or answer them yourself. I would remind the senators, in questioning, to be mindful of the fact that we are going to be receiving briefs and witnesses from two Thomson newspapers tonight, as mentioned by Mr. Tory. I would also say to the guests if there are any questions that you prefer not to answer in this kind of open forum, by all means say so.

Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: I am impressed by the conclusion of the remarks by Mr. Tory, quoting from the letter of the former owner of the Pentiction Herald in which he is disarmingly frank. Did he show a similar degree of frankness as owner by advising the people of Pentiction that he was underpaying and overworking the staff?

Mr. McCabe: I do not think it would ever occur to him in those circumstances.

Senator McElman: To this point in time, what do you consider to be the most significant contribution that the Thomson newspaper has made towards the improvement of journalism?

Mr. McCabe: Turning out good newspapers.

Senator McElman: Pardon?

Mr. McCabe: Turning out—publishing good newspapers, or enabling our publishers to publish good newspapers in their cities; and for the circulation, I think in comparison they are as good as anywhere—I am getting into deep water, but I think they are real good.

Senator McElman: There are many public statements recorded as made by the then Mr. Roy Thomson, now Lord Thomson of Fleet, which made it very clear that his primary, or principal aim in acquiring ownership of media was to make money. Let me say immediately that I admire greatly the frankness with which he has spoken, and my question is, of course, under its current ownership has the emphasis and purpose changed? and if so, in what direction and to what extent?

Mr. McCabe: We are certainly in business to make money, we are a public company, we have a responsibility to our shareholders as well as to employees, and I think that is a pretty good force to encourage you to turn out a good newspaper. You cannot fool anybody if your newspaper is not any good. It is not going to be successful, and if we have had any success, it is as Mr. Rowland says—by improving that newspaper property, converting into a daily, increasing substantially the staff, we make a better newspaper; and eventually, although I will admit that in that case it took a long time, we made some money. And I suspect it will go on, and I think we have built a relatively substantial asset for our shareholders.

Senator McElman: What direction, in particular, has emphasis taken beyond the commercial business effort?

Mr. McCabe: I do not follow you.

The Chairman: Would you like to perhaps expand upon the question, Senator, please?

Senator McElman: Well, I note from your brief that there is great emphasis on the generalized services that are provided, and so on?

Mr. McCabe: We endeavour to contribute in every direction to our individual publishers. Now, again, we sit down with our publishers once a year at the annual meeting and that is virtually like a shareholders' meeting, but beyond this our consultants—and I think we have some pretty good ones—are available, whether it is circulation, advertising, editorial, mechanical. This is quite a problem to a lot of people, and they can call on these, but these people have no authority over any of our publishers. They cannot say you must print your paper this way, or distribute your papers that way. They will advise, and I will admit some of them are pretty good advisers, and they make their point—I hope they do.

Senator McElman: Your brief appears to favour a press council; if I am wrong, tell me?

Mr. McCabe: Oh, you certainly, certainly are. I am sorry.

Senator McElman: At the national level, do you?

Mr. McCabe: At no level would I favour personally a press council.

Senator McElman: Should it be broken down?

Mr. McCabe: Look, I have been involved all my life in the smaller newspaper cities. The publishers of our newspapers have an open door literally, and that is a telephone, and they are available to their subscribers at any time, and believe me—they hear from them. As a publisher of a paper, operating a newspaper, I have been called at one o'clock in the morning if they did not get their newspaper that night. I did not do anything about it in that particular case, I don't think.

Senator McElman: You did not deliver!

Mr. McCabe: But from that point on, up to large pressure groups coming and complaining about this or that, you live next door to your subscriber in a non-metropolitan city; and frankly I have read about the three-tier, the one-tier, and the national. I suspect to a degree this may be coming from people that may be slightly, and I say this—may be a wee bit facetious, and who have a guilty conscience, because I like to think the non-metropolitan press in Canada does not flaunt the news, doesn't slant the news, and they are truly a newspaper of record in that community because—my goodness, we would like to get more news of local affairs if we could.

Now, Miss Hamilton has just handed me something that is a comment from one of our publishers. It is very short. In our opinion the British press council is a face-saving organization which does not prevent the British press from including some of the most sensational and vulgar newspapers. We do not believe that any council of any kind can be a substitute for the conscience of individual publishers.

The Chairman: Would it be fair to ask which publisher?

Mr. McCabe: Yes, Orillia—a very good and responsible publisher. This newspaper is very much aware of its responsibilities to reflect all sides of public controversy, and welcomes and publishes without any deletions of any kind of comments submitted by readers, limited only by considerations of libel, and good taste.

Senator McElman: Do you have at the head office level a written or unwritten, but understood code of ethics that must be followed by your members?

Mr. McCabe: Common sense.

Senator McElman: Good taste?

Mr. McCabe: Good taste and common sense, yes. We like to think that the people we appoint to operate our newspapers have certain standards, and since most of our appointments are from the ranks over a period of time up through our organization, such as Margaret Hamilton, the chaps here, and most of the publishers come through our organizations. You know them pretty well, you know that when they get into a position of responsibility and trust, they are not going to go off the deep end.

The Chairman: I do not think Senator McElman is clear on the answer, which is that there is not any written code of ethics? Is that it?

Mr. McCabe: Yes.

Senator McElman: Yes, I understood that. The reason I asked that question, Mr. Chairman, is that this group in its acquisitions, has more in numbers, it has gone to a great variety geographically and otherwise, getting weeklies and raising them to dailies; they constitute daily influence upon public opinion in their area, and it says very clearly in its brief that it does not change the staff: that is it retains the current staff, but I should think in the course of that, you would acquire some pretty strange cats along the way?

Mr. McCabe: You are right. You see we do not like after all...

Senator McElman: Do you just let them go on their own code?

Mr. McCabe: I think we have a responsibility to the public to operate and do the best we can with the material. He may have to strengthen the staff, or change, I think you can understand that—say in a town such as one of ours if we let somebody go, and I am being brutally frank here, if we let somebody go that has been there ten or fifteen years it is not good public relations, but I think we have responsible publishers—I think, Margaret, you can think of several cases.

Miss Hamilton: I am thinking of the Senator's comments about a "pretty strange breed of cats". Most of us do consider ourselves as that, and this is probably...

The Chairman: Some are stranger than others!

Mr. McCabe: We like to think that too.

Senator McElman: Along this same line of ethics, we have had rather conflicting views as to what protections in law there should be for journalists, and protecting the secrecy of the source, and so forth. What would be your view?

Mr. McCabe: Well, I am sure...

Senator McElman: I am thinking of criminal law involvement?

Mr. McCabe: Protecting the source of news?

Senator McElman: Yes?

Mr. McCabe: I am sure that some of the working press in the room—it would be divided about half and half—whether they would agree.

The Chairman: Would you care to say what you think?

Mr. McCabe: I think it is dangerous to fool around with that sort of thing. I think it is a nice thought, but I can see possible misuses, and I would be a little concerned if—you know it is always dangerous when we fuss with fundamentals, and to give a special privilege to anybody whatever the set of circumstances are, whatever position in society—I think it is something that a lot of thought has to be given to. I don't think there has been enough thought given to this. I would say that I have heard about it for years. This is an old one.

Senator McElman: In current situations, of course, it is up to the courts to decide whether it is vitally important that the source be revealed. It is not up to the journalist to decide, but the court to decide? Then of course, the consequence, contempt or non-contempt decision on it? This is how you feel?

Mr. McCabe: This is a mighty good place for it. I would like to see it there I think. I am talking as an individual.

The Chairman: Would you mind, sir, if we were to ask Mr. Tory to comment on that?

Mr. McCabe: He would probably disagree with me.

Mr. Tory: No, I think I agree with Mr. McCabe. I think that any special privileges have to be very carefully considered before they are granted, and I think that the abuse that Mr. McCabe was referring to there was absolute privilege to refuse to disclose a source. This could be very serious in some situations, and I think the existing system, as you have described it, is perhaps the best we can do in the circumstances. It may not be perfect, but...

Senator Prowse: May I ask a supplementary question?

The Chairman: Yes, go ahead Senator.

Senator Prowse: Does your concern arise out of the fact that privilege given a newspaper man would not go just to the newspaper men that normally we have around here, or perhaps the ones you would like to think you are hiring; but it would go to anybody who is in the publishing business?

Mr. McCabe: I had not thought about that much, but why should any segment of society get any special privilege from the government, or penalty for that matter? We are all Canadians, this is it; and I would like to see a reporter who has the initiative dig up a story and say—look I just cannot print this. It might limit that but I think the number of stories it will lose in the process will be rather few—when you look at it in the broader. Now, again I am no authority for goodness' sake.

Senator Prowse: Well, you deal with it.

Senator McElman: I note, Mr. McCabe, that your chain is divesting itself of broadcasting interests? Is that a particular philosophy, or basic reasoning?

Mr. McCabe: Senator, for years I advocated it, and I hope I have finally won. I don't think any newspaper organization should have a government license. I think we must be free in every possible respect. Now, this is only my opinion. I don't think Roy Thomson, nor Ken Thomson, or for that matter John Tory—I think I have convinced Margaret Hamilton, but this is a very argumentative thing. Now, I am reciting only my personal viewpoint and I have expressed this in our own directors' meetings for many, many years. I don't mean to say that is the entire reason why the Thomson family—mind you the Thomson Newspapers Limited never, ever were involved in the radio business. I have no—for example the radio interest owned by the Thomson family, they have an office in our building and I say "good morning" to the chap who operates it, but I think once I saw a statement of his. I might be concerned about learning something about the market, and maybe I got it out the back door, but that is our relationship.

Mr. Tory: If I might comment, I think the major factor in the decision was the likelihood of continually increasing government inference in the control of the broadcasting media. I think that was a very major factor in the decision.

Senator McElman: It was not just that you do not favour cross-ownership of media, but because of the license and control aspect of things?

Mr. McCabe: In the broadcasting.

Mr. Tory: I would say that is much more significant than the cross-ownership of the media. I have not heard any of the Thomson family members, or Mr. McCabe, or anybody else express any opinion on that last subject.

Senator McElman: In that light why are you still in the cable television area?

Mr. McCabe: I think there is some small—John, may be you can answer that—that is entirely a matter of the Thomson family with which I am not involved.

The Chairman: John, do you want to answer that?

Mr. Tory: Yes. I think the brief indicates that there is one continuing interest, Paragraph 8.

The Chairman: Paragraph 8?

Mr. Tory: Yes. Now, the area referred to there is Richmond Hill, Markham and Vaughan where the Thomson family—it is actually one of the children of Mr. K. R. Thomson, owns 50 per cent of the shares of this cable T. V. system that is referred to; and I believe the only other potential interest is that the same company is involved in an application for cable T. V. in the Sudbury area.

Mr. McCabe: I might say this, when writing our brief we almost forgot about that—that is how much I know. I did know the family was interested in it, but to make a statement about broadcasting, and forget something—that is how concerned I was about it.

Senator McElman: To the extent it is involved thus far, licensing and so on is probably not that great a problem, but would you see cable television as a real problem to us because of licensing? Or other aspects of it in relation to ownership?

Mr. McCabe: I don't think so. I should say this, that in the United States we have one division there where it does happen to own 10% of a cable T.V. here and 50% there, and I think in only one case we own one outright, and I do not think the total makes any difference at all. It is a pretty mechanical sort of thing. I don't know enough about it to look at it as a creative business related to T.V. and broadcasting.

Senator McElman: I might comment that in my opinion on the basis of information that we have learned, I would judge that cable television is going to be the communication area of the future.

Mr. McCabe: I have heard—I don't necessarily—I do not mean to disagree with you Senator, but I do not necessarily think so.

Senator McElman: It was an opinion.

Mr. McCabe: It is only an opinion as of the moment. I think it is great stuff, and probably very profitable, a very profitable business—but I don't know where it is going.

The Chairman: Senator, I would like to ask a question on the broadcasting; are you leaving that to turn to another subject?

Senator McElman: Go ahead, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: I would like to ask Mr. Tory, surely you believe in some degree of government control in broadcasting? Or is your condemnation blanket?

Mr. Tory: No, no. I agree there should be some government control because there is a limited number of airwaves. I don't disagree with the control; I just said that might be the principal factor in the decision itself.

The Chairman: Do you think that control has become more strict under the new C.R.T.C.?

Mr. Tory: Well, that is very difficult to say. I think the prospect is that the controls will become more strict, and perhaps have become more strict.

The Chairman: I think in fairness they have, and I am wondering if that is a factor for the decision?

Mr. Tory: Well, to the extent that Government control is a factor, then what you suggest is a factor, yes.

The Chairman: I merely wanted to assure myself that you are not against the idea of some form of government control in broadcasting, because I think it is essential.

Senator Prowse, on broadcasting?

Senator Prowse: Well, on this one question, supplemental—I was under the impression, Mr. McCabe, that the reason the Thomson publishing chain was divesting itself of its connections in this regard was because there was government control in the one area, and of necessity they would be looking at that in the possibility that it would perhaps impinge perhaps into the publishing areas? Did I misunderstand?

Mr. McCabe: Well, I never thought—it is remote.

The Chairman: Oh, I think that is going too far, I do not think that was said.

Mr. Tory: If I may say so, it should be understood that where the broadcasting interests are in large part, is not the same places where there are publishing interests.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: On cross-media ownership, assumedly there would be some level, thinking of the Canadian public interest—that wonderful term like “motherhood”—where concentration of ownership in one of the media would be undesirable, for instance if one chain had control across the nation. Could you tell us, in your opinion, what level that might be—concentration of the ownership, let us say in the print media?

Mr. McCabe: Do you mean how many of the newspapers—or half the newspapers?

Senator McElman: Not necessarily how many, or whether it is half, but there are other criteria. What would be your view?

Mr. McCabe: Well, I do not know exactly if I understand the point.

The Chairman: Then you should not try and answer if you do not understand the question. I think you should make it clear, do you want to perhaps restate the question, Senator?

Senator McElman: Well, it has been stated that it would be undesirable if one chain owned all of the dailies in Canada. Well, probably none of us would disagree with that. That was also expressed last evening that it would be undesirable if one group, or chain owned all of the dailies in one province, or one region. It would be undesirable if one group owned all of the dailies in metropolitan Toronto. What is your opinion?

Mr. McCabe: Well, I do not know that the latter would be so bad. I do not know where you stop in this sort of thing; as far as I am concerned—how many more papers are you going to buy?—we look at each one of these individually, and if we can contribute to a newspaper and it becomes a more—if we think it will become a more successful, more viable enterprise under our ownership, we look at it—and, possibly we buy it—not always, and that is our approach to the multiple ownership.

Senator McElman: Let us look at the current situation I will make the bald statement it would be undesirable if one chain had all the dailies in Ontario?

Mr. McCabe: I agree with that.

Senator Everett: Well, Senator McElman is making these statements as a matter of personal belief, not as the Committee's belief.

Senator Prowse: Well, every Member of the Committee...

The Chairman: I think that every Senator has...

Senator Everett: Well, he prefaced his remarks by saying that “we all agree”, and I want the record to state that we might not all agree.

The Chairman: Well, if I may comment, I think Senator McElman's “we” was not—I do not think he intended it as a reference to the Committee, I am sure he did not. It was a general statement.

Senator McElman: Let me make it clear, it was a figure of speech.

The Chairman: I am sure we would all agree.

Senator McElman: O.K. I am venturing a personal view, it would be undesirable if one chain owned all of the dailies in Canada, and that is my personal view.

The Chairman: Then you said “Ontario”, and the witness to that said yes, he would agree with you, so we go on from there.

Mr. McCabe: I may be getting myself into deep water here because I think we own all the newspapers in Prince Edward Island. In this province thing—I do not want to go too far. Now, there is now a daily paper in Summerside which there was not previously, but I think it is a little different in the smaller provinces—the reason I say Ontario is because there are so many newspapers and it would be quite a chore; I think of—the smaller provinces; it is a different kettle of fish.

Senator McElman: I was wondering if you would have any views, since you have an aversion in this field, as many of us have—again my opinion—to government intervention in this area. How in the structure of society we live in, how could we prevent this happening?

Mr. McCabe: Well, I do not think preventing everything that you might, or I might think, or somebody else might think—is bad. I mean we have to live with these things as facts of life. I get worried when we try to prevent things. You are asking me, sir: I am always worried about government going to prevent something. In fact I think government should perform that function—and very well in Canada—and leave us alone. I am not a Gladstone liberal, but..

The Chairman: Could I just ask the witness one question? This is in answer to one of the questions of Senator McElman that you gave earlier; I would like to make sure that I heard you correctly. You said that you did not think—now, I do not want to put words in your mouth, and please correct me if I am wrong. You said that you did not think it would be a bad thing if one person owned all of the dailies, the daily newspapers in Toronto. Do you think it would be socially desirable?

Mr. McCabe: Well, who am I to say?

The Chairman: You are a very important man in journalism in Canada. I think you can express that opinion.

Mr. McCabe: I think that a set of circumstances—I want a good newspaper in Toronto, I do not care how many newspapers there are in Toronto, I want a good newspaper that gives me an honest news report, gives me a sensible report—and a sensible editorial opinion. I can think of a city that is almost big enough to have two or three papers, based on some of the conversation you hear today. I think the Hamilton Spectator is one of the best in Canada today.

The Chairman: But with respect, I think you are evading my question, which is really Senator McElman's question. I feel, if you will forgive me, following up his question, do you think it would be socially desirable to have all of the newspapers, the only newspapers in Toronto owned by one person?

Mr. McCabe: All of the three daily newspapers?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. McCabe: No, I think what would probably happen would be a morning and evening newspaper. I was imagining that set of circumstances, that a newspaper follows...

The Chairman: Well, do you think that would be socially desirable?

Mr. McCabe: I think it is better being owned by two people—you see Mr. Chairman, I think if it is a good newspaper it would be better than having two newspapers that were not turning out good newspapers, and this has happened.

The Chairman: What do you think of the three newspapers in Toronto at the present time?

Mr. McCabe: I would just—well, I think they are excellent; I am a reader of all three.

Mr. Tory: I suggest he plead the Fifth.

The Chairman: You suggest he plead the Fifth. Yes, Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, I am not attempting to downgrade the witnesses in any sense when I ask why do not have some of your editorial representations here today, sir? It was specifically requested.

Mr. McCabe: Well, they invited the Thomson Newspapers Limited, and we are a corporate organization, or we have, as I say, an editorial consultant in Toronto, they have no editorial authority—why would I bring them?

Mr. Chairman: I think that is a satisfactory answer.

Mr. McCabe: I took that for granted.

Senator McElman: I am simply referring to the terms, and wondering. I thought probably it was...

Mr. McCabe: Sir, I did not know.

Senator McElman: I touched a moment ago on the matter of future technology; have you any particular in-depth studies on this? Such as the facsimile press, and the impact they may very well have on dailies as we now know them, format, and so on?

Mr. McCabe: Well, you know Miss Hamilton of our organization has a filing cabinet, and three drawers are so crammed with everything we can find...

The Chairman: Excuse me, Mr. McCabe, some of the people at the back keep indicating that they cannot hear. I wonder if you could speak a little louder.

Mr. McCabe: It is very difficult to speculate what the future is going to be. You mention facsimile, I believe. I doubt that facsimile for some time is going to be a big force. Mr. Tory gave me a clipping out of a British paper the other day. I put it in my bag to read—there has not been anything new. The Japanese have been fooling with it for a long time. I believe. I think as far as new processes are concerned I think the offset, the computer, and various other gadgets are certainly worth looking at, and this is what we are constantly watching. We have installed some small computers in some of our markets where there is, should we say, a lot of straight matter type to set up: and what have we, Margaret?—eight or ten of them I guess?

Miss Hamilton: (Indicating in the affirmative.)

Mr. McCabe: And we have one daily, one weekly, and one three times a week newspaper operating on offset presses in Canada. And it has not proved anything to me. I think that this talk about offset presses is—they are presently on the market—they are there—but I think could conceivably be by-passed entirely.

Miss Hamilton: I think that one of the problems—or there are two problems—with facsimile is the cost of the receiver which has been moving into a more reasonable area recently through the Japanese experiments; but I think the problem is no one has found a way yet to make facsimile sound economically because of its limited ability to carry advertising, and even though it is well-known fundamentally in the press that the reader does not pay for the news that he gets—the advertiser does. I think it is this limiting factor certainly for the present time, and for perhaps many more years to come for facsimile being at all a viable method of transmitting the news.

Mr. McCabe: Also I think it very important, Miss Hamilton touched on it, that advertising in that facsimile newspaper because I found from experience that if I don't have advertising—if I don't have what is going on at that department store—my circulation doesn't hold so well. The advertising is important to sustaining your circulation, and almost as much as the news.

Senator McElman: Your group, I think, is noteworthy for the attention it pays to measurement and research data, and so on: as part of that do you have measurements of the age groups of your readership in specific areas?

The Chairman: Miss Hamilton?

Miss Hamilton: I think that perhaps the answer to that in our newspapers, because we are publishing in small towns. The age group, basically of our readers pretty well follows the particular age group of people in that community. It is not as if it is a case as for instance in Toronto, or London where one of the newspapers might appeal to the teenagers more than another. So it is not a factor of importance in our approach to publishing.

Mr. McCabe: This information is available in various publications in Canada. I think even in the individual market, I think our advertising people use it to promote the sale of advertising to a certain classification.

Senator McElman: Well, there are some of your market areas where the metropolitan dailies share, of course, with your circulation and your market field: and what I was wondering was whether you had any way of measuring whether the content of your papers in such areas was really as relevant as it should be to the younger generation today? And if it was not...

Mr. McCabe: This is something we would encourage a local publisher to do. Really we want to leave this alone as much as possible or we are running these newspapers, and I am very careful at all times not to run a newspaper. I have enough to do as it is.

Senator McElman: Any reference to underground press then would be better discussed with your people who come from the local newspapers themselves?

Mr. McCabe: I guess you are right.

Senator McElman: I notice that your group seems to have a trend, if not tell me, that it is reducing the disparity in rates between local and national advertising more than the others are doing. Is there some particular basis for this?

Mr. McCabe: I think finally it would be—it will be better business if we can do it. I don't think we have been all that successful. I think we have been successful to some degree, but it is something we would like to do.

Senator McElman: There is something I have not been able to determine, is the leveling process up to the national?—or down towards the local?

Mr. McCabe: I am afraid it would be—we have several newspapers and they all do have different rate structures because each community has a different mercantile set-up; and I mean I just never thought of that. I am not that familiar at the moment with our advertising rate structures as I used to be.

Senator McElman: There are none of the witnesses who would be able to say?

Miss Hamilton: I think it is a difficult question because once again advertising rates are set by each of our individual newspapers individually. I think sometime ago, probably going back now as far as ten or fifteen years ago, many of the newspapers in Canada, if not all of them, inclined towards the approach of narrowing the gap between national advertising and local advertising rates. I do not think it was ever a policy decision made at any one level of operation.

The Chairman: Senator, there are some of your colleagues who have indicated they wish to ask questions. I am not limiting or halting you; however, do you have many more questions?

Senator McElman: Yes, numerous.

The Chairman: It may not be that you can complete them on the first round, but go ahead for several more.

Senator McElman: In your measurement process, it is apparent from your brief and other material, that your head office procedures involve a great deal of continuing measurement of the member papers on news lineage versus advertising lineage, and so on. What checks do you make on the quality versus the quantity?

Mr. McCabe: We do not have that many checks even if we do measure, or count the stories. Many of the other figures that were in our brief were simply taken and developed with other facts where we could get some significant figures—further information. The quality of our newspapers is something that is constantly discussed, and I don't think there is any mechanical machinery you can set up to guarantee quality; if there was I would sure be interested in acquiring it.

Now, Miss Hamilton has brought here, and I do not want to bore you with any of this sort of thing, but some of the staff training material we use in our organization. It is chiefly editorial and training material, and information we supply to our people that encourage this quality...

The Chairman: Would you leave us some of these?

Mr. McCabe: Sure, we'd be delighted.

Miss Hamilton: Would you like me to mention two or three of the kinds?

The Chairman: Yes, by all means, go ahead.

Miss Hamilton: Well, I think there are two things that we do in this area of providing training material, as such, for beginners in the journalism field: we also do some of this in advertising, but we have put a great deal of thought over the years into this whole area of "How do you develop good reporters, good news people?" So we have several pieces of training material. The ones we are using at the moment are, for instance, this course, The editorial Trainee Lecture Course which is a course of thirty lectures prepared by Colin McConachie who at the time he prepared it was the managing editor of the Moose Jaw newspaper, and just simply what it seems, it is a course of study. I might say that now Mr. McConachie is one of our consultants in Toronto. He is a graduate of the Carleton School of Journalism. We prepare small aids; this is a sort of handbook, a reporter's check list for news stories. The sort of thing a reporter can carry with him when he is covering a story. It gives him specially—this is young reporters—it gives him immediate reference to the kinds of thing that he should be finding to have a complete story.

Then on a continuing basis, our staff in Toronto do things like this—this would probably go out on an annual basis; good local features are always interesting, let's run more of them regularly. These are simply sent in quantity to the newspapers. What they are, frankly, are a complete round-up of all of the local feature ideas that have been carried in all of the Thomson newspapers for the previous several months, or a year, so that the newspaper in Guelph, as a location in point, might hit upon an idea of some kind of approach to some local feature, that the Prince Albert paper has developed. You know there are not too many new ideas in our business or any other business for that matter, the big trick is to be able to pirate other people's ideas and make good use of them; and this we feel helps the publisher keep in front of his editors for the development of local features. We send things out, for instance here, just a week or two ago an exchange of ideas for Christmas stories and features. How do you develop the Christmas theme, motive how you cover the news relating to Christmas? Suggestions for Christmas pictures suggestions from top photographers of how they make topics of Christmas events. Those go out quite frequently, that kind of thing.

Then we provide other training material. For instance this is a list of words that Reporters have trouble distinguishing the precise meanings of, and suggestions to help reporters improve.

The Chairman: What would be two of those words, just for fun?

Miss Hamilton: Well, for instance "quit" and "relinquish". With "quit" it has the over-tone of giving-up, or running out, and quit suggests a renunciation. Things like forbear, and forbear. This is the kind of thing. I have not looked but I am sure flout and flaunt are here because you see more people misuse that word in papers than most words. This is good and bad news writing. The causes of most sloppy news writing. Says how to produce good reporters and prominent editors, and it is picked up not only from our editors but other editors.

Mr. McCabe: Some are elementary, and some are sophisticated. Editing of copy.

Miss Hamilton: These are not the fundamentals of copy writing but the little kinds of minor problems. Like when you say "in view of the fact", it is only a long way of saying "because". This sort of thing that makes a good reporter out of a mediocre—not the only thing, but one of the things.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Senator Everett: I just want to interject here just to ask if Mr. McCabe has his last published financial statement with him?

Mr. McCabe: We almost didn't.

Mr. Tory: I have a copy of Thomson Newspapers Limited consolidated financial statements.

Senator McElman: May we ask that be filed with the Committee?

Senator Everett: That is confidential information?

Mr. Tory: I should mention this consolidates the results of operations of all the United States newspapers, and we do not make available separate information regarding the Canadian and U.S. operations but we are happy to file it with the Committee; but it does make a clear picture of all the Canadian operations from looking at this statement. Perhaps I could keep it until the end of the hearing?

The Chairman: Yes, we are delighted to have it.

21417-4½

Senator Everett: I wonder if I could have a look at it, if it is filed now?

The Chairman: Do you want to see it now, Senator Everett? Do you mind, John?

Mr. Tory: No. (Producing same.)

The Chairman: May I go back to Senator McElman then? Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: On the matter of salaries, and in your brief, page 17 on this, do you have the actual comparisons that you filed with the Committee because I am unable to determine here whether the comparisons on salaries to Canadian Thomson groups were made with Thomson papers in the States? others? or a mixture?

Mr. McCabe: Could I just say this, the only place we could get the comparable information was from an organization in the United States. It has a tremendous number of newspapers in the United States. We took—was it 71 newspapers?

Miss Hamilton: Yes, in the circulation group involved, between ten thousand and nineteen thousand. The American figures represent the average of salaries paid in the seventy-one daily newspapers as compared—and I suppose maybe two of those seventy-one might be Thomson newspapers in the States—as compared with all of our newspapers in the same circulation range.

Mr. McCabe: Could I say this, the only possible place we could get good comparisons, these are not our newspapers in the United States: this is a cross-section of members of this association filing this information. I asked them if I could use the information, and they said, sure, but don't publicly state where you got it. Now, I am delighted to tell the Committee where we got it, it is quite a responsible source, but I'd just as soon...

Senator Prowse: You would like to protect your source? We will respect that.

Senator McElman: Then on this basis we could not get a breakdown of the various ranges from your lower paid staff up through the various types of work to the higher staff?

Mr. McCabe: You see each paper operates on its...

Senator McElman: It is just a lumping average then I take it?

Mr. McCabe: Yes.

Miss Hamilton: Of editorial staff.

Senator McElman: All right, Now, how many of your newspapers in Canada have labour contracts with their employees?

Mr. McCabe: It is in the brief I believe.

Miss Hamilton: In Canada? Did you ask?

Senator McElman: Yes, in Canada.

Miss Hamilton: I know that we have signed 175 contracts in the last ten years.

Senator McElman: Paragraph 57 of the brief...

Miss Hamilton: How many of our newspapers have—let me put it this way, of our daily newspapers I believe there are only two who do not have contracts with Unions. Now, I might be out by one but just off the top of my head...

Senator McElman: How many of these are with craft unions, and how many with Guild?

Miss Hamilton: We have only one contract with the Guild in Canada.

Mr. McCabe: Should we explain why?

The Chairman: Where is that?

Mr. McCabe: Oshawa.

The Chairman: Oh, yes. Oshawa, of course.

Mr. McCabe: I think I should say this, in 1968 the American newspapers filed with the American Newspapers Publishers' Association 7938 contracts. Now, that includes Canadian newspapers as well who are members. It is not all of them but it is a substantial—of this number 8.6 were The American Newspaper Guild—and well, I won't get into that. I believe the Guild have 137 contracts in toto, and they have 21 contracts with newspapers under 25,000—circulation under 25,000. There are 1,225 newspapers in that category in the United States itself. I think they do much better in Canada probably than...

Senator McElman: All of the negotiations in labour management contracts and agreements, are they done at the local level, or is there some stage where head office consultation takes place?

Mr. McCabe: I got pulled into a strike in Oshawa with the Guild—oh, five years ago—simply because we did not want them to stay out on strike. There was nothing else to do—so I tried to assist the publisher. I have been called in in the past, not in recent years, I don't think I'd become involved now, life is too short. We do have in Toronto a Canadian newspaper man, very competent young man who operates one of our newspapers, who has made it his business to become acquainted with labour legislation. He deals regularly with publishers where they have brought in an international labour representative, and also he supplies them certain information because our people are not essentially labour negotiators, professional labour negotiators and when a professional comes in, it is only natural that they should have somebody assist them.

Senator McElman: We have already had a witness before us the American Newspaper Guild, and needless to say they gave you a pretty hard time, your organization. They referred in particular to the Peterborough Examiner situation, and both in the brief and in the testimony it was suggested that they got a very rough kind of deal, and the only news of the strike published in the Examiner was a news story on the beginning day of the strike plus two full pages of advertising, giving the management position, and then after the demise of the strike itself, without any contract being signed, that there was no publication of this fact whatsoever although in Toronto some 90 miles away there was continuing coverage throughout the whole of the strike?

Mr. McCabe: Yes...

Senator McElman: Let me come to my question if you would. Would you consider that this would be an area in which head office might be interested in suggesting to the local people, not what they do in the course of the strike, but on their advising of the public of what was going on?

Mr. McCabe: No, I am not running the newspaper.

Senator McElman: I appreciate that.

Mr. McCabe: Bill Garner might say—what do you think of this? And I'd say one thing or another. In relation to this Guild thing maybe this is the right time, I think Mr. Chairman, if you permit me, rather than—can't answer on behalf of the Peterborough Examiner because I was not involved in this but we have some observations to make that were made here in this hearing, statements made here in this hearing about our company and I would like to correct the record.

The Chairman: Do you want to do that now?

Senator McElman: I think you should have the opportunity.

The Chairman: Miss Hamilton, that looks like a long statement. I am not objecting to the fact it is long, but I thought we might adjourn before you...

Miss Hamilton: It sounds like an excellent idea.

The Chairman: Well, I am not suggesting that we adjourn for the afternoon, I am suggesting we adjourn for five minutes.

Miss Hamilton: It will take about five minutes to read.

The Chairman: Why don't you read it, and then we shall adjourn for the five minutes.

Miss Hamilton: Yes.

"Some of the comments in the American Newspaper Guild's brief concerned us in that they may have given this Committee a very incorrect impression in several areas.

"In paragraph 24, the brief states 'Most provincial newspapers employ relatively few people, particularly in editorial departments where wire service copy comprises the bulk of news content'.

"This statement simply is not factual. Although provincial newspapers do carry a good quantity of wire news, the amount of space devoted to local news and local features almost always equals or exceeds that devoted to wire service copy.

"I believe paragraph 25 is sufficiently unclear to be misleading. It says 'The young reporter joins the news staff of a daily from a journalism school or weekly newspaper. Minimum beginners' salaries under Guild contracts currently range from $118.84 weekly at the Toronto Telegram to $75.40 weekly at the Oshawa Times.

It seems to me that this intimates that a journalism graduate or experienced reporter from a weekly joining the Oshawa Times would be paid $75.40. This is not true—and certainly is not the way either the Guild or the editor of the Oshawa Times in fact interpret the contract. The minimum salary is paid to apprentice reporters who have absolutely no journalism education or newspaper reporting experience. In other words that salary is applied only to a young boy or girl who is a beginning apprentice.

"In paragraph 27, in referring to Peterborough, Mr. Ogilvie quoted a salary figure relating to a top general reporter 'and to other reporters with comparable experience and long service'. He then illustrated his comment by saying 'one employee with 22 years service received $105 weekly'. The employee he referred to, I find in checking with the Peterborough management, was not a reporter. She was doing work which in some Guild contracts carries a scale as low as 65% or 70% of the reporter scale.

"In comparing a salary for a reporter in effect at the time of certification with a rate for printers, the brief uses the printers' rate which was not in effect until almost a year later.

"In paragraph 28, the statement is made that Peterborough 'adamantly refused such standard conditions as the eight hour day and paid overtime.' This would seem to indicate that the eight hour day was refused as well as paid overtime.

"The facts are that the original contract proposals of management to the Guild included provision for a 40-hour work week and for equal time off to cover any additional hours required in any work week. Incidentally, at that time the Guild was demanding a four day 28 hour week and overtime beyond 20 hours a week, and 7 hours a day, with all decisions as to hours and time of work being made 2 weeks in advance."

The Chairman: That was the sum of the statement. Thank you.

Senator McElman: Could we have that statement filed so that we have it with the other record?

The Chairman: Well, the statement is handwritten, and we shall have it from the reporter, but I do not think it is possible for us to have it right now, Senator, I am sorry.

Senator McElman: I did not want it right now.

The Chairman: Well, the reporter will have it, yes; and would you like a copy of the Guild's submission to look at?

Senator McElman: No, I have that, thank you.

The Chairman: Oh, you have that, fine. Well, I think we will proceed with the questions on this comment and then we'll adjourn. Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: No, no questions.

The Chairman: None. Are there any questions that Senators have on the statement?
(No answer.)

The Chairman: That being so, it is five to four, we'll adjourn and reconvene at four o'clock.

(Four o'clock p.m. December 18th., 1969.)

The Chairman: Senators, I would like to reconvene the session; and I think for the record we should note with respect that the question Senator McElman asked the witness was not really answered. Not that you evaded it, but perhaps it will be answered in the evening, because this all began with a question on the extent of coverage of the strike in Peterborough on the Examiner, and that will be dealt with tonight as I understand it. Senator McElman, perhaps I could return to you in a few minutes...

Senator McElman: Well, on that very point.

The Chairman: All right.

Senator McElman: You were familiar with the coverage, I take it; would this be a fair presentation?

Mr. McCabe: I was more familiar with the coverage in Toronto, in the Toronto papers, because I live in Toronto; and I think it is unfortunate that a lot of labour disputes, they often carry one-sided reports, one side or another, and management does not make statements for some obvious reasons.

The Chairman: An incredible statement; I accept it of course, and I am not being argumentative but do you mean to say, and if you do say so of course, that you would not read the Peterborough Examiner every day?

Mr. McCabe: Well, I am away, and there would be four copies, and sometimes you know they don't arrive too promptly, and as a result I don't. We have quite a few newspapers and there is always something of significance. I do admit that I looked at the Peterborough Examiner during the course of the strike certainly.

The Chairman: I would be surprised if you did not.

Senator McElman: What I would like to get to is, that if you happened to be away at this particular time, Mr. McCabe, would there be anybody at head office who would take a sufficient interest, let us call it for want of a better term, editorial integrity, that they would make some comment, not necessarily at the time, but afterwards?

Mr. McCabe: I think during the strike, you are not going to be telling Bill Garner, who is there twenty-four hours literally on some days, how to behave. I am going to depend on him, and I have a lot of confidence in him, and I think he performed very well during that situation. Far be it from me, and I would be quite upset if somebody was bugging him in our office in Toronto.

Senator McElman: Let us say after the event?

Mr. McCabe: Oh, I think this thing was kicked around quite a bit, would I not be right, Margaret?

Miss Hamilton: (Indicating in the affirmative.)

Mr. McCabe: If it is the point that we didn't cover on both sides of the question, I think it would be much better to put that question to Mr. Garner tonight because I think he can answer it much more efficiently.

Senator McElman: I am not asking for details that took place at the local level. What I am trying to get at—I accept your statement of non-interference but I just find it hard to conceive that an organization of your size and character at some point would not find it useful to, after the event again I say, to suggest that—do you not think the people of Peterborough felt you gave them an unreasonable or unfair, bad show in the course of this?

Mr. McCabe: Well, I do not think that, sir. I don't think they gave them a bad show. I think the Peterborough Examiner performed well under the circumstances. All I am saying is that I am not familiar enough to discuss the details. Mr. Garner is: but believe me, during the course of this unfortunate situation, I think the people of Peterborough knew full well what was going on from the news media in Peterborough.

Senator McElman: If I may, on one other point, very quickly...

The Chairman: Yes, of course.

Senator McElman: When a newspaper changes ownership, do you believe it to be their responsibility that the public be informed immediately? and do you do so?

Mr. McCabe: Oh, we do, we have in most cases. I remember one time in the United States that we purchased a newspaper from a person who was quite elderly, and for some reason or other it was not to be announced until—oh, some set of circumstances—and it was really fun trying to keep the lid on it all those months. I think we did fairly well.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Mr. McCabe, you have explained at great length both in your brief, and orally today, the reasons why owners of small newspapers may decide to sell. I think the Committee would be interested in hearing from you what factors you take into consideration when you decide to buy a newspaper?

Mr. McCabe: I think you approach it much the same as you would any other business transaction.

Mr. Fortier: You don't approach it any differently?

Mr. McCabe: Sure, it is the only business I know so I must necessarily do something a little different than somebody else. We look at the statement which is a tremendous influence on it. We look at the fixed assets, we look at the circulation figures, and we look at the market. We try to examine the future potential of the market.

Mr. Fortier: Would it be fair to say that you only carry out these inquiries in towns which have a maximum population, which you would fix in your own mind?

Mr. McCabe: No.

Mr. Fortier: In your own mind?

Mr. McCabe: You mean we'd only buy a newspaper of thus and so population and circulation?

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. McCabe: No, we have some newspapers with a pretty small circulation, and pretty small population: but you are right, I would prefer not today because of the nature of our company, and the fact we have grown to acquire very, very small newspapers—now, that doesn't mean to say that we wouldn't convert a weekly newspaper into a relatively small newspaper, because there is a period of growth that must follow before that becomes significant.

Mr. Fortier: Is there a level of population in a given community where you are not at all interested in acquiring newspapers?

Mr. McCabe: There should be probably, there has not always been, and I think that today—well, I couldn't say "no", because immediately I start to mention a figure, somebody else contradicts it, and I don't think any figure would be—really I think a lot of other factors have to be considered for the...

Mr. Fortier: What, in your experience, what is the point, the level of population in any given community where two newspapers, two competing newspapers would be economically viable? Do you have a "norm" which you could give to the Committee?

Mr. McCabe: I think it is more than population. I think the nature of the city is important. For example, Ottawa is most unusual; if it was any other place, I think there would be one newspaper. I don't think there is any doubt of that. I think the Hamilton—goodness knows they have tried often enough. There is only one there. I think that is a very difficult question. There are newspapers in smaller cities in the United States—what we said in our brief is right, one is a weak sloppy enterprise, and the other may be not as good as it would be if there was one newspaper. Therefore—I can't—I think of that place in Pennsylvania, New York I think it is, they have two newspapers...

The Chairman: When you mentioned lots of attempts to start another newspaper in Hamilton, when was the last one, do you remember? Not within memory?

Mr. McCabe: Not within memory? Oh, yes.

The Chairman: How long then, ten years, twenty years?

Mr. McCabe: Ten years, fifteen years ago a very valiant attempt was made, but...

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: I wonder about your remarks about Ottawa, and the viability of two newspapers being extraordinary, not the word you used but—could it be applied to Thunder Bay after January 1, 1970?

Mr. McCabe: Oh, I don't know. I wish I did know, and if you can give me any information on what to do, our people are at sixes and sevens right now. They have plans to go in any direction, they could go in any direction; they want to serve the public, the community, whatever is right for that community, in the judgment of most of these people that will happen.

Mr. Fortier: Have you considered, or given any thought to merging the two newspapers in Thunder Bay?

Mr. McCabe: We have given thought to almost any eventuality that could happen in a town like that. I don't really know what would happen. Simply because the Government imposes a merger on that community, it does not necessarily follow that the community is going to be one community. I mean I do not know but these are just some of the things I have been told.

Mr. Fortier: I was reading in the report of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission on the acquisition of the Time Journal in Fort William; on page 16: "If Fort William and Port Arthur were one market for newspaper circulations instead of two separate and distinct markets then the News Chronicle and Times would have been competitors, not monopolists each in its own sphere: or if the two cities were about to shed local loyalty in favour of a common community and market, then competition could be expected to develop between the two newspapers." That is only four years ago.

Mr. McCabe: Who said that?

Mr. Fortier: These were the conclusions of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission which inquired into the acquisition back in 1965. The weight of the evidence before the Commission indicated that while there was a trend to union, this would not happen in the foreseeable future.

Mr. McCabe: In the normal course of events, it would not, I don't think. I think it was the fact that the Provincial Government injected themselves into it.

Mr. Fortier: But in the light of this report with which I am sure you are very familiar, you have not considered specifically the merging of the two newspapers?

Mr. McCabe: Oh, certainly our people have. I have not. Let's face it, two newspapers could not compete in that market. In my judgment it is a physical impossibility. I have been in business, in this business all my life. I'll bet $10. I'll make a bet right now that it could not happen no matter who owned the papers. One would survive, and in the meantime the public's interest would not be served in a small community.

Mr. Fortier: On this subject of inquiries by the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission the Thomson Newspapers have been subjected to two, I believe, in recent years. I wonder if you could comment on the suggestion which has been made before this Committee that freedom of the press includes the freedom of newspapers from being subjected to inquiries into their business practices such as these inquiries. Could we have your comments?

The Chairman: Do you want that answered by Mr. Tory, or...

Mr. McCabe: I would not want—I think the Combines legislation is clear, and under the circumstances I suspect that it is reasonable to go into—they didn't conduct an investigation, and I am glad that we did not have to prepare for this Combines investigation at the same time that I had to prepare for this Committee because we have spent a lot of time and money preparing for this hearing. We did want to tell our story, and as honestly as we could. I think it is a mighty wholesome story. I am proud of the Thomson organization.

Mr. Fortier: But there is no suggestion on your part that freedom of the press, to which you alluded in your verbal remarks, Mr. McCabe, means that the press is above the law of the land?

Mr. McCabe: Oh, certainly not.

The Chairman: I think Mr. Tory wants to say something.

Mr. Tory: I was just going to say the same thing. I do not think that the press should feel entitled to any special exemptions from that sort of legislation. I think it should be subject to the laws in the same way as any other institution.

Mr. Fortier: I wonder if Mr. McCabe could tell us whether he feels that the Quebec Chronicle-Telegram in Quebec City is fulfilling a special role which it not being fulfilled by any one of your other daily, or weekly newspapers in Canada?

Mr. McCabe: Better be.

Mr. Fortier: And if so, what is that role?

Mr. McCabe: Well, it is the English paper in Quebec City, it is struggling very hard to sustain daily publication...

Mr. Fortier: Circulation has decreased?

Mr. McCabe: Well, you know it is amazing, it really hasn't. It has some circulation down in the Gaspé that keeps it buoyed up; but the postal increase did knock it on the head for a while, and it is in an area where you can't put in your own drop-offs, I suppose—but the Quebec Chronicle is not a very big newspaper, and I think it is pretty well known that we have tried to sustain an English daily newspaper, and I will do that as long as we can and—but I have responsibilities too.

Mr. Fortier: You do acknowledge that you do have certain social responsibilities which is exemplified by the continuing publication of the Quebec Chronicle-Telegraph?

Mr. McCabe: I think that a good many businesses have a social responsibility to perform.

The Chairman: I think the question was, Mr. McCabe, does that paper have a special social responsibility because of its position.

Mr. McCabe: I suppose you could say that but I have never really examined it from that standpoint. I hear there are problems and we try to assist them as best we can.

Mr. Fortier: Is it your view that publishers in other parts of Canada, where French Canadians are in the minority, such as in Ontario, Manitoba or Alberta, should seek to own and publish what I will call for lack of a better definition, ghetto newspapers such as the Quebec Chronicle-Telegraph?

Mr. McCabe: I don't like that term. I wouldn't apply that to the French community in Kirkland Lake, Timmins and Sudbury, or a good many other places where there are weekly papers in the French language.

Mr. Fortier: Would you—I'm sorry.

Mr. McCabe: No, no. They are there, and we try to assist them. I think you must remember because it is a smaller population, it is exactly the same situation as the Chronicle-Telegraph is in. Advertising and circulation is limited and therefore their economic position is not good.

Mr. Fortier: It is a fact that you are continuing with the publication of the Chronicle-Telegraph because you are in a financial position as a group to do so?

Mr. McCabe: Yes, but we are pretty practical people too; as long as we think it is performing a function we are going to do it.

Mr. Fortier: And it is, in your view, performing a function?

Mr. McCabe: That is right. I am sorry I said a few things here about the Chronicle, we have no thought of discontinuing its publication, I want to make that clear.

The Chairman: I do not think you said that.

Mr. Fortier: No, no, I did not interpret it that way.

Mr. McCabe: I am saying that circulation has sunk a wee bit, and as a result it is not the viable enterprise that I would like it to be.

Mr. Fortier: If I may change the subject somewhat, Miss Hamilton referred earlier to all this helpful documentation which is sent to the newspapers in the Thomson chain in order to assist, and I suppose improve the quality of the newspapers among other things. Now, if you were to find at head office in Toronto at any given time that the quality of a particular paper in your chain was diminishing, that it was lacking in quality, what would you do?

Mr. McCabe: Let me say this. In our organization set-up we have a Canadian management group. Although for many years I performed that function we now have three or four divisions in the newspaper business in various parts of the world, Canada and the United States, and long before I heard about it, or long before the Canadian management group heard about it, one of these consultants would be working with the man.

Mr. Fortier: One of your consultants from Toronto?

Mr. McCabe: This is their function. If it is a circulation problem, an advertising problem, or an editorial problem. I would like to think they could sort of anticipate this thing, and that would never happen.

Mr. Fortier: Do you volunteer these services, or do you wait until you are asked by the individual publishers?

Miss Hamilton: You know that is a difficult question to answer, yes or no. I think the reason it is difficult is that we really are not that kind of a formal organization. In our company all of us know each other very well, and have worked together for a long time, and we have a very informal and team spirit operation, and nothing becomes formalized to that point. Certainly on occasion a publisher may say, may contact our Canadian General Manager and say, I have a particular problem in a certain area; do you think you could give us some help? But just as often the particular problem may be pin-pointed by someone in Toronto, and the communication may come on the basis—don't you think perhaps there is a particular problem in a certain area, would you like some help? It is a very informal kind of over-all group management that we are all involved in.

Mr. McCabe: You see if somebody is on his way to Woodstock he is going to drop off in Galt, and I think a lot of our valuable consultation is done that way.

Mr. Fortier: This may be a hypothetical case, but let us assume that you are most unhappy with the quality of one of your papers, consultants notwithstanding. What would you do from Toronto? How would you deal with it?

Mr. McCabe: Really this sort of thing doesn't happen, and I suppose if we were faced with it—I think if it was serious we would look at the cause. If it was management we'd be concerned—I guess it has happened, yes—isolated cases, peculiar or normal reason. We would do whatever would be suggested, whatever I think would be the right thing to do under those circumstances.

The Chairman: Go ahead, Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: I am not entirely happy with the answer.

Mr. Chairman: No, I must say that I agree with Mr. Fortier, I think that that is not sufficiently answered. Do you mean to say the man would be replaced?

Mr. McCabe: Certainly if it was necessary. We have a responsibility to our shareholders and the employees of that newspaper.

Mr. Fortier: Have you ever done that?

Mr. McCabe: Sure.

Mr. Fortier: You have. Has it ever happened that you have taken issue with one of your local editors from the point of view of—let us say contents of an editorial?

Mr. McCabe: Now, there is a difference between editors and management:

(a) The only time I discuss an editorial, and I have done this many times at meetings of managers and publishers, is to be concerned if an editorial vacuum exists in one of our newspapers. Unfortunately that happens from time to time, I think. I don't agree with what the average publisher says—well, I might say very often because some of the views expressed today that—however, I would never, ever be concerned about that because we have so many pretty good people operating our newspapers.

Mr. Fortier: But you referred earlier to "taste" as being certainly one of the norms which you feel should be enforced in your individual newspapers?

Mr. McCabe: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Well, assuming that there is an editorial published in one of your papers which in so far as you at head office are concerned, is clearly in bad taste. How would you deal with it?

Mr. McCabe: I would hope it would not happen again first of all: if it did, I'd be concerned and I'd be amazed, and I would begin to question my own confidence in my own judgment.

The Chairman: What would you do if it did happen?

Mr. McCabe: I do not know, I have never really had the problem.

The Chairman: But what would you do if it did? We accept the point that you hope it will not happen, but what would you do if it did? Even though you think it will not?

Mr. McCabe: Well, the problem—you see a man can destroy a newspaper, or destroy the capital assets equally as much by playing fast and loose with his news content, I say that to cover the whole area, as throwing a monkey wrench into a press running at high speed. We would be concerned about all these things.

Mr. Fortier: Would you not give specific instructions at that point?

Mr. McCabe: I would not give instructions somebody might discuss it with him.

Mr. Fortier: Somebody from your office?

Mr. McCabe: Well, yes, because our people are in constant touch one way or the other.

Now, I think that the publishers that are here will say that I have never given them any instructions. Now, at our annual meetings there might be some very positive discussions about these things.

Mr. Fortier: To what extent, Mr. McCabe, is it your goal to operate as an absentee owner, or absentee publisher? to what extent in the case of all your newspapers?

Mr. McCabe: Well, I don't know what that suggests.

Mr. Fortier: Are we to understand from the reading of your brief and listening to you today that as you said earlier, you are very careful not to run newspapers? Could we read into this that you just provide the services to which you referred earlier, and to which Miss. Hamilton referred, and insofar as the running of the newspaper is concerned, you do not deal with it at all?

Mr. McCabe: Running the newspaper?

Mr. Fortier: Yes, running the newspapers?

Mr. McCabe: Well, I have a constant responsibility to the shareholders on how the newspapers are run, but that does not mean to say I run them. They get into difficulty, I might be involved in a particular set of circumstances, or some of my people might be involved. As far as absentee owners, our headquarters is in Toronto, and I think that guarantees a certain amount of editorial freedom, the fact that we are not trying to tell them how to report every dog-fight that happens in town.

Senator McElman: On that point may I ask a question?

The Chairman: Yes, Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: You said, Mr. McCabe, if they should get into difficulty, is that financial difficulty?

Mr. McCabe: We like to think we are not getting into financial difficulties because we would know ahead of time.

Senator McElman: No, no. I am just asking in the answer you gave?

Mr. McCabe: I think that is a good point. Are we talking about editorial difficulties because of this bad taste that happened three times?

Senator McElman: I was not clear on your answer.

Mr. McCabe: In that case I think it is the publisher's responsibility to fix it. Somebody might say what happened to you running that stuff—this could happen, and you could understand that there was a set of circumstances and probably fix it. If it is the commercial stand point, believe me, I'd be mighty concerned because I have a direct responsibility to shareholders of a public company. Fortunately that doesn't happen too often.

Senator McElman: Supplementary on the earlier line of questions and answers. You said you would hope that an editorial policy which might be misguided would not be repeated? Is it conceivable that an editor would be permitted to repeat his misguided policy up to the point where he would suddenly get the notice, or the pink slip?

Mr. McCabe: I think it is the publisher's responsibility. I do not know how he would handle this situation. The publisher has to be concerned about these things. I do not deliver any pink slips, and the number I have fired, you could count—it would not be difficult to count. I think this also applies to—we do not do that sort of thing. I do not think you can have someone concerned with getting fired, and run a good newspaper. It must be a happy shop, and I think most of our newspapers are. Now, you see you have got to remember there are some unfortunate things that happen in newspapers; but fortunately they are not repeated. We have all read some horrible proof reading boobos on papers, you know that is not intentional, or that play or story—thus and so, and it should not have been. This is unfortunate—it does happen. I cannot ever recall as you suggested, happening twice, for goodness sakes, I am sure that nobody in our organization would have any malice towards anybody, or trying to destroy anybody by doing it twice; and if it was that I would not be aware of it and the publisher would handle it entirely in the normal course.

Senator McElman: There is a report of a recent—if I can say this in good humour please Mr. Chairman, a recent interview with Lord Thomson and he was questioned closely by people of the media. It has nothing to do with the Canadian Thomson newspapers, and he said "Well, of course, we have a policy of no interference whatsoever," and of course the hypothetical question was put to him, "If you should have a publisher or editor who after you had made a very strong position publicly, took the exact opposite view publicly very shortly afterwards, what would happen?" He said "Why, of course, we wouldn't have such a man in our employ".

Mr. McCabe: We would not have him in the first place; I think this is important. I can remember that Roy Thomson, many years ago, ran for parliament. I do not know if you are aware of that.

Miss Hamilton: I do not think that quote is exactly the way he said it.

Senator McElman: This is the way it was given to me, and I am simply relating it as authentic.

Mr. McCabe: Anyway he ran for parliament and one of the newspapers cleaned up on him, and said he had no right to run.

Senator Macdonald: May I have just one question?

The Chairman: Yes, Senator, I must just say that before you do, a lot of the Senators would like to ask questions. I know Mr. Fortier you are not through, we will return to you, but I would like to just get along as quickly as we can. Senator Macdonald?

Senator Macdonald: This is on Page 10 of your brief; you mention Roy Thomson said that most newspaper proprietors have been attracted more by the publicity they derive and the propaganda they possess than the operation of their newspapers as a business. Would you agree with that statement?

Mr. McCabe: Most are—oh, I wouldn't say most; no, no. I think he is thinking of Lord Beaverbrook who did not make any bones about it, he said I am in the business to make propaganda.

Miss Hamilton: This comment was made in the English context as you will note, it was made before the Oxford Union.

Senator Macdonald: That was made after he acquired the London Times?

Mr. McCabe: No, that is 1960, he did not acquire the London Times—I think he had the Sunday Times but there was no connection there.

Senator Macdonald: I believe I read not too long ago that the London Times was losing money at a remarkable rate for the last number of years?

Mr. McCabe: Oh, yes, I think it has. I think he is hoping to turn it—he has made a lot of progress but it doesn't seem to come out right, as he says, in the counting house. I think, he has some very able people there, and I think it will change. He will turn it, it would be nice if he did. No bearing on our enterprise, thank goodness.

Senator Macdonald: No, no bearing on it at all.

The Chairman: May I ask you how many newspapers you have in Ontario? Daily newspapers?

Miss Hamilton: I think it is 18 but I doubt if we have the count.

The Chairman: You list on Page 1, I guess it is, Thomson newspapers, 28 dailies, you list the aggregate circulation, and then the percentage of the total Canadian daily newspaper circulation. I was wondering what percentage of the total Ontario daily newspaper circulation was comprised of Thomson papers. Do you know?

Mr. McCabe: I could not tell you the Ontario circulation.

The Chairman: You have no intentions, I assume (if I am touching on some closely guarded secrets please say so) you have no intention of invading the metropolitan, the big urban metropolitan markets?

Mr. McCabe: I can only speak for myself, but if we did, I would do my best to talk our Board of Directors out of it promptly, and it has never, ever come up.

The Chairman: You say that the weekly papers you have, eventually you hope might become daily?

Mr. McCabe: Lightning will strike the community, and then we will...

The Chairman: Well, that indeed would have to be the case in some of the communities.

Mr. McCabe: Well, I don't know.

The Chairman: Well, there were one or two...

Mr. McCabe: Well, some of those in northern Ontario, yes. I have no illusions, I mean they were started by The Sudbury Star actually one of them, and I did not know anything about it. He just started, it was a practical thing to do, he had the facilities.

The Chairman: Well, I was thinking about a daily paper in places like Dunnville and Arnprior, I would think that is a while away?

Mr. McCabe: We thought great things were going to happen in Dunnville, and it has not been...

The Chairman: You own a weekly in Port Credit, I understand?

Mr. McCabe: No.

The Chairman: Is that wrong? You have no suburban papers then, so called, anywhere?

Mr. McCabe: What are suburbs today? It is very difficult to say. We have the Brampton Times.

The Chairman: Well, I would not call Brampton a suburb.

Mr. McCabe: That is about the closest one to Toronto.

The Chairman: Now, I think perhaps we might go to Senator Bourque.

Senator Bourque: A short time ago, Miss Hamilton, to a question put to you about people, you said the different executive got along like brothers, and so on?

Miss Hamilton: And sisters.

Senator Bourque: And sisters, yes, and so immediately when you told me that I looked at all of you people, and I said these people do not look like they would listen to fairy stories to me, and after all this company is in business to make money, so I said they do not look too weak to me, that is exactly what they looked like. They looked as though they could hold their own. My question is now—as Mr. McCabe has said many times, you have a responsibility to the shareholders, and I notice that you have ten, twelve daily papers, and two with a circulation of less than five thousand, and ten with a circulation of less than ten thousand. It must be very difficult in these times when you pay such high wages for all these people, and I was just wondering—now, supposing one of these little papers is losing $5,000 a month, if you will be such fairy god-fathers or god-mothers that you tap them on the back and say that is too bad, but try and do better. I wonder how many months he could carry on without one of you gentlemen coming up there and saying, “We are in this business to make money, and if you cannot make this paper pay, we will have to get somebody else.” And I would not blame you because you are not there to lose money. So, it just sounded to me as though it was being said this organization was composed of such god-given charitable people that they went up and said well, it is O.K. you know, go ahead. Now, I do not think that that is so. No company could stay in business if this was to be carried on, and you would be so kind as to let the fellow who does not know how to run the business keep on running it?

Mr. McCabe: You are entirely right, sir. We would not like that to happen if we did not see any way out. We have lost five thousand dollars a month. When you are developing a property, you expect it. Now, you do not expect it to last too long or you would be kind of concerned. We have been able to turn it in any normal set of circumstances. It is not always the fellow that is running the newspaper that is responsible for that. We have a philosophy that you cannot make one of these things pay unless you turn out a good product, and the newspaper has not developed to the point—I can think of several communities where it has not developed to the point where we have the revenues coming back. I think we have to prove to the public that we are worth buying on the news stand, or from the carrier boy; and if we do that often enough then we can prove to the advertiser we have good advertising.

It is not always the case that large circulation—a small circulation newspaper performing its function properly can be a moderately successful enterprise.

This is what we strive to develop.

Senator Bourque: But Mr. McCabe, a daily newspaper with a circulation of less than five thousand! Now, first of all he would not get much national advertising. Secondly, the retail stores in the city would find a paper that will give them a better play for their money.

Mr. McCabe: You are right. We would not be carrying much national advertising. We are not carrying a great deal anyway in any of our newspapers. I am talking smaller circulation newspapers outside the metropolitan area. We do not have very many papers in Canada. The Charlottetown Patriot is published in the plant of the Charlottetown Guardian. They do not have to have the equipment. If it was published separately today it would be a thing of the past. The fact they use the same building, in fact we had the building before we had the Patriot. We want to have an evening paper in Charlottetown as well as a very good morning paper there. Some of these others, like Quebec City that we have discussed—I agree we are not, fortunately, losing five thousand a week there, but Quebec is a little different set of circumstances. The newspaper has been published there for, I think, two hundred years, and we want to keep it going if we can.

On the other hand, if I could see no way out, I do not think—I'll be honest about it, I'd have to do something about it. Fortunately that does not happen very often. It happened in the case of the Vancouver Herald which had considerable circulation.

Senator Bourque: Now, Mr. McCabe, I understand in the Province of Quebec it is a different set-up, and it would be difficult to make it go, but am I to understand that you are going to keep on for years because it is 200 years old, that you want to publish it for another 25 years or more?

Mr. McCabe: You have to measure all these things in relation to your responsibility, and we are doing everything we can, but at a certain point, and I do not want to use the Quebec Chronicle as an example, but there is no thought in our mind now, nor at any time in the foreseeable future to close the Quebec Chronicle. But I could take some other newspaper, if it did not make sense to publish a newspaper why should we run it if the public do not want it?

Senator Bourque: There is one question I should like to ask you sir. You said that you have to do certain things because you have a fear that perhaps somebody would throw a monkey wrench in a press. Do you ever remember anything like that that occurred?

Mr. McCabe: No, no. The only thing that we have is if somebody throws a plate once in a while. I was only saying that a newspaper could be destroyed by somebody playing fast and loose with an editorial policy, and it would be the same thing as throwing a monkey wrench into the press going at high speed. I do not remember anybody ever doing that.

Senator Bourque: If a company puts a hundred million dollars into a newspaper, and simultaneously they throw a monkey wrench into the press, it would be an awful loss, and it would be very risky, and we would have a lot of insurance claims?

Mr. McCabe: No, we have never; I cannot recall anything like that. We would have a lot of insurance claims. No, I cannot recall anything like that.

Senator Bourque: Yes, it is dispelled because you know I figured from what I thought you said—well, now, this is a philanthropic business—if that is the way they do! Thank you very much.

The Chairman: I have Senator Prowse, Senator Petten, Mr. Fortier, and Senator McElman in that order.

Now, I would like to just ask one question before I turn you over to them. I believe there are some number of your newspapers that do not belong to the Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association. How many?

Miss Hamilton: I think somebody quoted eleven.

The Chairman: Eleven. That is a pretty high percentage which do not belong C.D.N.P.A. Is the decision made by those papers? Made by each individual publisher individually?

Mr. McCabe: Yes.

The Chairman: Why do they not belong?

Mr. McCabe: Previous to the decision being made, I tried to talk some of them who wanted to pull out previously, I tried to talk them into it because I do not think they should pull out. The C.D.N.P.A. is a fine organization, and most of our newspapers belong to it; it has developed in recent years to become almost an advertising sales organization. I think it is an important function they perform, but unfortunately, in my judgment, and I think in the judgment of most newspapers of smaller circulation, the smaller sized circulation, their efforts are going to contribute to the success of the larger metropolitan newspapers, and yet our dues seem to go up at a higher percentage rate than theirs, and it just doesn't make sense; and the function they are performing for the smaller circulation papers are limited.

The Chairman: Could you give me an example of one of the small circulation papers that does not belong? For example does Penticton belong?

Miss Hamilton: I think Penticton belongs, I am not sure; Kirkland Lake does not belong.

The Chairman: All right, let us take Kirkland Lake as an example.

Mr. McCabe: With a very small amount of national advertising, because their effort is all going in the national field; I have been opposed to it within the Association, and I do not think...

The Chairman: All right, that is the point I'm trying to make, which you have made. That is Kirkland Lake with a 6460 circulation; it would not cost that paper a great deal of money?

Mr. McCabe: It would cost more than the Ontario Star.

The Chairman: Much more? In relation to circulation? I think this is the point that I am trying to make.

Mr. McCabe: Much more in relation to circulation, yes.

The Chairman: And the publisher of the Northern Daily News feels that he has an insufficient amount of national, or potential national advertising to justify the membership?

Mr. McCabe: We have a sales organization in Toronto, it is not a big one but I think it is very effective.

The Chairman: Well, I was going to ask you about it, so why not you tell us now?

Mr. McCabe: Well, they perform this function.

The Chairman: Do they sell for all these papers?

Mr. McCabe: Yes.

The Chairman: Do they sell for the week-lis as well?

Miss Hamilton: Yes.

The Chairman: Senator Prowse?

Senator Prowse: Mr. McCabe, I would be interested in knowing just exactly: you are the owner, this is your function, you are the owner of the papers? the organization owns these papers, the corporation?

Mr. McCabe: I would like to be the owner, but I am not.

Senator Prowse: You are the Executive Vice-President, and therefore the person responsible for the ownership of the papers to the annual meeting of the shareholders?

Mr. McCabe: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Then you have a publisher of each paper, that is so? When you say the publisher you are talking about them? Now, how do you keep contact with them, what contacts do you have on a regular basis?

Mr. McCabe: Well, you know basically our contact is one annual meeting a year. This is an authoritative meeting where we sit down around the table, and discuss everything. He brings in a review like any other annual meeting only it is more detailed because it is professional, and I think this is where we contribute something to our papers, because we cannot be all that stupid looking at eighty some newspapers that we have not got some good ideas that we have brought from some other direction. Now, beyond that our newspapers produce a monthly statement.

Senator Prowse: A monthly statement?

Mr. McCabe: They produce a lineage report which contains other information, like circulation; but we call it a lineage report. It comes in on the 7th., 14th., 21st., and the end of the month.

Senator Prowse: The mill line, if you want to take it off you could?

Mr. McCabe: Yes, even if there is a complication because the circulation is always a month late you know. Then we have a lineage cost comparison sheet, and recently we have been getting rating reports because of our technical people that want to just compare some of these things from a standpoint of paying too much money for engravings getting out of hand. It is one of these things that can be tremendous material-wise if you do not watch. Those are the essential reports. We have a few print reports because the waste is horrible. We do have some formulas that if they do not meet the test of this, we write them a letter—did you know you were thus and so, and usually we just have to mention it because it got away on somebody.

Senator Prowse: In other words you get enough information to enable you to keep a day or week to week check on the operations?

Mr. McCabe: You could say monthly.

Senator Prowse: At least monthly. Your weekly review you keep it there and then you do your check at the end of the month?

Mr. McCabe: You see we have some retail advertising consultants and they are mighty anxious to see that lineage because you know the staff meeting with a great deal of training information to pass on—a fellow spent three days conducting a seminar.

Senator Prowse: He goes out...

Mr. McCabe: No, he doesn't go out but he teaches. I think we have one of the best text books on regional advertising that has ever been produced. We stole it from some of the best sources. I think many of the very large American papers have copies of it—we guard it very carefully because it costs a lot of money to print but it is excellent.

Senator Prowse: This is sent out for the use of the advertising manager?

Mr. McCabe: It is taken out and explained you see, or maybe there would be a seminar with the staff. You might have three or four people on the staff.

Senator Prowse: Where do the seminars take place?

Mr. McCabe: Right in the newspaper office.

Senator Prowse: In other words, one of your consultants, in effect, is travelling all the time? Let us not kid about it, but on a fairly regular basis so that you are watching that, and you are in a position so that you can look at your figures, or call for your figures, and tell at a moment whether a paper is holding its own, or going up, or going down. Am I correct?

Mr. McCabe: Yes, I think people like Miss Hamilton here, who has been with our organization for a long time, and other senior people in the company could. You get to know something about these markets, and you do not have to have many little things fall out of pattern—not only that, maybe you can understand things quicker. I might say to Bill Garner—gee, what do you think of this? And he might say, I never thought of that at all. This is the sort of thing.

Senator Prowse: In other words, you are in a position to watch and know pretty well what is happening out in the field, let us put it that way?

Mr. McCabe: On no organized basis. On this basis we do not read the papers every day, that is the point I am making.

Senator Prowse: You do not read the papers. Do you get copies of papers sent in to you?

Mr. McCabe: No.

Senator Prowse: The business end, and the advertising end, the money end you keep pretty close track of?

Mr. McCabe: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Do you have any way of checking, or do you check at all to see what they are doing editorially?

Mr. McCabe: We have a chap that quite regularly reads newspapers because he has a real concern about make-up presentation.

Senator Prowse: He is a make-up consultant?

Mr. McCabe: Well, this is part of it. If he thought—he will mark a paper and send it back to Mr. Dentreff, and in this paper perhaps the picture was poorly handled in relation to the story. I am not being specific—this is the sort of thing.

Senator Prowse: In other words you do maintain this kind of supervision as well, and this would be your make-up consultant—what do you call this fellow?

Mr. McCabe: Just a consultant in the editorial department. We have called him different things over the years...

Senator Prowse: I am sure a lot of people do. So that you keep in pretty close contact back to Mr. Dentreff, and in this paper perhaps the picture was poorly handled in relation to the story. I am not being specific—this is the sort of thing.

Mr. McCabe: Write them a very polite reply and send the letter to the publisher of the paper.

Senator Prowse: And get a reply?

Mr. McCabe: You can tell if there is any—am sure if the mayor of a community got defeated in an election, if he is coming in, he is quite upset about it, and you try to be courteous, sympathetic, but after all in the editorial I am not going to...

Senator Prowse: Now, I am going to give you a situation which I actually know happened some thirty years ago, and I know it did not happen to you, but I happen to know about it because I was a police court reporter at that time. A little grocery store man found out that a big chain store that had moved across the road was selling what was supposed to be ten pounds of sugar for less than he could buy it from the wholesale. Now, he went over and found that while it said ten pounds he bought one of them and found it weighed nine pounds, and actually there was a nine pound sack, and a one pound sack side by side, and if you were smart enough you took two of them and if you were not smart enough you took one: so he went out screaming to the Weights and Measures, and they went out and bought themselves a package, and this fellow with the chain store was then hauled into court. This was back in the time when the jam tins changed and everything else, and charges were laid against the chain store. I covered the story, and so did the reporter from the other paper: and that story never got into either of the papers.

Mr. McCabe: Well, I can say this...

Senator Prowse: Now, supposing the grocery store had written you and told you this story, that this is what happened in one of your papers? What would you do then?

Mr. McCabe: I would have raised fits. I can remember almost an identical case. I would mention the bakery but I had better not because he is still in business, but he was hauled into court. Do you remember how they used to weigh the loaves of bread, and it got to be a joke because a baker could not always hit it on the button, but this man was taken to court and I remember the fellow on the desk in the newspaper, he mentioned that he is going to get it again, or something to that effect; sort of suggesting we not run it, and we ran it because never as long as I know has any paper I have been personally connected with, ever not run police court news, as it came in. Now, I was brought up in the league to believe if I had pulled that story, even though I was quite senior in that newspaper I would have been banged on the head, or as they say "sacked". Allan Holmes, I think is one of the greatest Canadian journalists that ever was, he brought a lot of philosophies, and I think his philosophies are the governing philosophies of the Thomson newspapers today, and I just would not have wanted to have any part of that.

Senator Prowse: In other words, the Thomson chain is prepared to stand right behind any one of their publishers so there can be no interference with their editorial freedom?

Mr. McCabe: May lose a little bit of business now and then but it usually works out.

Senator Prowse: You have enough financial background, you think, to live with it?

Mr. McCabe: You cannot stay in the newspaper business if you, let us say, edit the police court news.

Senator Prowse: I see since 1946 you spent $13,000,000 in capital equipment; what have you taken in depreciation during that period?

Mr. McCabe: Normal depreciation.

Mr. Tory: One of the Senators has taken my statement.

Mr. McCabe: It would be so much on buildings.

Mr. Tory: Again this combines the U.S. and Canada, and if I may answer it this way. In Canada, and in the United States, I believe, take maximum tax depreciation on the books, and for tax purposes.

Senator Prowse: Well, what I have in mind is this, this is a period of—I think it works out to 22 years, 21 years, so that would be back from 1948 I guess, what is it 24 newspapers, or twenty-eight newspapers you put out?

Mr. Tory: Well, of course, they were not all owned during that period.

Senator Prowse: No, you acquired them over a period of time so I do not know what the percentages are, but it seems to me that out of that total operation the thirteen million you put in would hardly be more than you have been able to take in depreciation. In other words your capital costs depreciated plus your new capital injections, there would be a deficiency there?

Mr. McCabe: This is right, but I can think of newspapers we bought that we did not have to spend very much on, and these things come into balance. I can think of newspapers that had an excellent building but the equipment was decrepit.

Senator Prowse: You do what you need to?

Mr. McCabe: We are the most practical people in the world. Common sense—whether we have the money available is the guiding thing. I think like anybody else, the guiding force when we are about to spend some money is capital. I like to keep my finger in capital so that it does not get out of kilter. I do not mention where it is going but next year we plan for a couple new buildings, it has been discussed already. We bought some land last year and it may be a year or so before we get into that, but we expect to go ahead, and as we put up a building on a certain kind of land we use a little different type of equipment.

Senator Prowse: Do you buy the newsprint for the papers, or does each newspaper have its own individual contract?

Mr. McCabe: For a long time we had a contract with one company, and we paid exactly the same price whether somebody else buys it or not. I am always concerned about a source of supply, and some of that is important, but we buy from practically every newsprint company, I would not say every, but practically every newsprint company here and there.

Senator Prowse: Yes, thank you.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: There is no quantity discount of any nature?

Mr. McCabe: I have not been able to find it. I have tried mind you.

The Chairman: May I just interrupt to say that the statement was returned by Senator Everett that was referred to a few moments ago.

Senator Prowse: You supply training material for your staff? You supply them with your own managing editors' conference, this is what this annual meeting really amounts to?

Mr. McCabe: No...

Senator Prowse: Or a little more than that.

Mr. McCabe: It covers everything. Everything to deal with that newspaper, but it is usually held with the publisher.

Senator Prowse: It is not in a group?

Mr. McCabe: Oh, no.

Senator Prowse: Oh, so each fellow comes in once a year for a report.

Mr. McCabe: Yes, it is our main contact, this is where our people are educated about the affairs of that particular property, and they bring in their information. Actually they project themselves for a year just like the government does in their projections.

Senator Prowse: Yes, I see. They come in and report on what they are doing, and then set up their budget for next year?

Mr. McCabe: Yes. It is really what they are doing next year because this permits us to look at capital, looking at something we should be doing in this direction. Here are four people going to do this—and what do we think about it? And we make suggestions.

Senator Prowse: Now, what other service do you provide them? In the way of what news services are going to—say the Penticton paper, he is the one that wrote the nice letter, isn't he? All right now, what service did that paper get after Thomson had bought it that he was unable to provide for them, or was not providing?

Mr. McCabe: Well, it is not fair in that case because remember it was a twice weekly paper, and we went daily; and when we went daily we naturally or shortly after we put in Canadian Press in its entirety which he did not have.

Senator Prowse: Well, let us take if one of these were taken over today as a daily as a going concern?

Mr. McCabe: You see, let me make the point, I do not think that our function is to bring a lot of news services in, except what brought in the small papers I think, at least we pushed to the extent that the Canadian Press wire photo services. Small papers, we have always felt, if they got the text they should have the pictures to go with it on the wire so they are current; but really we are essentially a local newspaper. I think our approach to the news content of that paper would be encouraging: yes, even more than that, to improve, to the maximum extent the coverage of the local scene. We can go in detail on contents, what our newspapers

Senator Prowse: Well, you have Mr. Nicholson here in Ottawa, you provide the with that service from Ottawa. Do you have representatives in the provincial capitals?

Mr. McCabe: No, except Ontario, we have a couple of men in Toronto.

Senator Prowse: I see.

Mr. McCabe: Momentarily, until next month we have only one but we'll have two again. We have two in Ottawa. Mr. Nicholson writes a column, but because we are a little concerned with some columns that you can buy you know, we would like to try to cover the whole spectrum, as it were. On the other hand we have another man, Mr. Farmer Tissington, and he is a very competent man. He was an editor of a couple of . .

The Chairman: Even Mr. Fisher said that two days ago.

Mr. McCabe: Mr. Fisher? Mr. Tissington's job is to report local news for papers because we found the only shortcoming of the Canadian Press, and believe me, I think it is the best press service in the world, and it is as good as half a dozen that you see in the British Press Service, and certainly it is as good as anything in the United States...

Mr. Chairman: Before I interrupt you, what do you think is wrong with the Canadian Press?

Mr. McCabe: I am a member of the Board; if I thought there was anything wrong, I'd . .

The Chairman: You think it cannot be improved?

Mr. McCabe: Oh, well, you can improve anything.

The Chairman: How would you improve it?

Mr. McCabe: I cannot give a suggestion. The Canadian Press are criticizing themselves every time they sit down, and I look around this room and see a lot of the Canadian Press critics, and they go at it hammer and tongs, and I think this is why it is a good service because over the years the contributions of Norman Smith and some of these other people have made the Canadian Press have the significance it has.

The Chairman: Well, I don't think it downgrades the Canadian Press to say it could be improved. I think a member of the Canadian Press here the other day said it could be improved.

Senator Prowse: We are going to lose our conversation if we get too many people in here.

Mr. McCabe: Yes.

The Chairman: I take your point, Senator Prowse, carry on.

Mr. McCabe: The point I was making, the criticism our editors are making of the Canadian Press is that a story of only interest in Peterborough, or Prince Albert, Saskatchewan, or apples in the Okanagan would never warrant the Canadian Press wire to transmit that distance, and this is a tremendous story when it is in the Kelowna paper from a local standpoint, and this is something that I think has strengthened our papers.

Senator Prowse: These are the services that you are able to provide which they could not provide for themselves?

Mr. McCabe: Well, Miss Hamilton just pointed out one thing—we have been concerned too. I think maybe what some of these fancy fellows charge us with is that we do not carry enough interpretive material in our newspaper. Well, what we have had for some time, we have a very well-known Canadian journalist, I think he is pretty good, by the name of Philip Deane, who analyzes foreign news. Now, we keep him on foreign news because the Canadian Press report is pretty good from a foreign news stand, but we like to have the background written by a Canadian. Now, that chap has pretty wide experience, he was on the overseas staff of the Globe for years. He was a far east correspondent, I think, originally with the London Observer. I believe too for a short time, I do not know what happened to him, he was U Thant's Executive Assistant in the United Nations; and we have had him for quite some years, and he is doing an excellent job, I think, of interpreting the Canadian Press, or of interpreting the foreign news. I think this is of tremendous importance. We do try to carry a pretty full budget of foreign news.

We also have, and this we have taken a couple of tries at; one, we have a gentleman here in Ottawa by the name of Frank Flaherty who writes a financial column. Where we are concerned there, there are many of the financial—well, take the white paper, income tax, this consumer price index. This sort of thing is sometimes as it is reported in the day to day news, and is sufficiently complete enough for the average reader—so we could not get a good column, so we got Mr. Flaherty and I think he writes twice a week, and they can use it if they want to—there is no requirement. This is the sort of thing that we are discussing the other day...

Senator Prowse: Is that the sort of thing that is carried in the off-time by the Canadian Press?

Mr. McCabe: Some of it would be, I think Patrick Nicholson is carried on off-time; of course Farmer Tissington would not be because it goes to so many separate places.

Some of the Ontario papers, we simply bug some of the standing time on the wire, or we use up that wire. We have, I do not know what all, on it right now. It is one of these things that might change.

Senator Prowse: I notice your charges, what is it you get? 7.9 per cent of the daily circulation, or something like that, and you pay what is it? 13.1 per cent, or is it 13.4 per cent of the Canadian Press charges. Would that difference be as a result of the difference in the rates or because of the services you get there?

Mr. McCabe: Senator Prowse, it is really difficult. I think we pay Canadian Press too much, but I was Chairman of the Assessment Committee that set—or established these rates so my hands are tied.

Senator Prowse: You can complain but that is all.

Mr. McCabe: There are so many factors, and it varies. It has tried to be a fair proposition. I do not agree with all of it naturally; but the Toronto Star at the other end on the totem pole probably would not agree with me.

Senator Prowse: Do you have a group style book?

Mr. McCabe: No, we have used the Canadian Press; you see we think it is better that all newspapers be standard, and we have encouraged all our papers to get their local style exactly with Canadian Press because you cannot change it very well. You would be editing like mad.

Senator Prowse: I think that is all.

The Chairman: Senator Petten, you have a question, I think?

Senator Petten: Well, Mr. McCabe, Senator Prowse has asked two of the questions I was going to ask you: but I would like to follow what he was saying about the Canadian Press. Do you have a policy that you apply to all your papers on C.P. copy—how it should be used? Do you keep track of how much they use? And are they expected to use a certain amount? As you said this is a very expensive service to you so because of this I wonder if somebody keeps particular track, and how much each uses?

Mr. McCabe: No, they would not because putting the newspaper together, again is the responsibility of this autonomous publisher, and he in turn has his editors that handle it. I think it would show itself if he was not using enough.

Senator Petten: And now if you found he was not using enough?

Mr. McCabe: I think this—because of the way—and I say this because I think our smaller city editors do an excellent job of editing C.P. copy. They might not carry a many long stories as some newspapers.

Senator Petten: You are satisfied they use it?

Mr. McCabe: I think that you might be better informed if you were reading the Guelph Reporter than some other much larger newspapers.

Miss Hamilton: I think we might mention the publisher himself does have a measurement of paper on a spot check basis, for one week at a time—quarterly, is it? I am not sure. They do it themselves, and what they do is measure the total contents of the paper and break it down as between wire news, local news, local features, and syndicated features.

Mr. McCabe: The reason that was done, I think the point you are getting at, sir, is not just to put some canned features into the paper, and let it go at that. We would sooner have many more local stories and good C.I. live stories. We measured and counted for that reason, but again it is up to the publisher to control the quantity, and I think again there is a variation in newspapers as to actual quality of writing.

Senator Petten: Thank you.

The Chairman: For the benefit of the witnesses, and the benefit of the Senators I am going to attempt to adjourn this Session at six o'clock. I think that is being realistic if I sense the amount of questioning that is left. I have Mr. Fortier, Senator McElman, and I have a couple; so we shall try to conclude at six o'clock so we can all have dinner, and come back at eight o'clock. The only reason I am saying this is to indicate what my thinking is in terms of time so that the Senators will appreciate. I will go I think according to that order. I have: Senator McElman, Senator Everett, and then Mr. Fortier. Senator McElman Senator McElman: I would just like to put a supplementary at this point, and probably come back later.

The Chairman: All right.

Senator McElman: In order to avoid repetition on this last subject we dealt with C.P. Now, you provide a syndicated column, and articles, and cartoons, and comic strips, and so on, is that right?

Mr. McCabe: Well, yes and no. We do not supply comic strips. There are very few advantages to the group operation newspapers in purchasing. I think we have discussed certain features—these many editors would like this feature, and what is the price? Our people would do that, and that is why I say that certain features, essential features are sought on that basis. I think we have the top features—I am talking more or less now of the entertainment features.

Most of our papers cannot keep a good political cartoonist—just does not make sense. One of our papers in Sudbury has one, and a very good one. We have made arrangements with other newspapers in Canada to buy their cartoons so what we try to do is send a newspaper—let us say there are seven days of the week—he might end up with what, 15 or 20 cartoons, and select the most appropriate for his approach because you know the cartoons in the bigger papers are so political.

Senator McElman: Quite outside of C.P. costs you do provide service, of course, of our own aside from C.P. on a head office basis, service which includes syndicated columns, and so forth; and these specialists you speak of, consultants, I believe you call them, who do a great amount of work for the member papers. Now, in this material provided outside of C.P. presumably it costs a fair amount to the overall structure, as do these other services. How is this cost allotted out? on a circulation basis?

Mr. McCabe: I think with very few exceptions, some we just cannot divide up properly. It is charged right to the paper by the syndicate. It is just to save bookkeeping. There is no useful function or any benefit. There is no charge.

Senator McElman: A minimum charge whether they are used or not?

Mr. McCabe: Oh, yes. You buy a feature, and that is it.

Miss Hamilton: That is the syndicate charge. The syndicate make a charge.

Mr. McCabe: In our own features we do not charge our own papers anything. We cannot seem to work it out on a sensible basis. I have two publishers, and when we used to try to work it out, it would get into some argument, and we decided that a certain type of services which is the bulk of our general news service, we do not charge them.

Mr. Fortier: What are those services?

Mr. McCabe: Various columns. Ottawa, Toronto coverage. Phillip Deane, the economics writer—oh, I am sure there are more. I cannot think of them right now.

The Chairman: Do you object—you mentioned a moment or two ago the cartoons in the big papers being so politically biased. Do you object to politically biased editorial cartoons?

Mr. McCabe: Oh, no, but our editors, if they do not agree—so we give them 15 or 20.

Miss Hamilton: So they can make up their own minds.

The Chairman: Well, I have a question or two more but I think I shall perhaps wait until later—Yes, Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: May I get back to the central point, please. I can appreciate how readily your organization could charge out on an equitable basis the costs for general services of these consultant types you speak of, but what I would like to get at, quite aside from this, you obviously buy syndicated items and so on that you have told us you supply out which they use, or they do not use, at their own discretion. Now, let me put it this way, let us say there is one of your member papers that took only 7 per cent of what you feed out to him, is there some correlating percentage that he would pay whether he used it or not? Is there a minimum?

Mr. McCabe: No.

Miss Hamilton: As each publisher and editor chooses the features that he uses from the total package, then he is charged only for the features that he chooses.

Senator McElman: It is on a usage basis.

Miss Hamilton: Yes. Now, that is not true on the columnist because he is not charged for the columnist. He is provided with a columnist, and either uses them or not as he chooses—but on the syndicated features, he does.

Senator McElman: Conceivably you could be buying a package at head office level that nobody would use?

Mr. McCabe: Believe me, we do not. This is done with a certain amount of thought given to it. Take a certain feature package, put it that way, just for the sake of another term, at least a newspaper needs "X" number of comics, may have six or seven comics. Well, the newspaper will say "I do not like these others and I am going to pay for some more—and so I will take Little Abner." Well, I do not know what they are but they decide they want this to round out their package, round out their page. Well, they go and buy that on their own and all we have done is arrange a price if they want to buy it. It is not much of a saving but it is something we have done for years. It is infinitesimal.

Senator Prowse: You send a catalogue in other words.

Mr. McCabe: Yes.

The Chairman: Senator Everett?

Senator Everett: Mr. McCabe, in the December 31st 1967 statement, you show an increase in publishing rights and good will of fifty-seven million dollars?

Mr. McCabe: Since the figures are so big, and I have one of my fellow-directors here—John, would you care to answer that?

Mr. Tory: Well, that increase would be largely attributable to acquisitions, and largely to the Brush-Moore activity.

Senator Everett: How much would Brush-Moore be of that figure?

Mr. Tory: Well...

Senator Everett: Is the $57,000,000 the total amount of acquisitions, or do you have to add to that?

Mr. Tory: No, no. You would have to add on the fixed assets.

Senator Everett: So somewhere in the neighbourhood...

Mr. Tory: Well, it varies from acquisition to acquisition. The proportion of the good-will varies depending on how much fixed assets there are and what value they have.

Senator Everett: That $57,000,000 I suppose is the excess over what value you pay, is it?

Mr. Tory: Not exactly, but it is close enough that I will agree with you.

Senator Everett: Do you want to be more exact?

Mr. Tory: Well, the assets are actually taken, and I believe—at least in the Brush-Moore the assets are taken at their appraised values, fixed assets; and I think there is about $45,000,000 of that figure is goodwill attributable to Brush-Moore acquisition.

Senator Everett: Over and above the appraised value?

Mr. Tory: Of the fixed assets, yes. The total price was in the range of $72,000,000.

Senator Everett: $72,000,000. In 1967 Thomson Newspaper Limited had an operating revenue of $82,000,000, and a net before taxes of $20,000,000 but as you stated earlier that included both Canadian holdings and United States holdings?

Mr. Tory: Yes.

Senator Everett: Could you tell us what the division of those two figures is?

Mr. McCabe: That information has not been published generally; I suppose we would be delighted to go into it privately, there are so many complications.

The Chairman: Well, would you send that to us privately at the Senate?

Mr. McCabe: Yes, yes.

Senator Everett: The question of depreciation policy was discussed before. What date of depreciation do you apply to equipment, or do you apply the allowable rate, what is the allowable rate?

Mr. McCabe: Twenty percent for equipment. That is some of the equipment.

Senator Everett: Probably class called newspaper?

Mr. Tory: No, I believe it falls into the general class 8 which is 20 per cent, most of the equipment falls into that category; all of it, I believe.

Senator Everett: Mr. McCabe, why did you not, or have you tried to buy some of these suburban newspapers around Toronto?

Mr. McCabe: We were in with the Star for a couple. It is a slightly different proposition. We have what you might call a U.S. suburban newspaper. They seem to be different here though—just have not the particular market available—have not appealed to us. We have Oshawa not far from Toronto. We have had that for many years. Also Brampton.

ton, I suppose 15 miles northwest of Toronto. We have Barrie 70 miles north of Toronto.

Senator Everett: Yes.

The Chairman: What are the two Toronto papers that Senator Everett is asking here?

Mr. McCabe: Port Credit Weekly, and...

Miss Hamilton: Port Credit Weekly and the Oakville paper.

The Chairman: And the Star owns half and you own half?

Mr. McCabe: We had a management contract.

Senator Everett: I was coming to that. I notice in the statement you talk about a management contract, would you tell us roughly without giving details how these work?

Mr. Tory: Well, there is a charge made by the head office, which I believe in the case of the Canadian newspapers, is 3 per cent of the gross newspaper revenues. It may be that in the case of the newspapers that were owned with the Star it was 4 per cent, I think it was.

Mr. McCabe: All Canadian newspapers are 4 per cent.

Mr. Tory: Is it all 4 per cent?

Mr. McCabe: Some of these other services we contribute would be paid out of that 4 per cent.

Senator Everett: Are those the only management agreements you have, the ones with the two Star papers?

Mr. Tory: One of the newspapers, one of the 28 listed is Kirkland Lake, and it is not actually in Thomson Newspapers Limited, it is owned by Topp Holding Company and it is similar management agreement.

Senator Everett: It is controlled by Thomson?

Mr. Tory: Yes.

Mr. McCabe: And in the Caribbean, we do not own the papers. Papers such as those in Trinidad and Puerto Rico—we keep a watching brief on their performance and in a sense perform the same function we do with any of our others, and I think we charge them—I think it is the same.

Senator Everett: Three per cent of the gross revenue?

Mr. McCabe: We do not give them as much, we do not give them any services, the columns that we have in the Canadian newspapers would not be of value so we cut it slightly.

Senator Everett: Do you have any financial interests in them?

Mr. McCabe: Not our company, they are owned by the other companies associated or owned by the Thomson family and we have the responsibility of keeping in mind this management.

Senator Everett: Do you offer this management service to any paper that is not associated with the Thomson family?

Mr. McCabe: I do not think she is entirely correct, she said nobody wanted it. (Mr. McCabe is referring to a comment interjected by Miss Hamilton.) I think what she really meant is that life is too short, and we have enough to do now, sir.

Senator Everett: Is it your policy when you buy a paper to increase the amounts of advertising lineage in relation to the total lines of the paper?

Mr. McCabe: You mean the percentage of advertising to news?

Senator Everett: Yes, from 30 per cent to 50 per cent?

Mr. McCabe: No, because I do not think in any modern day newspaper the percentage of advertising the news means anything except as a test after the fact. I think almost any newspaper of any significance that I am aware of in North America operates on a news-hole basis. They sell to their subscribers "X" numbers of columns of news for a dime. When we have a budget the city council budget or a federal government budget they pump that up to accommodate the additional need—they need more space that day. If there is a flood in a community, and you have to run a page of pictures you would increase your news hole. But the basic control figure of a modern newspaper would be the news-hole. This is what they sell for subscription purposes, that amount of news, and they have that amount of news if they have say 30 per cent advertising, and they have that amount of news if they had 70 per cent like some of the big papers. I like that big case on our newspapers but unfortunately we do not have it very often.

Senator Everett: I do not know that answers the question. You might be providing this amount of news but the question I am asking is a percentage?

Miss Hamilton: If I followed your question you said did we increase the percentage of advertising? now, do you mean by that that we decrease the amount of news?

Senator Everett: The news may be constant and it may expand?

Miss Hamilton: Well, I think the view on that is you sell all you possibly can, it increases in every newspaper profit in every year as the market expands.

Senator Everett: The percentage you devote to a total issue though, do you make a conscious attempt to increase that. Let us assume that you bought a paper that would give 30 per cent of the columns devoted to advertising, and 70 per cent to editorial, would you consciously go out to increase that percentage to say 40 per cent?

Mr. McCabe: Oh, yes, of course, we would make every effort we could to sell advertising because in addition to this editorial function is a community we think a newspaper has a very important economic function to the retail community, or commercial community.

Senator Everett: I can appreciate that but I am talking about the percentage Mr. McCabe?

Mr. McCabe: We would not reduce the news-hole if the news-hole was say 60 columns for a newspaper I cannot imagine us cutting it to 50 which would influence that fact.

Miss Hamilton: I think perhaps the answer is that most daily newspapers that I am aware of, have more page press capacity than they fill normally. So at any time that you are able to sell more advertising, it is not a problem to producing additional advertising. In other words, you always can produce as much advertising as you sell for any one issue. And so, really on his basis, certainly if you sold more advertising at a time when you were not contemplating increasing your news-hole, then your percentage would go up. Three months later you might decide you wanted to increase your news-hole because of the continuing requirement for more news. In that case, this might have the effect of lowering the advertising, but it is an effect to a cause, rather than a cause.

Senator Everett: Yes, somewhere in your brief you talk about the decrease in the amount of national advertising over the years. Does that indicate that you are dependent for your revenue on an increasing amount of retail advertising, or classified advertising?

Mr. McCabe: I think this was always the case in smaller circulation papers. The important area was the retail because we are local newspapers opposed to regional, or metropolitan or national—whatever you call it. The classified advertising has grown in recent years. I think most of our newspapers carry much more classified advertising than national advertising, as such. I think what has happened is this—some certain types of advertising which at one time were placed as national advertising, today is placed as local through the distributors or merchants in the area. This has changed the amount we bill out as national advertising.

Senator Everett: Do you have a policy or that? National goods advertised by local advertisers does that draw the local rate of national rate?

Mr. McCabe: I would not know. It is something that over the years this newspaper business has kicked around, and some of the newspapers have and some have not. I have just not got into it.

The Chairman: Would that be a decision up to each individual newspaper?

Mr. McCabe: Yes.

Mr. Chairman: So some might, and some might not. Senator Everett?

Senator Everett: I will not ask you any questions along that line. Just two more questions. You made the point about the estate tax—the combination of the new white paper and the estate tax I think Mr. Tory made the point, that this would cause...

Mr. McCabe: I think not only in the new paper business but I think small business a over is going to get hit on the head if that comes about. I think it is frightening.

Senator Everett: Would you say that Thomson Newspapers Limited...

Mr. McCabe: No, corporation could hardly have a view on a thing like this. We just expressed it as one of the reasons why.

Senator Everett: Would it be fair to say that Thomson Newspapers Limited foresaw an increased expansion through the purchasing of small family newspapers due to the Estate Tax Act and the White Paper, if it is implemented?

The Chairman: I think Mr. Tory wants to say something.

Mr. Tory: Well, it is really my comment so I will get Mr. McCabe off the hook, I would expect the combination of the two taxes would result in more small businesses being sold to large businesses, yes. And I would think it would apply equally to the newspaper business as any other. I realize when I say that that in the announcement the government has said they do not intend to impose a capital gains tax on death but it either will be payable immediately on death if the business has to be sold at that time to pay an estate tax, or it will be deferred until the time of the sale, and the capital gains tax payable on the difference between the sale price and the original cost to the deceased plus the estate tax attributable to capital gain—if you follow me.

Senator Everett: So you see as a result of the exercise of these two pieces of legislation that the chains will accelerate their ownership of the individually owned newspapers?

Mr. Tory: Well, I do not say necessarily that will be the result, but I think the general result...

Senator Everett: Isn't that what you are saying?

Mr. Tory: Well, I suppose you might draw that conclusion: I think it is a fair conclusion to draw, yes.

Mr. McCabe: I think personally that with all the things in the White Paper coupled with the succession duties Act as it presently is, the chain or anybody else in Canada is not going to have any money to buy anything. It couldn't matter—I think this is the inevitable conclusion.

Senator McElman: Is that an editorial?

Mr. McCabe: Somebody else brought it up, and it is too obvious.

Senator Everett: One last question, Mr. McCabe, do you think anything in the interests of Canadians would be served if companies that operated media interests were required to publish annual financial statements?

Mr. McCabe: Providing every other business in the country did.

Senator Everett: Only that business?

Mr. McCabe: You can't differentiate. We are the same as anybody else as people, as a company. I think it is frightening to think you are going to file separately for me. I mean this is a big subject and a very dangerous one. I do not mean that in particular now, but I think when you apply a rule to one business it should be across the board.

Senator Everett: Thank you.

The Chairman: Before we go on to Mr. Fortier's questioning, I realize we discussed this, but what is going to happen in Thunder Bay? the decision has not been made?

Mr. McCabe: I think you could say that.

The Chairman: When do you think the decision will be made?

Mr. McCabe: I think as circumstances dictate it. The first of the year is the time that they are going to merge. Some of our people don't think we should do anything. Other people think we should do it thus and so.

The Chairman: What is your opinion?

Mr. McCabe: I do not know.

The Chairman: Really you do not?

Mr. McCabe: No, I don't.

Mr. Tory: If I might make one comment Senator Davey, Mr. McCabe said that nobody really knows yet whether that will become one market or remain as two markets, and I think that is the significant point, and I think that is why he cannot tell you the answer now.

The Chairman: Well, you have a lot to do with that decision I would think. The decision you make might lead the people...

Mr. McCabe: Well, in an organization like ours, a lot of these decisions are made in the normal course of events. Now, mind you, if I do not agree with it, we might change it, but I don't think I have ever done so. We have responsible people.

The Chairman: Well, reference to Thunder Bay leads me to a reference of a former member of Parliament for that part of the world, our friend Douglas Fisher, who Mr. Tory spoke about earlier Mr. Fisher in his brief the other day said and I quote "What does the Thomson ownership offer to a city beyond the basic Canadian press service and syndicated features? To be blunt, very little Uniform sloppy lay-out, inept local coverage at the editorial level, and usually safe editorials, and copious amounts of advertising are the trade marks of the Thomson paper" I am sure you have all seen that reference in his brief the other day. I particularly wanted to ask you about his reference to "inept local coverage" I am sure you would not describe your local coverage as "inept". How would you describe it. Are you satisfied with your local coverage?

Mr. McCabe: I think our local coverage is, I will say slightly better than the North American average of papers that size. I could say several things about Mr. Fisher because I am sure that he said he had some pretty unfortunate situations in local coverage in Port Arthur. As you know he went to the lakehead as a high school teacher. He was brought up in Toronto, and spent a few years there and became...

The Chairman: No, I think in fairness he was brought up in Port Arthur.

Mr. McCabe: But anyway he ran in a political election there and he defeated the late C.D. Howe. The Port Arthur Chronicle supported C. D. Howe with a great deal of vigor, and I think this created a situation.

The Chairman: Well, I don't...

Mr. McCabe: I think this is his experience with local coverage, and that is all. I don't know of any experience he has...

The Chairman: Yes, I just did not want to get into a discussion about Mr. Fisher, he made some very strong comments. If you disagree—and I can quite understand your interest in this local coverage question—is there any proportion of staff-written material in your papers, any ground rule, or any area of guidance of staff material?

Miss Hamilton: I think firstly that it does vary at every newspaper. I think every one of our papers is conscious of the need to cover the local news, and of course you can understand it varies very greatly. A market like Galt as a case point, would have a great deal more local news than Moose Jaw, the reason being the Galt newspaper covers the local news of Galt, Preston, and Hespeler.

The Chairman: What about a market like Sudbury?

Miss Hamilton: Sudbury carries—I don't have any figures—but it carries a large local news budget. It carries a large news budget in toto.

The Chairman: Well, we did some content analysis of some Canadian newspapers, several of which were Thomson papers, and one of them was Sudbury. We found it fared very badly in terms of local news coverage.

Miss Hamilton: I think in checking news coverage of a newspaper you have to do it over a relatively extended period.

The Chairman: How extended?

Miss Hamilton: I would say at least month.

The Chairman: We did it over three months.

Miss Hamilton: I cannot give figures of Sudbury simply because I did not happen to bring them, but I can say for instance the just pulling out a few at random, Guelph Mercury is a case in a point, carries in an average issue 23 columns of wire news and 22.9 columns of local news.

The Chairman: Let me say in this connection, the other Thomson newspapers were not as bad as Sudbury.

Mr. McCabe: How did they fare badly?

The Chairman: In staff-written material

Mr. McCabe: I am sure they took this in consideration. They do replate there. The replate there is considerable. Do you know how far they haul a paper-up to Parry Sound?

The Chairman: May I ask you one other question—it ties into your comments on Mr. Fisher, and may I say to my colleagues this is the last question that I am going to ask, and then we shall turn to Mr. Fortier. I was interested in the section of your brief in which you indicated the editorial selection by the Thomson papers as to which party they were supporting in the general election last year. I think you indicated that nine supported Mr. Trudeau—on page 25 at the top of the page—9 of them specifically recommended the election of a liberal candidate, 3 of them recommended the election of a Conservative candidate, and the remainder made no recommendation."

Senator Prowse: Fire them.

The Chairman: Has there been a Federal election—say in the last ten or fifteen years, or twenty years—in which all Thomson newspapers supported one political candidate, or one political party?

Mr. McCabe: It has never, never happened; and I wouldn't have that information if it was not for this hearing.

The Chairman: Well, this hearing has had a beneficial effect.

Let me read you a letter. I tell the press here that there is great public interest in this study. I get quite an interesting number of letters, and I would like to read you a letter I received only yesterday. It does not relate specifically to Thomson papers I might say, but I would like your comment on it. It is from Owen Sound, Ontario. It is not marked personal, and it is from Mr. J. C. Stevenson. He says—"Dear Senator: Sometime before commission hearings conclude I should like publishers to be asked", and he quoted the question he wants me to ask: "Why, if the press is free and editors have been given a free hand, (even in newspaper chains) does not one newspaper in English Canada support editorially the New Democratic Party? If editors are free and represent the Canadian public, and are university graduates, as many are, why do they not represent proportionately the 20-25 per cent of their fellow English Canadians who support that party. I should be delighted to have them answer this question and, if no one else asks, to have you ask."

And there is a P.S. and he says, "Or am I unaware of those that do? The Toronto Star sometimes gives support until election time."

I think this is a valid question?

Mr. McCabe: I think it is a good question. I don't know really the facts. There is 25 per cent of the people that vote for a political party. I think the editor follows public opinion. He tries not to get ahead of it—I hope; but he follows it pretty closely. If there is only 25 per cent of the voters, he is going to look at this in the broad scheme. I am just trying this without having thought about the subject.

The Chairman: Well, I can assure you that I am not soliciting support for the N.D.P., but I do make the point—and I am speaking to you now in the capacity as I think of you—as a very senior person in journalism in Canada.

Is it not strange—does not Mr. Stevenson have a point that of over one hundred daily newspapers in Canada none of them support the New Democrats editorially?

Mr. McCabe: Well now, just 25 per cent of the voters—now I have not thought about this at all but I suspect that if I was an editor, and I knew that only 25 per cent...

Mr. Tory: Only 20 to 25 per cent according to his figures.

The Chairman: Let us say it is 20 to 25 per cent.

Mr. McCabe: One publisher just slipped a note up here—I don't know whether this is right or not—the Peterborough Examiner has given editorial support to Walter Pitman, a Provincial N.D.P. but I didn't know.

The Chairman: Actually editorialized that he should be elected?

Mr. McCabe: I think many newspapers—I know the Toronto Star doesn't do it exactly this way. They might have opinions between elections, I think unfortunately newspapers sometimes back away in smaller cities from supporting a specific candidate at election time, and frankly I was quite surprised that so many of our newspapers had definite political endorsements.

The Chairman: I do not want to prolong this part of the discussion, I would like to talk but in fairness...

Senator McElman: On a point of order as a member of this Committee I will not accept on the face of it, without some research, the fact that he presents as a fact, that none knew. I do not think we have basis for making a judgment of the Committee at this point.

The Chairman: Well, we can perhaps...

Senator McElman: I want to go on the record that even if this statistic is presented as a statement of fact, it is not necessarily so.

The Chairman: Well, I take your point of order, and we shall perhaps study this to find out. I would be inclined however to agree with the correspondent, but I agree as a judgment, and not as a fact, and we will certainly check this out. Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: I think it follows naturally from what you were just discussing, I am reading from Paragraph 65 on Page 26 of your brief. "It must be recognized that it would be inopportune for a local newspaper of record in a small community to be unduly opinionated". May I ask why you make that statement?

Mr. McCabe: Because there is one newspaper in the town, and who am I, as the publisher of the Galt Reporter, to put on spurs and try to ram down the throats of readers in the community, that we should close Grand Avenue Bridge, or we should close Main Street Bridge.

Mr. Fortier: If you as the publisher of the local...

Mr. McCabe: I don't think that I have any God-given right to become involved with something—I am getting a little...

Miss Hamilton: I think the operative word there is unduly. I think it is important to read that into it.

Mr. McCabe: We tried to indicate in our brief, in the Appendix, that our people do take very unpopular stands, but this "unduly" I get a little concerned about it. One newspaper in the town taking a very aggressive position on something. I think we have to supply the facts to the public, and interpret as much as we can, and let it go at that.

Mr. Fortier: Well, that is as far as the news is concerned; but editorially if one of your publishers believes that something is right, then should he not stress it?

Miss Hamilton: I think you have to read the rest of the paragraph.

Mr. McCabe: "Nevertheless, an examination of the editorial pages of Thomson newspapers shows that these newspapers have not been reluctant to comment editorially on public affairs in a controversial way".

Miss Hamilton: There is a difference between "controversial" and "unduly", "unduly opinionated".

Mr. McCabe: And I think "unduly" there is meant to reflect the responsibility in the press.

Mr. Fortier: "Unduly", in the sense that it is used in The Combines Investigation Act?

Mr. McCabe: I don't follow that. Ask Mr. Tory about that.

Mr. Fortier: O.K. How would you relate that statement to the statement on the following page, in your conclusion that "A newspaper by its very nature must be a disturbing force in its community"?

Mr. McCabe: Well, I think this all has to be taken together to be understood, and maybe if we took the time to read our conclusion, the whole thing together would suggest that I think it is purely a matter of degree really. This was an attempt at a choice of words to indicate a degree of responsibility, and editorial opinion as well as news coverage.

Miss Hamilton: Yes, an editorial opinion as well as news coverage, yet controversial and giving an adequate amount of leadership.

Mr. Fortier: For a local newspaper to be opinionated is not bad, per se but for it to be unduly opinionated...

Mr. McCabe: Well, we were trying to make the point that—I suppose we are trying to put our best foot forward to the total industry, meaning non-metropolitan newspapers.

Mr. Fortier: I wanted some clarification. You have answered it.

On the question of local coverage which was referred to by the Chairman with reference back to Mr. Fisher's statement before this Committee, this morning as you may or may not know that a Dr. Abel associated with the Canadian Council on rural development appeared before the Committee. She referred to the coverage of the local scene in Prince Edward Island by your two newspapers; and she made the statement which I think I can summarize as follows: that in coverage—local coverage of the P.E.I. scene and generally that of the Atlantic Provinces—in your newspapers in P.E.I. was inept. Would you care to comment on that?

Mr. McCabe: Well, this is one...

The Chairman: I want to be fair to the witness, I do not think she said "inept", I think she said that the Islanders were poorly informed. I think that is probably an accurate quote.

Mr. McCabe: But I think it is an inaccurate statement. There are two newspapers there and I would say there is a lot more news being published, columns of news being published in the Guardian and the Patriot, unless things have changed in the last month or so.

Miss Hamilton: Of course it is difficult to tell from that statement whether she was referring to the quantity of local news, or to the method of presentation.

Mr. McCabe: Or to some particular type of news in which she was personally interested; and that is a horse of a different colour, I think if she talked to the publisher he would be glad to consider the possibility...

The Chairman: Well, now, Mr. McCabe having said that Mr. Fortier was unfair in describing it as inept, I now think you have been unfair the other way. I think you have gone much too far.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Spears tells me that she spoke of "poor coverage", to use your own words, and she referred specifically—Mr. Spears informs me—to development?

The Chairman: Economic development, rural development.

Miss Hamilton: Well, I think the only thing we could add that might throw a little light, as to whether the local coverage of the Charlottetown Guardian and Patriot was relatively broad and adequate, is to comment on their latest story counts survey. We referred to it in our brief as to some of the other papers; and an average day at the time of the last surveys completed for Charlottetown, the Patriot and Guardian between them carried on each and every day 87.6 locally written stories.

Mr. Fortier: That answers my question but I thought you should have a chance to comment.

Mr. McCabe: I am concerned, people sometimes in a particular instance—for instance I like trout fishing, and the Ottawa papers do not carry near enough information about trout fishing.

Mr. Fortier: As owners of newspapers which have 7.8% of the total Canadian daily newspaper circulation, and maybe more to the point, of newspapers which reach into many diverse communities across the country, do you feel that your newspapers have a particular responsibility to their readers insofar as coverage and interpretation of news from the Province of Quebec is concerned?

Mr. McCabe: I think it would be better if you asked one of our publishers. Remember I am a corporate officer of the newspaper and it would be perfectly obvious, I would encourage our people to turn out a good news report.

Mr. Fortier: I would like to know what the news from head office is?

Mr. McCabe: Well, personally I think they should have a good coverage.

Mr. Fortier: Do you feel they do, and do you look for it in your newspapers?

Mr. McCabe: Yes, I think they do. Now, I am only talking now about the English press, I cannot comment on the reverse, I think the average person in Western Ontario is pretty well informed about affairs generally.

Mr. Fortier: I am speaking specifically of the affairs in Quebec?

Mr. McCabe: Yes, generally of affairs in Quebec.

Mr. Fortier: And is this made one of your unwritten guidelines at head office.

Mr. McCabe: We don't have written or unwritten guidelines.

Mr. Fortier: But you have a lot of written material?

Mr. McCabe: No, but this is all fact, we don't have a Code of Ethics, we don't have standards of this or that. We just began a relationship between people.

Senator Prowse: People helping people.

The Chairman: I said six o'clock, and I do want to let Senator McElman finish his questioning; I also do want to go and have dinner but if I may, Mr. Fortier if you have other questions; you might bear in mind that we have two publishers here this evening.

Mr. Fortier: I have one last question.

The Chairman: All right—please proceed.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. McCabe has referred very often this afternoon to his company's responsibility to its shareholders. Relatively speaking which is more important—your responsibility to the shareholders or responsibility to the reading public?

Mr. McCabe: That is a good question. You know the other day we were talking just about this very same thing, saying we had the reading public, the employees and the shareholders. I don't know which would go first. I don't think it would be the same one in every set of circumstances. I think this is an impossible question to answer.

Mr. Fortier: Then your lawyer must have told you what to answer.

Mr. Tory: I ask Mr. Fortier to which he has the greater responsibility—to his wife or his job?

Mr. Fortier: I will tell you outside the corridor.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: First of all a supplementary to Miss Hamilton—when you were speaking about the newshole versus ad space, would there be any acceptable minimum percentage for the news hole as related on a continuing basis to the ad space, beyond which you would not let it drop?

Miss Hamilton: I can't answer that question because as I said before it just is not a concept, or figure, or statistic that I have ever worked with in my total newspaper experience—the matter of percentage. I can't see that the percentage as a reader means anything. I can't see that percentage relates to anything really. Newspaper people, publishers operating newspapers have a responsibility to maintain a news-hole which is hopefully adequate for the particular area that they are covering. Then the problem, of course, is to be able to do it, and stay in business. I really couldn't answer that. I don't think anybody else could really.

Senator McElman: Thank you. I noticed the many uncomplimentary remarks that Mr. Fisher made, but I think what may be regarded as a constructive suggestion in his brief, if I can go through it and I quote "There are a number of community colleges rapidly growing in the smaller communities, especially in Ontario where 19 of the 28 Thomson dailies are located. A number of these colleges have communications departments or journalism schools. This is an ideal opportunity for smaller papers to gain intelligent and skilled reporters, if only they could guarantee a decent salary, future and journalistic satisfaction. Why couldn't Thomson papers work with these schools on some sort of trainee program on a province or nation wide basis? It could mean a stabilization of their acute manpower problems? It could mean a deceleration of the youthful cynicism towards small town papers; it could mean better newspapers." Is this a constructive thing?

Mr. McCabe: Yes, because we have been working on it. The latter part of that to me is a lot of junk and untrue. We do not want to stay here all night, but on this matter I would not mind staying for a long time. But in the matter of community colleges in Ontario—now, not at the University level, I am talking about Ryerson and Sheridan College, the only two I know—now, I may be wrong, there may be other schools of journalism. The Advisory Committee of the Sheridan School, that is the one on the west side of Toronto—has two of our editors and publishers on it. We have a scholarship which is a pretty significant one. We have a scholarship at the Ryerson School of Technology.

Senator McElman: How many at Sheridan?

Mr. McCabe: Two at Sheridan, we have one at Ryerson which I installed when I was on their Advisory Committee ten, fifteen, or eighteen years ago, right after the school got started. We have been doing this for years. We have been encouraging the formation of them but we can't very well go to the Government and ask them to start a school of journalism because we would not ask Government for anything under any circumstances.

But this sort of thing, sir, is absolutely wrong, and the latter part—I had some figures checked after this Guild statement about how long people stayed with us. Our average employee stayed nine years with us, and I think it is slightly more for editorial people. I think that is pretty good today.

Senator McElman: Well, I am not trying to embarrass you, Mr. McCabe...

Mr. McCabe: Maybe I am trying to sneak something into the record because some of these are so frightening.

Senator McElman: No, no, this is not our purpose here Mr. McCabe. When comments, unfair or otherwise are made, when the people to whom they are directed, appear before us, we try to give an opportunity for a balanced record. That is all we are doing here of course.

At page 19 where you refer to "One is to make no changes in the staff of a newspaper" I assume that means no firings, that sort of thing?

Mr. McCabe: Yes. I think groups in the past...

Senator McElman: But on the management business side, is it a practice, or something happens fairly often that you do inject staff from the business side?

Mr. McCabe: Not unless we have—so many people who sell newspapers are getting along in years, or they just do not want to be there anymore. We are delighted if we can get the former owners to stay on with us because of their tremendous knowledge of that community. It is very important to us, and we are delighted.

Miss Hamilton: I think too because you are speaking of the business side, it is also that we don't inject any people into the business management because there has been no need for it.

Mr. McCabe: There are not that many good people to go around.

Senator McElman: In other words there have been enough examples of it that it could be called a practice?

Mr. McCabe: There is no place where we went in and said "You are out, we'll put this man in". We have had any number of cases like the man in Vernon, who just decided he wouldn't want to be around as publisher. I tried to get him to stay. He is an excellent publisher. I have known him for years.

Senator McElman: My last question, Mr. Chairman, at page 24, there was a quotation, I believe, from K. R. Thomson in 1969. It refers to slanting the presentation of the news. It says that and so on, it is dishonest journalism and quotes Mr. Roy Thomson: "it is a crime against the people themselves that any newspaper should actually distort, misrepresent, or colour the news or information in order to support in the public mind its own particular beliefs." These are very strong views, strongly expressed, and presumably part of the policy and philosophies of your chain. Without some measure of head office checking, how could you possibly police such a situation?

Mr. McCabe: I think if you make a good appointment in the first place, it shows quickly.

Senator McElman: This is the key, this appointment level.

Mr. McCabe: I think if you have a good editor in the newspaper, I am not concerned about it. Again this is how our philosophies have been expressed in the past. Ken Thomson and Roy Thomson have always had strong views on this, as I have—strong views on dishonest journalism.

Senator McElman: And if this is looked at very closely at the appointed level you don't feel there is likelihood of this arising?

Mr. McCabe: Well, it is one of the things that we would hear about in a hurry, and the average newspaper man in Canada is mighty honest. They are a mighty honest group. I don't care who they are.

Senator McElman: Thank you.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. McCabe, Miss Hamilton and Mr. Tory, I would like to thank you. I am sure I do not need to tell you that the Thomson Newspapers are a very significant factor in the Canadian Media scene, and for the purposes of our study we are grateful that you have been so co-operative here today.

The Committee adjourned.

Upon resuming at 8:00 p.m.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, this evening we are going to receive briefs as you know from two of the Thomson daily newspapers.

Sitting on my immediate right is Mr. W. J. Garner who is the publisher and general manager of the Peterborough Examiner and sitting on my immediate left is Mr. J. W. Denhoff who is the publisher of the Prince Albert Daily Herald. On Mr. Garner's right is Mr. J. G. Coleman, a lawyer with the firm of Tory, DesLauriers and Binnington.

We are anxious to adjourn tonight's session at 10.30 in order that some of the people, who are anxious to catch an airplane which I understand goes to Toronto at ten after 11, can be away; and so I have undertaken to the witnesses and the others present that we will terminate by 10.30 or indeed it may be earlier.

The program I thought this evening would be, and I think it is agreeable, that we will in effect receive both briefs at once. There is as I understand it a brief oral statement which Mr. Garner will make first, and following his statement and before questioning there will be a similar statement by Mr. Denhoff. I think both gentlemen are aware that their briefs have been received, circulated and read and that the questioning will be on the contents of your brief, and on the oral comments you make now or anything else which the senators may want to ask. So I will call on you, Mr. Garner.

Mr. William J. Garner (Publisher and general manager of the Peterborough Examiner): Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman, and Honourable Senators. The newspaper business is a most rewarding one and I have been associated with it all my business life, the last 33 years with the Peterborough Examiner. In the course of my newspaper life I have been much involved with community affairs and have been actively associated with local groups such as the hospital board, the Chamber of Commerce, and of course service organizations.

Outside of Peterborough I have also been active in our various newspaper associations. The Examiner, until recently, was directed by Robertson Davies and under his guidance gained a very fine reputation. Our continuing objective is to maintain the same high quality which he as publisher established and produce a newspaper which provides an effective service to the community.

Much has been said about editorial policy of Thomson Newspapers. I can honestly say that the only direction on editorial views expressed comes from myself and my editor.

The Examiner has served the City of Peterborough since 1847 and has published as a daily newspaper since 1889. It now has a circulation of over 26,300 copies daily and serves a wide area which extends from Lake Ontario on the South to Bancroft, 68 miles north of the City, and from Madoc on the east to Lindsay on the west.

Some comments were made today about the Examiner's relations with the Guild. I would like to make a few remarks in this connection to put the record straight.

The Toronto Newspaper Guild was certified as the bargaining agent for 22 employees of the newspaper. We met with the Guild representatives on nine different occasions to settle difficulties between us. On six of these occasions Ontario Labour Department representatives were present to assist. Because the Toronto Newspaper Guild were inflexible in their demands, which included attempts to try Metropolitan Newspaper practices on our much smaller community newspaper, negotiations never really ever got off the ground.

In addition you should realize that there were some 120 other employees who wished to continue to work. Fifty of these employees were represented by two other unions. My responsibilities to them and to the people of Peterborough were clear. I had to continue to get out a newspaper and this, Honourable Senators, is what I did.

I feel that the Committee has made it necessary for newspapers generally to take a close look at themselves and do a little self-examination. This is an exercise which without urging very few of like to do but is in most cases very beneficial.

I am sure all of us in the publishing business will be eagerly awaiting the report of your deliberations.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Mr. Denhoff?

Mr. J. W. Denhoff (Publisher of the Prince Albert Daily Herald): Mr. Chairman, Honourable Senators. My remarks will be very brief. My own background has been in the newspaper business since leaving high school in Calgary some 30 odd years ago, and most of this time has been spent on the editorial side with the exception of seven years when I owned and operated my own weekly; and small weekly newspapers, as some of you will know, involve a lot more than just writing stories.

It involves being everything from office boy to running a press. Since 1967 I have been publisher and general manager of the Prince Albert Daily Herald.

In between I have worked as a reporter of the Calgary Albertan and for a brief time of the Prince Albert Daily Herald. Later I was provincial editor for the Saskatoon Star Phoenix and after my return from selling my weekly I became City editor there and the news editor, and was managing editor of the Moose Jaw Times-Herald, which is another Thomson newspaper, prior to going to Prince Albert.

I have spent all my adult years in the newspaper field. I don't profess to be an expert on it but of course I do have some opinions on how a newspaper can best be run in the interests of both the public and the proprietor. I feel that a newspaper must be healthy economically if it is going to do its job of serving the public.

I certainly found in my own operation on a very small weekly that we had to remain healthy if we were going to give our service.

I have read with a great deal of interest the newspaper reports of the hearings of the Committee. They have been particularly interesting to me personally naturally, and I am confident, as Senator Davey has remarked that it is not a witch hunt but a conscientious effort to see if the operations of newspapers and the media can in any way be improved from the viewpoint of the public benefit.

In my own view, the search for an improved newspaper—I speak not of the other newspapers but of my own—has been going on and is going on every day of the year. If any one can advise me as to how within one year or 10 years mine could become the leading newspaper in Saskatchewan—not in Canada, just in Saskatchewan—I assure you they would find me most receptive. I think it is a fact of life with newspaper men that they receive advice on every hand.

Doctors and lawyers go to cocktail parties and they complain that they are always being asked for free medical or legal advice on the guise that somebody is asking about their uncle or aunt's condition. But I think it is a fact of life with us that when we go to a cocktail party or almost any social gathering we are the beneficiaries of free advice...

The Chairman: That is also true of politicians.

Mr. Denhoff: I think that is one thing we have in common, sir.

Senator Prowse: Would you say the advice you receive under those circumstances is worth what you pay for it?

Mr. Denhoff: I understand that that is the response used by the legal profession. Honourable Senators, the esteemed Mr. Claude Ryan suggested that some newspaper men were not taking this hearing seriously. At least, this is what I understood him to say. I could find this difficult to believe. I am sure that any newspaper man that I know would take it very seriously.

However, possibly in view of the fact that we are constantly being given advice on every side it may be that some newspaper men are rather cynical about what may emerge from your hearings but on the other and, of course, I think also there is even a greater fear that in a spirit of attempting to help newspapers carry out their functions, some legislative action may emerge.

I must say that personally this would be a terrifying thought to me. Without having discussed this with Mr. McCabe I notice his remarks this afternoon. I certainly feel we would not be the beneficiaries of or the victims of any special legislation. I believe the senior editorial writer now at the Toronto Star but then at the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix, Mr. Stewart Shaw, some years ago wrote a very interesting outline of responsibility of newspapers and on the subject of freedom of the press and he stated most forcefully there that our only freedom and our only right are those of the ordinary citizen. I believe that this is a situation that should continue.

Just one further remark. At your Committee meeting yesterday, a brief was presented by the Canadian Metis Society, the National Indian Brotherhood of Canada and I believe on behalf of the Indian-Eskimo Association, and some remarks were made in which I was particularly interested because we have a very large Indian population and a very large Metis population both in Prince Albert and in the area we cover.

The first thought that occurred to me was that Chief Dieter and the Reverend Mr. Cuthand, who were appearing for the organization, said that they were not getting the publicity in the daily newspapers that they felt that the Indian people deserved and the native people deserved.

Certainly in our case—I cannot speak for other newspapers because there are four other newspapers—but in our case I feel that we give them a great deal of publicity even though by and large we do not have a large circulation among the native people. It has been improving in recent years I am delighted to find, but our senior reporter Mrs. Jasper has served and is serving on the Prince Albert Metis Association and does a great deal of publicity for them, is very interested in their activity and reports this in the newspaper and we welcome it as a newspaper.

They have a great number of problems. We are constantly on the lookout for success stories to balance the sad stories that we have to report from the police court column—but was it you, Senator Prowse, or Senator Hays, yesterday who said something about not reporting the native background of people in the police courts and in trouble? Certainly we never do this.

We do run into a problem because we find it necessary to give addresses, the home address of people in police court, and when somebody comes from a reserve it is obvious of course what their racial background is.

Similarly so many of the names are recognized by our readers, but there is just no way we can avoid the implication of these if this is a native person. We would like to find an answer but offhand we just haven't been able to find one.

We do not mention that they are natives and we do not mention that they are Metis except on success stories so really, we discriminate in reserve.

I was going to say that they didn't send us the brief unless it arrived after I left Prince Albert on Tuesday morning.

The Chairman: The brief arrived late.

Mr. Denhoff: So I think this is just one more example of the fact that actually to get news on the native people, what they are doing, we have to go out and really dig for it.

We find that possibly because of their situation they are not the most communicative people in the world. Until very recent years there have been very few articulate native people, very few.

With those remarks, Mr. Chairman, I would just conclude by saying that I speak for Prince Albert. I can't speak for Mr. Garner and I don't suppose he would want to speak for me. He may have different views on some subjects.

The Chairman: I think the first question this evening is from Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Garner, you were here today and you have made reference to the unfortunate strike that you went through at the Examiner. I am sure you heard the questions I put today; probably I should not have put them to Mr. McCabe but to you. Without my going back through them could you expand perhaps on the report we have had as to what took place?

Let me say first of all, Mr. Chairman, my only knowledge of your newspaper is through our research and what witnesses we have had refer to it; except for a very close friend of mine in my home town who comes from Peterborough and he has spoken in the very highest terms of the calibre of your newspaper.

There was reference by the Guild to the lack of coverage during the strike and they spoke in very unkind terms, of course. They considered this unfair in relation to the Toronto coverage, and even the discontinuance of the strike which was not reported and so on. Would you comment on that aspect of it?

Mr. Garner: Yes, I can, Senator. In most situations of this kind where there are conflicting views we like to publicize both sides of stories. We felt that if we gave day to day coverage of the strike, of our side of it, it could be termed biased.

We also felt that if we did run day to day stories we would have to make available to the other side space to give their story. This coverage would have to come from the Guild and there aren't any stories which a newspaper runs, which are what you might call handouts, which are not edited.

Now, if we had edited these stories the other side could have claimed that we were still biased. Also we might have found ourselves suing ourselves for libel for what we printed so this is the reason, sir, that we didn't give very much coverage to the strike.

There is a T.V. station and two other radio stations which did I think an adequate job of giving the news and I might say that the Guild established a newspaper of their own in competition to us where they gave their side of the story.

Does that answer your question, sir?

Senator McElman: What was that, in leaflet form?

Mr. Garner: No, sir, it was more than a leaflet form. It ran between an eight and 16 page tabloid paper printed on offset. It was quite well done and I gather had a fair readership.

Senator McElman: And the approach you took on this was totally within your own local decision-making process?

Mr. Garner: Oh, absolutely, sir.

Senator McElman: Were the facts that we related, that on day one there was a report of a strike that you did carry as an ad—not as a story but as an ad for the management side and that in the final demise of the strike there was no report of it? Are those accurate facts as they are given?

Mr. Garner: Yes. As a matter of fact, our views on the matter were set out in an advertisement which we published in our newspaper of December 20, 1968, and I have a copy of it here if you would like to have it tabled, sir.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Senator McElman: Did the Guild seek to run any advertisements of their own in your newspaper?

Mr. Garner: I don't remember that they did, sir.

Senator McElman: They didn't make a statement, but I was just wondering if they ever attempted to do that?

Mr. Garner: Well, while we are interested in business, I think possibly we may not have taken it, but at the same time we were never offered any advertising from the Guild, because as I say they did have their own paper and did a relatively good job of putting their side across.

Senator McElman: Am I correct then in my assumption that the coverage or lack of coverage, whatever viewpoint one might take on it, from your standpoint was on the basis of an effort to be manifestly fair rather than follow a biased approach?

Mr. Garner: We could have been accused of putting a bias had we just run one side.

Senator McElman: Did the Guild throw up a picket line?

Mr. Garner: Oh, very definitely. They had up to 200 people around the plant at times.

Senator McElman: And you have a fairly large section of craft employees represented by craft unions?

Mr. Garner: Yes, we have, sir. I tell you. . .

Senator McElman: Did they cross the lines?

Mr. Garner: Oh, yes. Our two unions cover 0 people.

Senator Prowse: What unions are they?

Mr. Garner: International Typographical Union and the Printing Pressmen's Union. We have as I mentioned before 120 people who indicated that they still wanted to work and they did cross the picket line.

Senator McElman: If my recollection serves me correctly—and if I am wrong please could you correct me—we received testimony the effect or with a strong suggestion that they were moved in from other elements of the Thomson newspaper chain to assist in keeping the paper operating.

The Chairman: That was specifically suggested, yes.

Senator McElman: Well, that was my recollection. Would you comment on that, please, Mr. Garner?

Mr. Garner: Actually I found that in my length of stay in Peterborough I must have made a lot of friends because I was very, very gratified at the number of people who wanted to volunteer to help us.

21417-6½

The Chairman: Well, that really wasn't the question, Mr. Garner.

Mr. Garner: No, I realize that, sir. You asked me if there were some Thomson people involved. Now, over the years with my association with our various newspaper organizations, I have gotten to know very, very many newspaper people and many of these from editorial areas, and we did receive some assistance voluntarily.

Senator McElman: From other elements of the Thomson chain?

Mr. Garner: Yes. We did have some other people from outside of Thomson also.

The Chairman: Could you explain what you mean by voluntarily?

Mr. Garner: Well, actually on many occasions people would phone me to see if they could be of assistance.

Senator McElman: Did you request such assistance from any quarter?

Mr. Garner: I beg your pardon?

Senator McElman: Did you request such assistance from any quarter?

Mr. Garner: No, I didn't request assistance. I shouldn't say that. I did request some assistance but much of it was voluntarily. Not only that, sir, we had assistance locally. For instance, most sports organizations—instead of our reporter covering their events—passed in their information pre-written, and the same with women's organizations, the same with various other local organizations such as the Community Concert Association. Their people passed in information for us. Actually, they wrote complete stories for us covering the events and plays and we were fed a considerable amount of good copy, and we also had people who had been correspondents for us from outside the city cover various areas for us on a voluntary basis.

Mind you, they were in our employ, only on the basis of what you might call a stringer, where you pay so much for each column inch, but they volunteered to help us and they did.

Senator McElman: Did any of the assistance come from upstairs at the head office?

Mr. Garner: No, sir.

Senator McElman: Were any requests made to the head office for assistance?

Mr. Garner: Well, my dealings were mainly with the people involved at various papers.

The Chairman: But specifically were there any requests put through the head office?

Mr. Garner: There may have been.

The Chairman: Well, you can't remember or...

Mr. Garner: No. The thing is as I said, most of our contact was with people on the various papers. Now, there could have been and probably was some suggestion that they may help on occasion.

Senator McElman: Mr. Chairman, I have other areas but not on this question.

The Chairman: Well, I would just like to pursue this one point. Could I ask you what kind of people came in to help you?

Mr. Garner: They were in the main people who were in authority in these papers.

The Chairman: In which papers? The papers they came from?

Mr. Garner: Yes, that is right, sir.

The Chairman: For example?

Mr. Garner: Well, for example, they were city editors, people who knew how to put a paper together.

The Chairman: Well, a city editor from where?

Mr. Garner: We had a chap from Barrie.

The Chairman: Well, take Barrie, is that a Thomson paper?

Mr. Garner: Yes, it is, sir.

The Chairman: Well, who would do his job when he was with you?

Mr. Garner: Well, it was only on a day to day basis.

The Chairman: Would they drive over in the morning and go home at night, that sort of thing?

Mr. Garner: Yes, sir, they would do this.

The Chairman: Did any of them stay?

Mr. Garner: The longest stay I think was three days.

The Chairman: Three days?

Mr. Garner: Yes.

The Chairman: Who would pay for their accommodation when they would stay?

Mr. Garner: We would pay for it. I had an arrangement with a motel there.

The Chairman: About how many other people came from other Thomson newspapers?

Mr. Garner: Well, to go back a bit...

The Chairman: Well, I don't want to pursue this endlessly, Mr. Garner.

Mr. Garner: I just would like to give you a little background.

The Chairman: Fine.

Mr. Garner: The strike started November 2 and at that time we had six people, desk people and managerial people, and then it dwindled to about three or four but anyway we didn't make any hirings at all until the end of the year. It was on the 28th of December, I believe. So during this period, at no time did we have what you might call a staff I would think at the most we had three people other than our own.

The Chairman: At any one time?

Mr. Garner: Yes.

The Chairman: We are not going to spend the whole evening, I can assure you talking about the strike, but I would like to go back to a question that Senator McElman asked just to be clear on your answer.

The question he asked you was on coverage of the strike in your newspaper. I believe you said the reason you did not publish the Guild's position was that you would have to do it on the basis of their handouts, is that right?

Mr. Garner: Well, this is the only way we could get it. We didn't have any reporters to speak of.

The Chairman: But surely it would have been possible for an experienced newspaperman like yourself to write an objective summation of what it was the Guild was after one which they would find acceptable and one which you would find acceptable?

Mr. Garner: Well, of course, at that time...

The Chairman: If I may theorize for a moment. Supposing you had been with Canadian Press and you were covering the situation and there was a strike in Ottawa in Kitchener or anywhere else, you could have presented both sides I am sure.

Mr. Garner: Well, actually at that time my workday started at 4 a.m. in the morning and went through to midnight, possibly one or two in the morning.

The Chairman: Yes, but wouldn't you agree this was the biggest local news story in Peterborough at that time?

Mr. Garner: It was only 22 employees and we have had strikes up to 2,000 people in Peterborough.

The Chairman: Well, at that time surely this was a pretty significant news story in Peterborough?

Mr. Garner: Well,...

The Chairman: Well, the news story was uppermost in your mind I am sure?

Mr. Garner: Very definitely, but at the same time we made a decision locally that we wouldn't give complete coverage or any coverage of the situation because of the bias which some people may feel existed.

The Chairman: Well, as I say, I don't want to pursue the thing endlessly. We may come back and perhaps the other Senators will have some questions.

Senator McElman: One further point. Let me say, Mr. Garner, that I understand that this was a particularly acrimonious time and feelings ran pretty high. What I want to get it is the statement that was put on the record and I want to see your corresponding statement put on the other side of the record. One of these statements which was made by the Guild when the witnesses were here was that the final offer of settlement by your management was for a senior desk man, I believe it was, or a senior editorial man, $5 below they were actually then receiving. Is that factual?

Mr. Garner: I am not sure. This has been a year and a half ago. The first of these events occurred almost two years ago and I would be really quite pleased to forget them.

The Chairman: Well, we don't want to make your Christmas unmertry but we would be grateful if you would just for a few moments cast your mind back and answer Senator McElman.

Mr. Garner: Well, to start with there was the statement in our newspaper and if I have I can refresh my memory.

The Chairman: Yes, sure.

Senator McElman: I should couple with that, Mr. Garner, what was coupled with that. They said that they believed this offer, this final offer being below the then going rate being paid, was in truth to keep from settling the dispute, so if you could couple that with your reply as well.

Mr. Garner: Well, actually I am not absolutely sure of our offer but I don't think this was the case. We said in our statement—this is our advertisement which appeared on December the 20th in the paper and it says "Facts about the strike by the Toronto Newspaper Guild against the Peterborough Examiner." It said the Guild was advised at that time that the newspaper proposed that no wages would be reduced as a result of implementing the schedule.

It was further indicated that the schedules represented a guaranteed minimum only.

From The Floor: Miss Hamilton. Mr. Garner, it might be interesting to indicate to the Senators the area in which the Guild was talking about an increase at that same time.

Mr. Coleman: I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if I might just have a moment to refresh Mr. Garner's mind.

The Chairman: Of course.

Perhaps while this conference is going on we might have a question for Mr. Denhoff. We shouldn't be wasting the time because we have a rather important witness here. Would you like to ask Mr. Denhoff a question?

Mr. Yves Fortier: Yes certainly; I don't want him to fall asleep there.

Mr. Denhoff: I was starting to feel neglected.

Mr. Yves Fortier: Mr. Denhoff...

Mr. Coleman: I think we are ready, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: We are ready now. I am sorry, Mr. Denhoff.

Mr. Denhoff: My one big chance.

The Chairman: We will be back to you, I can assure you.

Mr. Garner: Actually, our reporter was getting more than the minimum which the Guild were talking about at the time. These had been established under the former management.

Senator McElman: Then we are talking about a salary range are we?

Mr. Garner: Yes we are, sir. I believe Miss Hamilton explained this this afternoon, that what you might call a person out of high school who hasn't any newspaper experience at all—this range covered a person who started just from scratch, then he advanced through this schedules and these schedules were minimum only.

Senator McElman: Well, let me put it this way then. Presumably there was a minimum range in effect at the time the dispute began?

Mr. Garner: Actually, sir...

Senator McElman: Of X number of dollars. Presumably the union in the course of this bargaining or demands, or requests, or whatever you want to call it, called for a revised minimum to X dollars and you made what they said was a final offer of X dollars. Could we get the X dollars? What was the going minimum at the time the dispute began? What was the demand for the new minimum by the Guild and what was your offer for a new minimum?

Mr. Garner: Well, to start at the beginning we did not have under the former owner a scale of wages as such laid down. The new man going on would be paid—it would depend if he came from a School of Journalism—For instance you pay a higher salary or higher scale than you would for a person coming out of high school. We didn't have a graduated scale that you could take out of a drawer and say "well, this chap should get so much." We used the basis of merit and paid on that basis. And this is the way it was prior to the strike and prior to certification. Now, the Guild's scale went this way. In group 1, and this comes under the heading of wire editors, at that time the company was paying $135. The Union proposal was $235 and it represented a percentage increase of 74.1 per cent. Group 2, sports editor, feature editor. The company was paying at that time $105. The union proposal was $220 or a percentage increase of a 109.5 per cent. Group 3—deskmen, were $110 and the union proposal was $205 and the percentage increase would have been 86.4 per cent. Group 4, reporters, $105 paid by the company, the union proposal was for $190, a percentage increase in that case of 81 per cent. In Group 5 the company paid $75, the union proposal was $155 and that amounted to 106.7 per cent increase.

Senator McElman: Well, what does that group constitute, Mr. Garner?

Mr. Garner: In the engraving department. The significance of this whole thing as I believe I mentioned in my preamble was that the Guild was trying to introduce to a small community paper conditions which applied only to Metropolitan papers.

Senator McElman: To complete this picture can you give me the corresponding figures for those separate groups that constitute the final offer of management?

Mr. Garner: Senator McElman, I do not have them with me.

Senator McElman: Could you supply them to the Committee?

Mr. Garner: Yes, I could do that.

Senator Prowse: Mr. Garner, in the brief that was presented to us by the Guild they make this statement: "The strike, as is general knowledge, was lost, not in small part because management was able to import strike breakers and editorial department workers from other Thomson papers." You have explained that. "This action so disgusted the paper's city editor, district editor and chief editorial writer, who were excluded from the Guild by the Ontario Labor Relations Board, that they joined the Guild's picket line." Is that true?

Mr. Garner: In most editorial department the personnel there are very close and these three people in question, along with some of the chaps who were on strike, were very close and they felt as a personal gesture that they had to go out but in one of the letters our former city editor who went out at that time said that when this situation was resolved he would be very glad to come back.

Senator Prowse: Did they come back?

Mr. Garner: Well, as a matter of fact I took a job with the Toronto Star before the situation was resolved.

Senator Prowse: Did any of those people come back?

Mr. Garner: Yes they did, sir.

Mr. Coleman: Mr. Chairman and senator there has been prepared in anticipation this subject coming up a chronological sur mary of what happened during the strike and during the negotiations and we would be happy to table this, and the last paragraph mentions and deals with what senator Prowse has just mentioned, this business about the people coming back to work after it was all over.

Mr. Garner: I hesitated to read this because it takes quite a time.

The Chairman: There is no need, you can just table it. Would you like to read the last paragraph?

Mr. Garner: Yes, Mr. Chairman. This last paragraph on this situation reads as follows: Finally on April 20 picketing of the employer's premises was discontinued. Shortly prior to that date representations had been made on behalf of striking employees with a view to their possible return to work. As a result of such representations, the newspaper had interviews and subsequently agreed to take back all striking employees who indicated a desire to return to work. This was consistent with what had been the newspaper's position throughout the strike. Such employees had returned by approximately May 1, 1969, one year after certification by the Guild.

Senator Prowse: You mentioned that the people of the Peterborough area were being advised of the progress in the strike.

Mr. Garner: Yes, there were three other electronic media that were doing that.

Senator Prowse: And which were they? Was that CHEX AM?

Mr. Garner: Yes, radio and TV.

Senator Prowse: And CHEX and CHTV?

Mr. Garner: Yes and CKBT.

Senator Prowse: That was the second radio station?

Mr. Garner: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Now, the first three, the fm and the fm station, the CHEX one, those are all Thomson media stations?

Mr. Garner: That's right, sir.

Mr. Fortier: Just a few questions if I may about the strike.

Mr. Coleman: I wonder, Mr. Fortier, I don't want to leave the implication from the Senator's last question in the air like that. The fact that they were Thomson radio stations doesn't indicate necessarily coverage that was being given. Is it true to state that continuous coverage was being given on both CHEX am and fm and on the TV station as well as on the other radio stations about what was happening?

Mr. Garner: A full coverage was being given by CHEX radio and CHEX TV and the fm station tied in with it as well as the other stations.

Senator Prowse: The Thomson station is part of the Thomson-owned chain?

Mr. Garner: Yes it is, sir.

Mr. Coleman: But they did give coverage.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Garner, did you receive and publish any letters to the editor on the matter of the strike during the strike?

Mr. Garner: I think there were two or three, sir.

Mr. Fortier: Did you publish them?

Mr. Garner: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Did you receive any letters that you did not publish on the strike?

Mr. Garner: I can't tell you that, sir.

Mr. Fortier: Why not?

Mr. Garner: Because I was quite busy at the time and the people in our editorial department were looking after that end of the business. I can find out if you would like that information.

Mr. Fortier: Would you?

Mr. Garner: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: It's this attitude which you adopted and which you explained at great length, and very clearly a few minutes ago, and which motivated your decision not to publish accounts of the strike. Is this recognized as good newspaper practice?

Mr. Garner: Possibly not, because we were involved in it this time. Other times and in other strikes we were reporting both sides of the issue.

Mr. Fortier: I would be very interested in hearing Mr. Denhoff's comment as to whether or not the Peterborough Examiner was correct in newspaper practice?

Mr. Denhoff: Mr. Fortier, I don't know what correct newspaper practice would be under the circumstances. And after having listened, and without realizing you were going to question me, I have just been going over in my own mind what one would do under the circumstances. Certainly I can see Mr. Garner's problem in that as he said news releases, as you know, I am sure, are almost always edited down for space reasons and for style and for any number of reasons. Not to change the intent of them but simply for matters, for example, how much space you have on a given day for a given story and how does it rate with other stories on a given day; so there are always reasons and the stories are always edited.

If he published them I am sure by now the Guild would have said he took our releases but they were so badly chopped up you couldn't recognize them and they did it in such a way that they gave us a slanted version. So he would have had a problem.

I frankly don't know—maybe he would have had to have submit them to an uninterested party and say "look, here's our statement, there is their statement, what would you do with it?" I don't know.

Mr. Fortier: Well, supposing you had a strike in Prince Albert at your newspaper, what would you do with that experience now of one Thomson newspaper and the way in which it reacted?

Mr. Denhoff: I think possibly—and this is very off the cuff and hopefully I won't ever have to cross this bridge, but I would give some consideration to that. This is looking back and it is relatively easy for me in light of his experience to decide now that this is what I would have done but at the time, as Mr. Garner said, he was under tremendous pressure and I am certainly not going to fault his decision.

Mr. Yves Fortier: Well, did you realize...

Mr. Denhoff: He is also in a different position in that I believe that the Toronto metropolitan dailies come in there in significant numbers, do they Mr. Garner?

Mr. Garner: Yes.

Mr. Denhoff: Which is quite a different situation than mine.

The Chairman: How significant a number?

Mr. Garner: I think the Toronto Star has about 2,500 and the Telegraph has maybe

2,000, and I think probably the Globe and Mail is a little higher. I don't believe I am too far wrong.

The Chairman: And what is the circulation of your paper?

Mr. Garner: It is 26,300, sir.

Senator McElman: It is fine for all of us to have hindsight but I think in fairness can we put it to Mr. Garner in retrospect: Having gone through the gory experience would you handle it the same way?

Mr. Garner: I think I would, Senator. I think I would because I think you will have many problems if you try to cover both sides of an issue under circumstances like that knowing that the people in the community were getting the information.

Senator McElman: Thank you, sir.

Mr. Fortier: May I suggest to you in a very friendly fashion that you did not have much confidence in (a) your objectivity and (b) the objectivity of your readers. I mean I have always thought that a good newspaperman would pride himself on being impartial and being objectively known as such. Did you?

Mr. Denhoff: Well, wouldn't it be the case of the doctor trying to treat himself? Isn't that the same as a lawyer taking his own advice?

Mr. Fortier: If by treating one's self you mean editorializing on the conflict, I would agree, but when it only comes to reporting the news, the facts of the strike, the fact that this has been demanded by the Union, the fact that this has been offered by management where did you feel that you would slant the news or you would be accused of slanting the news?

Mr. Coleman: Well, surely Mr. Garner has answered that question.

Mr. Fortier: Well, Mr. Chairman, I suggest he has not.

The Chairman: Well, I am interested in Mr. Garner's comment.

Mr. Coleman: I think Mr. Garner said that he was understaffed and overworked. The problems of presenting fairly this very difficult situation in which they were involved in an unbiased manner would have taken a disproportionate amount of their time for three or four people they had there and had an obligation to the 120 people and members of the other unions and the public to get out a newspaper. It is as simple as that.

Mr. Garner: Well, at that time I must admit that most of our copy was Canadian Press. As a matter of fact we did try to cover quite a number of functions locally such as City Council meetings and the people whom we sent and who did go were quite apprehensive about their safety.

Mr. Fortier: Well, did you publish Canadian Press dispatched for example, on the strike?

Mr. Garner: No. Here again—pardon me, we did run some Canadian Press but not very much.

Mr. Fortier: Our researchers have indicated to us that you did not.

Mr. Garner: Well, as I say it is almost two years...

Mr. Fortier: I am sorry, I have been corrected.

The Chairman: I don't think our researchers said that.

Mr. Fortier: No, Mr. Chairman, I was wrong and I apologize. Your statement is that you did publish some but not much?

Mr. Garner: Well, quite frankly, I can't remember.

The Chairman: You did. You published some but very little.

Mr. Fortier: Where would the fear of partiality find its place in those dispatches—the Canadian Press dispatches?

Mr. Garner: Mr. Fortier, at that time as I mentioned, I did not give direction about what was handled by Canadian Press or what we took of Canadian Press releases. I spent most of my time on the line. I was interested in producing a newspaper and I was leaving up to the two or three people we had in the editorial department the job of putting the paper out. I didn't indicate one way or another—I really wasn't aware of the dispatches that were coming through and I didn't even look at the Canadian Press machine.

Mr. Fortier: To your knowledge, did the head office in Toronto know that there were employees of the other Thomson newspapers who came to lend a helping hand?

Mr. Garner: They must have, I guess.

Mr. Fortier: Did they ever comment to you at any time on that particular practice?

Mr. Garner: Well, quite frankly I wasn't in Toronto other than for labour hearings. I didn't get near our central office.

Mr. Fortier: Well, there are such things as telephones.

Mr. Garner: Yes, I agree. They would know yes, certainly.

Mr. Fortier: Well, did anyone ever comment to you on that practice from Toronto and condemn or condone it?

Mr. Garner: Neither. Any comment might have been to the effect of how are you making out? How are you going to get your paper out? Is it going to be late? As a matter of fact we published every day and didn't miss a deadline.

The Chairman: What happened to the circulation during that period?

Mr. Garner: The circulation was nibbled in—to the extent of about 7 or 8 percent.

The Chairman: Did you pick that up?

Mr. Garner: Yes we have.

The Chairman: Well, turning away from the strike I would like to ask Mr. Denhoff is he would care to express an opinion of the Sifton papers in Regina and Saskatoon.

Mr. Denhoff: You mean as to their quality?

The Chairman: Yes, and how would you compare them with your own paper?

Mr. Denhoff: Well, I think as Mr. McCabe mentioned, the Galt paper carries a lot more stories than larger papers in Ontario—I gather he is talking about Ontario, I don't know.

Certainly both the Saskatoon and the Regina papers are much larger than mine and the Regina paper has come to be almost a provincial paper; but I feel in terms of what we can accomplish with a circulation of 8,500 versus—I think Regina is somewhere around 53,000—I feel that we carry a commendable number of stories both locally and nationally and internationally in relation to their paper.

The Chairman: How about compared to Saskatoon?

Mr. Denhoff: Saskatoon has adopted what seems to be a new policy and it seems to be going stronger on an entertainment binge at the moment. In hard news stories I think—we don't carry them at the same length because of the space restrictions, but I think we compare very favourably. In terms of numbers of stories and covering the board aspect of the news field.

Senator Petten: I would like to ask Mr. Garner something. On page 5, item 21, you say:

"If a person desires to criticize or make observations on any issue, space is made available in the 'Letters to the Editor' column. In each of the past five years, for instance, the Examiner has published over 500 letters per year."

Now, 500 that doesn't seem to be very many to me. I come from Newfoundland where the Evening Telegram has a much smaller circulation than you and it seems that they have 8, 10 or 12 letters in every night. I was just wondering whether this figure was right for comparison?

Mr. Garner: Well, we run all our letters to the editor on our editorial page so it isn't a case of going after them.

Senator Petten: No, I wasn't suggesting that, but you do run them on your editorial page?

Mr. Garner: Oh, yes we do run them on our editorial page.

Senator Petten: Well, this is less than two a day.

Mr. Garner: Well, this was an average figure and actually if I remember correctly our average last year was higher than in other years. This year, for instance, we have had so many municipal issues in Peterborough that the letters are much longer and as a consequence we can't run as many.

Senator Petten: But you just stick to your editorial page as far as your letters to the editor are concerned?

Mr. Garner: That's right.

Senator Petten: You don't say continue on page so and so?

Mr. Garner: That is right, Senator.

The Chairman: If I may, Mr. Fortier, I would just like to ask Mr. Garner a question. The Examiner became a member of the Thomson organization in 1968?

Mr. Garner: That's right.

The Chairman: Is it a better newspaper today than it was on the 15th of March, 1968?

Mr. Garner: I don't think it is a better newspaper because we already had a good one.

The Chairman: You don't think it has improved.

Mr. Garner: Well, the thing is when you have your editorial staff run down to three people there is a point where you have to start recruiting staff, and recruiting good staff is difficult because good reporters are already working and that means you have to start raiding, and as a consequence we didn't have what you might call highly experienced reporters to start with.

The Chairman: When is this you are talking about?

Mr. Garner: Following the strike we had a staff...

The Chairman: No, you misunderstand me. The strike was when?

Mr. Garner: The strike started on November 2, 1968.

The Chairman: And when did you join the Thomson organization?

Mr. Garner: April 2.

Mr. Coleman: Of the preceding year.

The Chairman: Of the preceding year, yes. I am asking you—this has nothing to do with the strike at all—I am asking you how has your membership in the Thomson organization affected the newspaper? Has it improved the paper over and beyond the period, let say in March of '68, which was when you were still not a member of the Thomson organization?

Mr. Garner: I would say that the paper was equally good.

The Chairman: Well, you are saying hasn't hurt it but I am asking you has improved it?

Mr. Garner: No, it hasn't improved it. hasn't improved it because I think at that point we were a highly regarded paper and we were working on what you might call good high plane of newspaper publishing at that time.

Mr. Coleman: I think, Mr. Chairman, the reason Mr. Garner used the strike was to indicate that in the interval between the time of the acquisition and now there was the strike which caused the editorial staff to be depleted and he has to rebuild his editorial staff.

The Chairman: But you must have achieved that, it is a year or two ago now?

Mr. Garner: Oh no, actually the strike just topped you see in April of this year.

Senator Prowse: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if you could take the period—the strike started when?

Mr. Garner: On November 2.

Senator Prowse: Well, as of the 15th of October how did it compare with March?

The Chairman: All right, that is a good question.

Mr. Garner: I would say it was equally good. I would say that it was equally as good as the paper under our former ownership.

Mr. Fortier: You say that you had, and still have a good newspaper. What has been your record—this question is really directed at both you and Mr. Denhoff. What has been our record of seeking dissent in your respective municipalities? Would you agree, for example, that the business of a newspaper in a one-newspaper town is to seek areas that have not been explored, to dig for dissent?

Mr. Garner: That's right. As I have mentioned in periods in Peterborough we have had a lot of rather controversial municipal issues this year.

Mr. Fortier: Such as?

Mr. Garner: Such as town planning and the range of the board of education to a regional board, and there have been a lot of very controversial issues which have come out of these and we have not only tried to give both sides of those issues but we have commented on numerous occasions editorially about them. This is what we would have done before.

Mr. Fortier: Peterborough is a university town now, isn't it?

Mr. Garner: It is now.

Mr. Fortier: What have you done with the problem of the university students in so far as drugs are concerned for example?

Mr. Garner: As a matter of fact now that you bring that up, we had a chap by the name of Mr. Bill Clement who I would imagine is probably—well, he has been working on the LeDaine Commission and he came to Peterborough and as a result of his coming and talking to the students of Trent University we ran a complete series, well researched, on the whole drug issue. I think we ran seven or eight of them and used many of the references and interviewed this Bill Clements. From what I can gather he is the third best qualified person to talk on drugs and this was very well received in Peterborough.

Mr. Fortier: Are there any other areas of today's society which you have explored and editorialized upon in your newspaper in recent months or recent years?

Mr. Garner: Well, whenever an issue such as you speak of comes up we do go all out on it. I can't remember any specific ones. I did remember this one on the drug situation. As a matter of fact the correspondent in Trent University—to follow this other thing up—keeps us well posted and provides us with many good articles on University happenings.

Mr. Fortier: You do have a full time reporter at the university?

Mr. Garner: Oh no. This is a student who was going to the university who did work for our paper. He has now gone back to university and provides us with very very good material.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Denhoff, what do you do in Prince Albert—is there any dissent that is worthy to be reported?

Mr. Denhoff: Right now we are worried about whether the farmers are going to sell any wheat so that we can keep publishing. I don't know how many of the Honourable Senators realize this but since July 31 we have only been able to sell about 400 bushels a week which I believe would bring around $600 and we are very concerned, I must say, in Saskatchewan with other matters. However, I was surprised to hear Mr. Garner mention that they had done a series in drugs. We have done our own without knowing about this and I believe it was the first in Saskatchewan just recently—a young reporter who joined our staff and who is young enough to speak as a member of the peer group to the high school students—we do not have a university there—drugs have become a serious problem in our high schools and he has just completed a series of five or six articles. He was invited to speak on a panel at a parents' association forum, I believe, to discuss the dangers and incidence of drug users in Prince Albert, and we like to think that we were influential in stirring up public awareness of the problem as it related to a small Northern Saskatchewan City, quite a way from the main stream of normal social problems. Likewise we certainly take an active interest in all municipal affairs and we are having a running fight with the City Council on secrecy in Government which is a continual threat, I believe, not only to newspapers but to the public.

Mr. Fortier: Could you expand a little bit on this fight with the council regarding the secrecy of government?

Mr. Denhoff: Well, I would hate to admit it but so far we haven't been too successful; but the council in Prince Albert has a habit of meeting first in what you call a committee of the whole, and we maintain that subjects which some of them might find embarrassing are dealt with in detail at these meetings and just passed without discussion at a formal session of council to which our reporters are allowed entry. They are not allowed entry to the prior sessions but so far we haven't been able to stir up the public on this issue, I must confess.

Mr. Fortier: You realize that if you had a press council, for example, in Prince Albert, this is the sort of thing which you could submit to the council as is done in England. You know the press council doesn't exist only to allow the reader to complain to the council but it also exists to assist the newspaper in issues such as this one.

Mr. Denhoff: Well, Mr. Fortier, I don't know what influence a press council would have. We are, I think, attempting to tell the public what is going on to the best of our ability. We feel that it is a responsibility of ours to advise the public that this is happening. Now, I feel that the public equally have a responsibility to be interested in their affairs and when the public is ready they will take action very easily at the ballot box and demonstrate their dissatisfaction for the manner in which things are run. It may be that a large segment agrees with the way the council is handling it. They have been handling it this way for 20 odd years.

The Chairman: How then conversely could they demonstrate their unhappiness with the newspaper? There is no ballot box there.

Mr. Denhoff: Well, there is certainly the letter forum and certainly they can advise me.

The Chairman: Well, you make that point about advising you and you say "the door of my office is always open to the public". Supposing I have a grievance against the newspaper and I go to your office; if I don't get any satisfaction from you that is the end of the line.

Mr. Denhoff: Well, not really, you vote with your subscription also.

The Chairman: Well...

Mr. Denhoff: May I say, Senator, that in Prince Albert we are 90 miles away from Saskatoon and Saskatoon carries not as much local news as we do but they attempted to carry a considerable amount and they are delivered to the door in Prince Albert at the same hour as our newspaper is, regrettably so the people, although it may not be a completely satisfactory alternative from a local point of view...

The Chairman: Well, there have been times in my career when it has been my business to read newspapers like yours and if I recall, if I want news about Prince Albert I must buy your paper.

Mr. Denhoff: I think so, yes.

The Chairman: I think that is a fair statement.

Mr. Denhoff: Yes.

The Chairman: Therefore if I want to protest by cancelling my subscription, I am really in effect cutting off my nose to spite my face because I won't know what is going on in my own home town.

Mr. Denhoff: Well, of course, there is always the radio and TV.

The Chairman: Well, my experience—I am sure you will agree that radio and television cannot carry the local news the way you do.

Mr. Denhoff: Yes, I would agree with that.

The Chairman: I just wonder; in your Statement 8 on the press council you state that the idea of a press council is incongruous. I don't think the members of the Committee...

myself have made up our own minds on the question, I should make that clear, but I get the impression when we have discussions like this that some people in the newspapers almost protest too much.

Mr. Denhoff: Well, my understanding of the press council in England is that it is a voluntary body and there is no such thing as enforcement. It is limited to recommendations to newspaper proprietors and editors to ask in a certain way, and also to hear complaints launched against a specific newspaper...

Senator Prowse: Or by them.

Mr. Denhoff: Or by them, yes.

Senator Prowse: It is set up by the press themselves.

Mr. Denhoff: Well, what I am getting at, Senator Prowse, is the strength that any recommendation that they might make is only as good as the willingness of the publisher, or the proprietor, or the editor to accept that recommendation. I am certainly willing, more than willing, to accept any reasonable criticism of our operation and to try and improve our operation.

Senator Prowse: If you will permit me, Mr. Chairman, under the British Press Council system which is set up by the press itself they have one for all of Britain which is not applicable to Canada. Suppose you do like they have done some places in the States—set one up and you ask the Chamber of Commerce and various other organizations to help you do it. You name somebody and you have a couple of your senior editorial men on it and the Chamber of Commerce have a couple of people and the Knights of Columbus and whoever else you want, and this is the group and somebody goes to you and if they don't get satisfaction, they then go to the press council and you agree beforehand that you will print the decision of the press council. So I have a complaint and I go to the press council and we find that they should have given Senator Prowse an apology and they would have printed his statement, and you print this, that you should have done this. You agree to do this beforehand, voluntarily give their findings. Now, if you don't do it then it is not only my cancellation but several other cancellations. In other words, this is something to help you to do your job. It takes the responsibility off you.

Mr. Denhoff: Well, Senator Prowse, I am not concerned because actually we already have such a situation. Let's agree first of all, and I hope we may, that they have a completely different problem in England with national newspapers. Some of them bidding very high figures, that to me are fantastic, for the memoirs of a prostitute, memoirs which again are known to hurt the feelings of many people and apparently they just do this without too much consideration—the thing has been well aired by now surely. We don't have that problem to the best of my knowledge from the press in Canada. We are not sensational newspapers, certainly outside of the metropolitan area...

The Chairman: Do you think the metropolitan papers are sensational?

Mr. Denhoff: Well, Senator Davey...

The Chairman: Well, you were suggesting that, weren't you?

Mr. Denhoff: Well, not really; if by implication it sounded that way I didn't mean it. I meant that I am more conversant with smaller newspapers than the metropolitan ones. But to get back to this question. If a press council, if it was set up, and they said "Denhoff you are wrong; print an apology to Senator Prowse", we would do it. We already do that. If Senator Prowse comes in and says I was wrong, we say "Come on, here is the paper..."

The Chairman: What if you don't think he was wrong?

Mr. Denhoff: Well, it doesn't matter what I think.

The Chairman: Well, surely it does.

Mr. Denhoff: Well, he is entitled to equal time.

The Chairman: No matter even if you do think he is wrong?

Mr. Denhoff: Well, I might let him write an editorial on it.

Senator Prowse: And I would write a letter that would go in with all the other crackpots.

The Chairman: I am sure you are not suggesting, senator, that you are a crackpot?

At this point we will pause for 90 seconds while the reporter makes some changes.

Short recess.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, I would like to call the meeting back to order.

Mr. Fortier: I wonder if Mr. Garner could tell us on this question of a press council what he means in paragraph 8 of his brief when he suggests that a press council in some respects is a form of censorship.

Mr. Garner: I think a press council would have, or would try to assert, some pressure at times and infringe upon our right to print things. Actually freedom of the press is our right to inform people and I think to some extent a press council may try to restrict that.

Mr. Fortier: Are you implying that a press council would be an attack on freedom of the press?

Mr. Garner: Well, if they are trying to restrict us or did try to restrict us from taking a certain way of presenting something, this is in some respects restricting our freedom to give the news as we see it.

Mr. Fortier: Well, take the British Press Council as you and I know it. Do you think it infringes on the freedom of the British Press?

Mr. Garner: Well, quite frankly I am not that conversant with the British Press Council and their activities but I agree—I was talking about press councils as they may be set up here. I agree with Mr. Denhoff that the Press Council in England was set up primarily I believe to look into and possibly restrict some of this sensationalism from their national papers. I don't think we have the sensationalism as such to the same extent over here.

The Chairman: I don't think you can really say that that is why the British Press Council is set up.

Mr. Garner: Well, this is my understanding of it. I am not that conversant with the British Press Council.

Mr. Denhoff: Senator Davey, if I may interject again, I think there is another distinction that should be made and despite Senator Prowse's remarks about the press council and the letters to the editor. In England I am sure it is physically impossible for the national dailies, or even those in any of the larger cities, to print all of the letters received from their subscribers even sharply condensed, or the people who take a different view, or people who feel that they have been maligned by the newspaper in any way.

The Chairman: You don't print all the letters you receive, surely.

Mr. Denhoff: Absolutely. We welcome them.

The Chairman: Well, that is interesting because I have a file full of letters downstairs in my office from people all over Canada who sent letters to their editors, complaining that they are either not published or edited.

Mr. Denhoff: I would like to qualify that if I may. We certainly reject letters that are not authentic. In other words we check to see that the person actually live where he says he lives, that there is such a person, because we do get letters from people—from phonies—and we receive letters from people some times who sign other peoples' names to them so we do check on that.

The Chairman: That reminds me of the story, and I think it is someone from Prince Albert who comes to Ottawa, and that gentleman has a way I understand of dealing with letters he gets from people, letters which are particularly cantankerous and unpleasant. He sends them back to the person with a note saying, "I thought you should have this letter somebody is using your name."

Mr. Denhoff: Well, the qualification I was just going to make is when they infringe of the law of libel or if they are in particular bad taste, where they attack a person on religious grounds or something like that. On other people—not us—those we reject and send them back with a note saying why, and if they would like to rewrite them in a different way we would publish them. We don't edit them except for spelling and grammar. We do have a limit, 500 words I believe it is.

Mr. Garner: Well, we had one the other day that came in from a chap regarding the Humane Society and had we run it as it was it would have taken about a column and a half. Now, we edited the letter, phoned him and read back to him the cut down version, and he agreed that this was fine. Now, we edit in this way.

Senator McElman: This wasn't condemning your paper in any respect?

Mr. Garner: No. Space is important.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Garner, I am disturbed by this sentence in your brief here where it says a press council is in some respects a form of censorship which could ultimately infringe on the freedom of the press and the people's right to know. Do you really mean that? A press council which would operate as a Tribunal of Honour, as they are known in some countries in Europe, and which would have no power of coercion but would only seek to influence public opinion, do you really believe that such a body would infringe upon the freedom of the press?

Mr. Garner: Well, it depends on how the Press Council is set up.

The Chairman: Yes, but you have said here, you said it is. You didn't say it could be. You say it is. I would agree with that answer, Mr. Garner, if you said a Press Council could be a form of censorship, but you have not said that. You said it is.

Mr. Garner: Well, in this case possibly my usage of the English language didn't say my thoughts on it properly...

Mr. Coleman: I am quite sure it didn't, Mr. Garner. The play on words such as the word "unduly" this afternoon is in some respects, and in this respect—if we admit, as I think we must, that freedom of the press is an extension of freedom of speech then anything that interposes itself, anybody that interposes itself between the utterer of the speech and the hearer of the speech is in some respects a curtailment of that.

The Chairman: Far from being a curtailment...

Senator Prowse: Well, suppose we are dealing with something that prevented this speech being made?

Mr. Coleman: Supposing we are dealing with what, Senator?

Senator Prowse: Mr. Denhoff has told us that the City Council in Prince Albert holds all their discussions in a private committee meeting. When they have reached their decisions they just come out and announce it.

The Chairman: I don't think it's quite that, but something like that.

Senator Prowse: Now, he would take that to the Press Council.

Mr. Coleman: That is very interesting, Senator, and I was hoping you would say that.

I have here, and would be glad to table, a list prepared by the American Newspaper Publishers Association on who were the complainants to the British Press Council and they list the number of complaints in a particular year, and I believe it was a 12-month period ending in December of '67.

The Chairman: How many were there in that year?

Mr. Coleman: Well, there were a number of categories. There were 56 government and local offices of governments that complained; 44 people who signed their complaint simply "a reader." These people were often people who had no direct interest in a particular matter but thought the situation would have been if he or she had been the editor and there must be lots of those.

There were 112 that came from people in the Bertrand Russell Peace Foundation. There were university dons and labour unions and doctors...

The Chairman: Is there anything wrong with labour unions and doctors?

Mr. Coleman: No, but not one of the complainants was a newspaperman.

Senator Prowse: Well, aren't they lucky.

Mr. Coleman: Well, that's right. The point is...

Senator Prowse: Do you mean to say that your people here in Canada have no complaints about their access to the press?

Mr. Coleman: No, senator, but the point is this—the point that is being made about the Press Council that it is going to redress the balance in favour of the newspapers and provide the newspapers with a forum to come to a decision such as that the Prince Albert Council be more public in its hearing.
